Is there any full-grown man who hears me, who is endowed with the ordinary share of intellect, which God in his mercy allots to his creatures, who does not know that, on this subject of slavery, a man's opinions and feelings in relation to it depend upon the place of his birth, his education, his association, the habits and feelings and institutions of the community, in which he lives? Does any many doubt this? Let him for a moment consider it. A man is born, educated, and continues to reside in a non-slaveholding State; he knows nothing of the institution practically—nothing from his observation—but from infancy to age, he has been accustomed to hear of its horrors. The tales of the nursery first affrighted his infant imagination, and pictures of men languishing in chains, or writhing in torture, and of a tyrant master piying the lash which inflicts it, which he finds in his school books, rivet upon his young mind the impression which they were calculated to make. Can you wonder that such a man grows up with an innate, irrepressible horror of an institution which is productive of so much misery? And when, having attained full age, he mingles with the elders of the land, and finds that there are also political considerations to strengthen his opposition to it, that the preponderance of his party at home, may depend upon the activity of that opposition, are you surprised that he comes here prepared to denounce this institution with an ardor which is proportioned to the value of the stake for which he plays, and a confidence which is the exact measure of his ignorance of its practical operation and effect?

Another man is born, educated, and resides in a State where slavery exists. The institution is familiarized to him in the earliest moments of his life. It is sustained by the parents whom he reveres and loves. In their mild and gentle rule he sees nothing of the horrors, in the cheerful and merry countenances of the slaves he beholds none of the sufferings, which are elsewhere said to attend it. The nurse who has watched over his infancy, on whose bosom he has reposed, whose breast has been to him a fountain of life, is a slave—his first playmate—the companion of his boyish sports—the sharer of his childish revellings—is a slave. In his earliest wanderings from the paternal roof, an aged domestic of the family, his companion, protector, and guide, to whom he looks with affection and respect, is a slave. They who have watched over him in his hour of sickness, whom he has seen ministering to his aged parents with affectionate assiduity on their death-beds, and mourning their departure with a sorrow which would not be comforted, these, too, are slaves. Can you wonder that such a man, with a consciousness that he is not a tyrant, with the conviction that his slaves are cheerful and contented, sees in this institution none of those horrors which affright the imaginations of others?

Which of these two men has formed the most correct estimate of this institution? The one knows nothing of it personally; his judgment has been formed on the representations of others, whose means of information were as imperfect as his own. The other has grown up with it—witnessed its operation and effects—daily observing them from infancy to manhood. Let those who hear me judge.

Take another test. The citizen of a non-slaveholding State, who has grown up with a cherished horror of slavery, and has found, on arriving at manhood, a superadded motive for opposition to it, as a political institution, is tempted by the love of adventure or by whatever cause, to migrate to a slave State. The institution, in its practical operation, is now before him, and he has thus an opportunity to confirm or correct the opinions he had formed. What is the result? His horror of slavery ceases. He sees a body of laborers cheerful and contented; he finds that the quantum of labor is less than is demanded elsewhere; he sees them fed, clothed, and ministered to in sickness and old age; he associates with their owners, and among them meets men who are honest and humane, often distinguished for their piety and for the exercise of charity in its best sense. He becomes reconciled to the institution, and very soon is himself a slaveholder. A man brought up in a slave State, sometimes, though the instances are more rare, removes to a non-slaveholding State. He does not change his opinions. Instead of sympathizing with or withstanding denunciations of an institution which he feels to be misrepresented only because it is misunderstood.

The first will change his opinion—almost universally does so. The second rarely, if ever. A Senator near me speaks of instances of such change as within his knowledge. It may be so. I will not doubt it; but they are sufficiently rare to form exceptions, which only prove the rule. The suggestion of the Senator has brought to my recollection instances, not of persons born in a slaveholding State, but who had removed there, and become slaveholders, who, returning to the States from whence they came, underwent a second change of opinion, and denounced slavery as a mortal sin. My recollection also furnishes me with the fact that they had first qualified themselves for this second migration, by selling their slaves, and pocketing the proceeds of the sale. Sir, I assert a fact, which every man, whose opportunities of observation have enabled him to speak to it, will affirm, that it is precisely those persons who have removed from free States and become slaveholders, who are most severe in their exactions from their slaves. It is perfectly natural that it should be so. They know these people only as laborers for whom they have paid a price, and demand from them the labor which they have been accustomed elsewhere to see performed. They have not, it is impossible that they should have, towards them the same feelings of kindness and forbearance as those have who have been born and brought up in the midst of them—who have played with them, and labored with them—who have laughed with them, and wept with them—and who, in hours of sickness and sorrow, have ministered to, and been ministered to, by them.

I trust, sir, the institutions of the South stand vindicated from the imputations which have been cast upon them—that however our northern brethren may be disposed to question their policy, they will agree that they are not so steeped in iniquity as to exclude those who tolerate them from their right to participate equally in the enjoyment of that which is the common property of the people of the United States. And now I ask, can this exclusion be within the spirit of the constitution?

Mr. President, the Senate has been told, and unfounded as it is in fact, the declaration will be reiterated, that the South has originated this discussion, that they are agitating this distracting question. I say simply and frankly, the fact is not so. The discussion is forced upon us by our northern brethren. If they had contented themselves with organizing a government for the territory of Oregon, leaving the question of slavery untouched, this discussion would never have arisen. Why, sir, look at the practical operation of the 12th section of this bill. It proposes by an act of legislation, doubtful at least, in relation to the question of constitutional power, to exclude the citizens of one half of the States, from all participation in a territory which is the common property of all. It says that slavery shall not exist in the territory of Oregon—that southern men shall not be permitted to go there with their slaves. We do not ask you to say that slavery shall or may exist in that territory, that we may be permitted to go there with them. We ask you simply to withdraw your prohibition, to say nothing, and then there can be no discussion. You tell us that slavery exists only by force of State laws, that the moment we pass the boundary of the State they are free, that Oregon is a free territory, and that if we carry our slaves there they will become free. Then why legislate to forbid slavery there? If you are right, the thing is already done to your hands. Prove the sincerity of your belief by withholding the prohibition, and leave us to test the correctness of our opinion, by carrying our slaves there in the absence of such prohibition. You will not do this; you insist upon the enactment by which slavery is forbidden. By so insisting, do you not manifest your own conviction of the fallacy of your opinion?

You admit the right of the people of the territory when they come to form a State constitution, to determine the question whether slavery shall or shall not exist there. Now look at the practical operation of the course which you propose, upon the exercise of that right. You forbid slavery so long as Oregon remains a territory; no slaveholder can go there with his property, and of course will not go. When the question comes to be settled, it is then to be decided exclusively by citizens from the free States. Who does not foresee how it will be decided? and who does not as plainly see that this decision will be produced by your previous legislation? You cannot but be aware how much this question at this moment agitates the Union. You know that hundreds of demagogues mounted on this political hobby, are distracting the American people. The South is comparatively tranquil, but when you come to apply to other territories adapted to slave labor, the principle which you will have established by passing this bill, you will awaken a feeling which it will be difficult to repress.

I do not desire the extension of slavery. Personally I am opposed to the acquisition of territory, and I believe that my constituents would profit more by the improvement of the lands which they possess, than by emigration to any other. If slavery is extended by the acquisition of territory, and without any act of legislation on our part, it must result from the operation of our constitution and laws. If we have resisted the acquisition, we are not responsible for its consequences. But to gentlemen who voted for the treaty with Mexico, and who now make an outcry against the extension of slavery, I say you voted for the extension of slavery when you voted for the acquision of territory, unless in violation of the plainest principles of justice and the manifest spirit of the constitution, you meant to appropriate that territory to one-half of the States, excluding the remainder from all participation in it.

One more consideration: the country is separated into two great political parties, who are divided on principles which they respectively believe to be important to the best interests of the country. I affirm the sincerity of my own convictions, and accord to others what I claim for myself. The principles which we respectively maintain, concern the great interests of the nation; but every thing must yield to the excitement which is produced by this agitating question. The free soil demagogue, mounted on his political hobby, breaks through your ranks, and both parties are thrown into confusion.

To my political friends—to those with whom I have voted in resisting the acquisition of territory, I say, adhere to the principle which governed you then. You sought to exclude this question from our national councils by resistance to territorial acquisition. In this you have failed. What remains but to refuse all legislative interference with a question so pregnant with danger to the integrity of the Union? I address myself also in a perfectly respectful spirit to gentlemen on the other side of the chamber—to my political opponents. To them I appeal to adhere to those principles of policy which they have recently and publicly proclaimed. In the resolutions of the democratic convention at Baltimore, I find it solemnly resolved as a cardinal principle of democratic faith,

"That Congress has no power, under the constitution, to interfere with, or control the domestic institutions of the several States."

And again:

"That all efforts of the abolitionists, or others, made to induce Congress to interfere with questions of slavery, or to take incipient steps in relation thereto, are calculated to lead to the most alarming and dangerous consequences; and that all such efforts have an inevitable tendency to diminish the happiness of the people, and endanger the permanency of the Union, and ought not to be countenanced by any friend of our political institutions."

I address myself to gentlemen, some of whom participated in the deliberations of that convention, and united in the affirmance of these resolutions—all of whom are "friends to our political institutions"—I appeal to them to say, if this bill which inhibits slavery in one of the territories of this Union is consistent with that resolution. I ask them if it is not an "interference with the question of slavery"—if it is not at least an "incipient step in relation thereto;" and then I inquire if as "friends to our political institutions" they will lend themselves to a measure which they themselves have recently and publicly declared to be "calculated to lead to the most alarming and dangerous consequences"—to "have an inevitable tendency to diminish the happiness of the people and endanger the permanency of the Union." However we may differ on other subjects, I offer them my adhesion to this principle of democratic faith, and pray them to adhere to it. With the privilege which belongs to those of a common faith, I warn them against an interference with the question of slavery, by taking even an incipient step in relation to it.

One other question, and I have done. You tell us that you will not interfere with slavery in the States—that you will respect what you denominate the compromises of the constitution, and so long as it is kept within those limits we may enjoy it, or suffer under it as we can—that beyond these we cannot pass—especially that it cannot enter into the common territory of the Union, all which you intend hereafter to appropriate exclusively to yourselves.—You tell us that slavery is an outrage upon human rights—a violation of the laws of God—a crime which must be excluded from the camp—and that unless we quickly submit to those terms, the Union is not worth preserving. Now, I propose to you a question, and I pray you to answer me. As men, as honorable men, do you believe that this is the spirit in which the constitution was formed? If in the convention which framed it, your fathers had addressed this language to ours, do you believe that this Union would ever have existed? Do you not believe that the men of the South would have indignantly rejected a proposal so degrading to them as men, and as freemen? If they had tamely submitted to so arrogant a demand, would your patriot sires have deemed them fit associates for freemen? Would they not rather have united their political destinies with the slave, than with his master—with the untutored Africans, rather than with the craven wretches who held them in bondage, without the spirit to assert their own rights against their equals?

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I beg leave to read to the Senate, and ask that it may be printed, an amendment which I contemplate offering to the amendment proposed by by the Senator from Indiana. And while I am up allow me to state what I conceive to be some difficulties growing out of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, which my amendment is designed to obviate.

[Mr. UNDERWOOD read the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.]

Now, sir, I wish to bring to the consideration of the Senator from Indiana, and the Senate, this state of the case. Suppose I emigrate from Kentucky with my slaves, and settle south of latitude 36° 30′, what is my condition in reference to the property thus emigrating and settling south of that line? The amendment of the Senator from Indiana is entirely silent upon this state of the case. We have been informed by gentlemen on this floor, that the institutions and laws of the newly acquired territories are not changed by our assuming jurisdiction over them; and we have also been told that if we take slaves into a country, the jurisdiction of which we have newly acquired; and the laws of which are unchanged, those slaves, upon being taken there, immediately become free. If this doctrine be correct, the effect of my honorable friend's amendment is just this. It will be a positive declaration that slavery shall never exist in any of the territories thus acquired north of 36° 30′. Now, my object is, if we are to compromise and settle this question, to do it so plainly and boldly, by meeting the question in all its aspects, that for all time to come, there shall be no difficulty in regard to it. And hence I propose to offer an additional proviso, that emigrants from any State or territory of the United States going into the territory of New Mexico or California, may carry with them any description of property, and that they shall be protected in the use and enjoyment of such property during the existence of the territorial government of the United States in those territories. Should they become States, this description of property will be subject of course to the State laws. But I wish to obtain a pledge, while the gentleman is exacting from us that north of 36° 30′ there shall be nothing like slavery—that south of that line, when any property that is recognized by State laws, shall be removed into any newly acquired territory, it shall be protected.

The amendment was read and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. PHELPS, it was

OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr PHELPS.—Mr. President: It was not my purpose when this debate commenced, to take any part in the discussion of a subject which I had studiously chosen to avoid, as a subject of an irritating, troublesome, and perplexing character. But, sir, I have been induced to change my purpose, in consequence of the course which has been taken in the debate. Doctrines have been advanced, which, in my judgment, are at war with the constitution. Positions have been taken which I regard as wholly untenable; and claims have been set up in relation to the slave-holding power which I deem it my imperious duty to resist. It is a very important question whether this power, existing as it does in certain portions of the Union, can arrogate to itself a principle of self-extension in defiance of the power of Congress, and in defiance of local legislation. Sir, this pretension is, in my judgment, wholly inadmissible. I had supposed that a proposition so inconsistent with what has heretofore taken place, would not have been advanced. We have heard a good deal of the Missouri compromise. That compromise, if I understand it, fixed upon the line of north latitude 36° 30', as the line of demarkation between what are called the free and the slave States. I had supposed, that by virtue of that compromise, the territory of the United States north of that line was to be forever exempted from the institution of slavery. But, sir, we are now told, whatever may have been the purport of the compromise, that we possess not the power to exclude slavery from any portion of the territory of the United States. If this position is tenable—if it can be made out that Congress has no power over this subject, as connected with its territorial legislation, then, indeed, the Missouri compromise fails as a compromise, for want of power to make it and want of power to give it effect. Sir, I repeat, if this pretension is defensible, which claims to exempt this institution from all legislation, and claims for it the right to extend itself over these territories in defiance of our legislation; if this pretence be well founded, then, indeed, there is no earthly authority that can restrain it.

But, sir, before I admit the justice of this position, I may be permitted to examine the ground on which it is founded. And, in the outset, I deem it utterly immaterial whether the power of Congress over the territories of the Union is to be derived from the express grant of power in the constitution, to make rules and regulations for the government of the territories; or, whether it be derived from the power which is incident to this government, because essential to all governments, of acquiring territory by conquest or purchase, which carries with it the right to govern. It has been argued that the express provision of the constitution extends the legislative power of Congress over these territories no further than the subject of property is concerned; and that legislation over persons is not included. It is, however, conceded on the other hand, that it is incidental to this government to acquire territory, and if the power to acquire territory be admitted, the power to govern is of course involved. But, sir, all this discussion is, in my humble judgment, unimportant. From whatever source the power is derived, it is too late now to deny its existence. It was asserted before the formation of the constitution. It was not denied or prohibited by the constitution itself when adopted. It has been exercised from the first existence of the government down to the present day; scarcely a session of Congress has passed in which the existence of the power has not been recognized in the most emphatic manner—indeed the bill before us assumes the power; and every discussion, every question that is raised in the face of this bill as to what it is, or what it should be, proceeds upon the same assumption.

Sir, my first position is, that let the power be derived from what source it may, it is a general, an exclusive, and therefore unlimited power. If you attribute the power to the right of acquisition —to the war-making power—to the capacity of the government to acquire territory, its jurisdiction over it is necessarily unlimited, because no other sovereignty can exist. By the very act of cession which made this territory the property of the United States, all previous sovereign power, all prior legislative power, becomes at once extinct. The power of Congress becomes supreme and the only power that can thereafter exist. Well, sir, if it be true that this legislative power over the territory is unqualified and unlimited, and if Congress possess this general legislative power, the only remaining question is, whether this institution is a legitimate subject for the exercise of that power. It has been claimed from the outset, by those who vindicate the institution, that this is a proper subject to be regulated by the local legislature. It is upon this ground, viz: that the subject falls within the exclusive province of State and local legislation, that the slaveholding States have denied the power of Congress to interfere with the institution within the States. It is upon this ground, questioned, denied by nobody, that Congress have uniformly disowned and repudiated that power of interference. But the power of local legislation over the territories is in Congress as absolute and unlimited as the corresponding power is in the State legislature. Nay, if you derive the power of Congress from the faculty of acquisition incident to all governments, it is more absolute and unlimited because untrammeled by the restrictions of the State constitutions. If this subject be a fit subject for legislation in the one case it is a fit subject in the other. It seems to me that the conclusion is inevitable—that Congress possesses the same power of legislation upon this subject within the territories of the Union, that the States do within their own jurisdiction.

I admit that the legislative power of Congress is limited in some respects; I admit that Congress can grant no patent of nobility in these territories any more than in the States; I admit that the restrictions in the constitution upon the legislation of Congress are to be observed; but, sir, I ask gentlemen on the other side to point out the restriction in the constitution which prohibits us from legislating upon this subject. Sir, if the power is not general, if it is not unlimited and exclusive, if any restrictions are imposed upon it by the constitution of the United States, let those restrictions be pointed out. Let gentlemen refer us to the article, the section, the clause in the constitution of the United States which interferes in this particular with the general legislative power of Congress. No gentleman has referred us to any portion of that instrument which involves such a doctrine; and I think I may say with confidence, that no gentleman will make the attempt.

But, sir, from what source is this restriction attempted to be derived? Is it from the nature of the subject? Various analogies have been stated to illustrate the position that there is inherent in the subject itself something which involves a restriction upon our action. The Senator from South Carolina asserted that the power was vested in Congress in trust; and he argued from analogy that the power of Congress as trustee was restricted. Sir, the great mistake is, that things are treated as identical which are in their very nature different. I admit that all the powers of government are held in trust for the benefit of the people, but I do not admit that this trust has any analogy to an ordinary legal trust. The very element of legislative discretion which enters into every grant of political power puts an end at once to the analogy. No two things are wider apart than political power vested in a legislative body, to be exercised in legislative discretion, and a mere legal power vested in a trustee at law, which involves no discretion, whilst that which involves the highest discretionary power known to our system of government. An argument drawn from an analogy of this sort would be denying to the legislature a discretion in this matter, because a similar discretion is not attached to a legal trustee.

Equally unfortunate was the Senator's analogy, which he endeavored to derive from a comparison of the common property of the people of these States in their territories to an ordinary partnership. Had the Senator taken the case of a corporation acting by the will of the majority, he would have found a closer analogy. The interest of the people of these States in the territories is a corporate interest. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BERRIEN] adopts this analogy, and he cites Vattel to establish the position, that although a corporation may, by vote of the majority, regulate the mode in which each corporator may enjoy his corporate property, it cannot deprive him of that property. He need not have cited authority for a position so obviously just, and one which no one, I trust, is disposed to question. Sir, I shall endeavor to show that this question of the admission of slavery into these territories is not a question of right, but one which relates to the mode of enjoyment, and in that light is a question of expediency only.

Sir, the argument of the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] and the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. BERRIEN] is in substance this. These territories, it is said, are the common property of the Union; the citizens of each and every State have equal rights and privileges in relation to them. It is insisted that the citizens of every State have an equal right to emigrate to and dwell in those territories, and to carry thither and retain their property—that is is to say, their slaves. And it is further insisted, that any act of Congress which interferes with this right, and prevents the transfer of this description of property is a violation of the rights of the slaveholding States, destructive of their interests and of that equality of right which is assumed to exist. Such a proceeding, it is said, is virtually appropriating the common property of the Union to the use and benefit of one portion of the people to the exclusion of others.

Sir, in every aspect of this argument, and in all its parts, it is fallacious. So far as it is built upon the supposed inequality between those who are assumed to have equal rights, I confess it is beyond my comprehension.

Whatever may be the determination of Congress, whether any restriction is imposed in relation to slavery, or whether it is admitted freely and without restriction, every citizen of the United States stands upon the same footing. If it be admitted, he may either take his slaves there or not, as he pleases. Whatever may be the decision of Congress in regard to this matter, all stand upon the same footing—the rule is uniform. If slaves are admitted, are they not admitted for the benefit of all? And if they are excluded, are they not excluded for the benefit of all?

Although I am not disposed to question the general truth of the proposition upon which the argument rests, to wit, that every citizen has a right to emigrate to the territories with his property, I am disposed to deny its application. And in order to determine how far it is applicable to the question now before us, it becomes necessary to inquire, what is meant by property in slaves. It is property founded upon a domestic relation, and may be compared to the interest which a parent has in the services of his child; and it bears a still closer resemblance to the relation of master and servant; for, let me remark, the constitution of the United States denominates slaves not as property, but as "persons held to service," which is in my judgment the proper designation. The property which a master has in the services of his slave, if you choose to adopt that language, is the property which the master has in his apprentice. This property, then, is dependent upon a domestic relation, it is incident to it, and can exist nowhere where that domestic relation does not exist. The next inquiry is whether this domestic relation is a subject of local legislation? The Senator from Georgia asked with a good deal of emphasis, whether if a master from a State in the Union where apprenticeship is recognized, takes his apprentice to a part of the Union where it is not recognized, he will loose the service of his apprentice. I answer unquestionably, yes. The apprenticeship being subject to the local jurisdiction only, and the local power being as applicable to the relations of master and servant as it is to any other question that can arise in connexion with mere municipal regulations. But there is another principle which stands in the way of the argument of the Senator from Georgia. The Senator must be aware that when he removes with his property into a new jurisdiction, he holds that property subject to the local legislation of such new jurisdiction. Sir, what is the principle which obtains throughout the civilized world upon this very subject? Is it not the common judgment of the whole civilized world, that a slave taken into a jurisdiction where slavery is not recognized becomes ipso facto free? Is not this the doctrine of every civilized nation upon earth? and is it not the doctrine that is recognized by every State in the Union? This property is what? Is it that species of property which is recognized everywhere? No, sir. And here is another difficulty in the argument of honorable gentlemen. When they tell me that citizens of every State have a right to emigrate to the territories of the United States and hold their property there, I answer that you may carry such property as is recognized as such everywhere by the common consent of nations and the commercial world, but you cannot carry with you the peculiar regulations of your own country, which create a property that is unknown elsewhere. The Senator from Georgia saw fit to denominate this distinction as a chimera of the imagination. If it is, it has found its way into the imagination and into the jurisprudence, and commended itself to the judgment of every civilized people. If there be no distinction between this species of property and that kind of property which is recognized everywhere, how happens it that the title of the property is lost by carrying it from one jurisdiction to another? If you carry your merchandize from Virginia to New England, it will be recognized there as fully and absolutely as the property of their own people, but if you take those persons who are held in servitude, they recognize no such property, and under that jurisdiction they necessarily become free. If you take your cotton or merchandize of any description to England, your right to it is recognized and protected by the law of nations; any unlawful interference with that property becomes a subject of national discussion, and if unatoned for, a legitimate cause of war. Is it so with this species of property? Will Great Britain admit your right to follow your fugitive slaves there, or will you make it a cause of war if she does not? The Senator from Georgia himself admitted that if a master take his slave into a free State voluntarily, it is a virtual manumission. If you take property then to Oregon, you hold it there subject to the local laws; and if you take persons there whom you call property and they do not, your title is forfeited. This is admitted to be a principle of law by gentlemen of the slaveholding States. I am a little surprised that the Senator from Georgia should have seen fit to bestow upon this distinction thus recognized in the jurisprudence of the United States, and of every other country, the epithet of a chimera of the imagination.

But sir, what is this property? It is a species of property which is recognized in certain localities only. If it be of that character which is recognized and protected as property by one local legislature, and not protected or recognized by another, is it, or is it not a proper subject for local arrangement? Its very basis is local; it stands upon that principle, and that alone; and yet we are told that although this is the basis upon which this species of property rests, yet after all, Congress possessing the exclusive power of legislation over the territories has no control over it. But, the pretension does not stop here. It is said that the citizens of the slaveholding States have a right to carry their institutions into the territories of the United States, and that you have no power to prevent it. When this pretension is set up, the question becomes this, not whether citizens of the United States have a right to emigrate to this territory with their property, but whether they have a right to carry with them their peculiar domestic and municipal regulations, and substitute them for the laws which you choose to establish. Such a doctrine would place the slaveholding power above the legislating power. If they have a right to claim exemption within your territories from the operation of your laws, they may claim a right to follow your armies in your career of conquest, and to plant the standard of slavery upon every inch of the wide dominion which your power and your ambition combined may bring under your dominion. Instead of extending the area of freedom you would carry abroad the standard of slavery; while the slaveholding power, thus stalking in the wake of your victorious armies and appropriating to itself your successive acquisitions, would render itself co-extensive and coeval with the boasted "destinies" of this country. Sir, I solemnly protest against the pretension which tramples legislative power under foot—which sets all human authority at defiance, and arrogates to itself the right to extend its peculiar institutions wherever it chooses to plant its footsteps.—Sir, before I admit this doctrine, objectionable as it is to me, and, the Senator will permit me to add, offensive as it is to the people of a great portion of this Union, I wish to see the foundation upon which this pretension rests; I desire to see the clause in the constitution which ties your hands and mine. It is insisted that the constitution recognizes this species of property. How does it recognize it? In the first place it recognizes slaves as persons held to servitude, as persons entitled to representation in these halls. They are at this moment represented here as a portion of the population of this Union, and yet we are told they are property—mere merchandize. If these people are persons and not property, upon what principle is it contended, that when they emigrate to your territories they do not go there subject to the laws which prevail there? The fallacy of the argument consists in the denomination that is given to them, in supposing them property such as is recognized by the common judgment of the civilized world. It consists in putting them upon a footing which they ought not to occupy, and which no logic can make them occupy. The constitution recognizes the insitution so far as this: it authorizes the recapture of slaves, or, to use the language of the constitution, "persons held to service." It is a mere recognition of the rights of the master in the State where he resides, and upon whose municipal regulations his rights rest. But how far does this provision go in recognizing the right of slavery? It goes no farther than I have mentioned—than simply to authorize the recapture of persons escaping. Suppose the master choose to take his slave into a free State, what becomes of his right? Why, as the Senator from Georgia himself observes, it is a voluntary manumission. I would like to ask the honorable Senator where he finds the provision which authorizes the extension of this institution by its own voluntary act, not only without the sanction, but in defiance of local legislation? This right of recapture is one thing, and the right to transport slaves from one State or territory to another and plant the institution there, is another thing; and while the honorable Senator claims this right of recapture, he is forced to admit that any voluntary removal of slavery where slavery is not recognized, amounts to manumission. The recognition of the constitution falls infinitely short of the conclusion to which the honorable Senator comes. He claims the right to plant the seeds of this institution in Oregon. Yes, sir, to plant them every where; and while you are extending the "area of freedom," he is covering that "area of freedom" with a cloud of slavery. I repeat the question: In which provision of the constitution is such a doctrine to be found? In what provision can you find the basis from which such an inference can be drawn?

Mr. BUTLER.—I would ask the honorable Senator whether he supposes that the mere passing from a slaveholding State, with slaves, animo revertendi, would render them free?

Mr. PHELPS.—I hold that the master who takes his slaves into a free jurisdiction, whether it be animo revertendi or not, emancipates them; and I hold that this emancipation does not depend upon the will of the master, but rests upon the principle of a change of jurisdiction. The master, by placing himself and his slave in any jurisdiction, subjects himself, his slave, and the relation between them, to the local laws of that jurisdiction. The same result would follow if the slave escapes. In the absence of the constitutional provision for recapture, the fugitive slave arriving upon the soil where slavery is not recognized, becomes free. This is the doctrine of the English common law. We have been familiar with it from our childhood. I need not repeat the language of the celebrated Irish orator, with which all are familiar, to establish the position that the moment a slave sets foot upon the soil of England the shackles fall.

We have proof of this in a recent transaction. The slaves of the Creole who mutinied, overpowered their masters and took refuge in New Providence, were not surrendered by the British government, but your application was refused. The same thing occurred in the case of the slaves of the Amistad. We refused to regard them as property and declared them free. This doctrine, I believe, has been sanctioned every where wherever there has been any thing like judicial action on the subject. It has been recognized by your own Supreme Court. Sir, I am asked if I approve of this doctrine thus held by the courts. I answer without hesitation, yes; because the converse of that doctrine would place the slave power above all the institutions of this government. If the converse of this doctrine were to obtain, and the property of the master in his slave were to be recognized every where, it would be in the power of the slave-owner, by a simple transfer of what he calls property, to establish the institution in any of the States, in disregard of its laws and in defiance of the wishes and power of the people. Such a result is too monstrous to be claimed on the one hand, or admitted on the other. The provision of the constitution for the reclamation of fugitives, so often cited as importing a constitutional recognition of slavery, is itself founded upon the very doctrine for which I contend. Without this doctrine the provision is unnecessary. It is because the relation of master and slave is not recognized, and would not be enforced out of the jurisdiction tolerating slavery, that the provision became necessary. Sir, the doctrine for which I contend is that upon which the whole slaveholding portion of the Union have relied for the protection of their peculiar institutions, and of that species of property which is incident to them. If slaves are to be regarded as mere property—mere merchandize, what shall prohibit Congress in the exercise of its admitted power to regulate commerce—from regulating the traffic among the States? Sir, it is upon this ground, and this only, that slaves are not to be regarded in the light of mere property; that this power on the part of Congress has been resisted; and on this ground, and this only, has the power been disowned.

I find no fault with this provision for the reclamation of fugitives. I am perfectly content that these slaves should be reclaimed. I cheerfully concede to the slaveholding portion of the Union all that they can reasonably demand, and will aid in maintaining their rights as they are recognized by law and founded in the compromises of the constitution. But I am unwilling that they should impose this institution upon people by whom it is not desired. As I have already remarked, every person that chooses to emigrate to the territory of Oregon can go there with such rights as the local laws recognize. He can claim no other. He can claim no immunity or exemption from the jurisdiction under which he chooses to live. All he can ask is to stand upon the same footing as his fellow-citizens. But, says the Senator from Georgia, we shall not stand on an equality, because we cannot take our slaves there. But, cannot the territory be occupied, possessed and enjoyed, without a slave population? Is it indispensably requisite to the enjoyment of territories of the United States that we should carry this institution into them? Can they not be peopled, and cannot these new communities grow up and prosper without the aid of this institution? For the first time, I believe, in my life. I have heard doubts expressed as to the constitutionality and propriety of this prohibition of slavery. Be it constitutional or not, when gentlemen tell me they cannot enjoy their rights without the aid of a slave population, I ask them to look at the territory to which the ordinance of '87 applies, and then tell me whether this institution is so indispensable to the enjoyment of territory. Visit Ohio—that mighty State which is but a few years old—and behold the results of this prohibition of slavery. That as a civilized community is hardly as old as my recollection—for I recollect very well when the first considerable emigration to Ohio took place.—They were enabled to occupy that territory and to lay the solid foundations of the great and growing prosperity of that State without the aid of a slave population. Will it be pretended that the rights of that people were impugned or violated by excluding this institution? Did they not live there and flourish without it? Can the people of the South then not live in Oregon without their slaves? Can they not be as successful without them as the people of the North have been in planting their settlements in the West? Is slavery really necessary to the progress of this people?

Let gentlemen compare the present condition of that portion of our Union covered by the ordinance of 1787, with the older States where slavery exists, and they will find the answer. The argument that the exclusion of slavery will exclude the people of the slaveholding States from the benefit of the territory assumes that the territory cannot be peopled, cultivated, occupied and enjoyed without the aid of slave labor. If this is not made out the argument fails. If the arts and occupations of civilized life can be established then, and the great ends of the social system and of civil government attained, without the institution of slavery, then the institution is a mode of enjoyment merely, not essential to the rights of the proprietors, and therefore a legitimate subject of regulation by the majority—in other words, of legislation.

You cannot, of course, deny to any of the common proprietors their right to share in the common property; but certainly you can regulate the mode in which they can enjoy it. You can make all all these regulations which are necessary for the common benefit and adopt such legislation as may best promote the prosperity and happiness of the whole. If, in the exercise of your judgment, a particular institution stands in the way of the accomplishment of this great object of the common good, you can prohibit it. This question of slavery in the territories is reduced, then, simply to the mere mode of enjoyment of that which is the property of all. The question of slavery in the territories thus becomes a legitimate subject of legislative action. It is a mere question of expediency—of sound legislative discretion. I oppose these doctrines to the proposition that we possess no power to arrest the progress of this evil—that we cannot prevent the seed from being planted—that the only power on earth that can interfere is that of the people of the territories when they come to form a State constitution. Sir, prevention is altogether better than cure. It is easier, as the melancholy experience of the country illustrates, to prevent the introduction of this system than to eradicate it when once established.

The Senator from Georgia desires that before the formation of these State constitutions, the slaveholding interest shall be represented there. Sir, I desire no such thing. The extreme difficulty and danger, perhaps I might say the impossibility of eradicating the institution when once planted, is an insuperable objection.—This consideration of the hazard, the peril of so radical a change in the domestic arrangements of any people, constitutes the great bulwark of slavery at this moment—the only plank upon which the institution stands. Remove it and the institution is gone.—Point out the mode in which it can be abolished consistently with the peace and the security of the slaveholding community, and the whole system sinks under the pressure of the moral sentiment, the principles and the policy of the age in which we live.

Sir, I would not subject the people of the territories to such imperious necessity. If they are to be the ultimate judges of this matter, leave them an election. Do not impose upon them an institution which, however offensive it may be to them, they may not be able to get rid of if they would.

But the question recurs as to the expediency of the provision in the bill. It seems that the people of Oregon have established something like a temporary government for the preservation of peace and order until the legislation of Congress shall interpose.—By these regulations slavery is prohibited, and this bill, as it stands, gives the sanction of Congress to that prohibition. The proposition now is to strike out this provision, which virtually give effect to the action of the people of Oregon. Hon. Senators have emphatically claimed the right to disregard this prohibition and plant the institution of slavery in the territory, in despite of the action of Congress and the wishes of that people. But they have altogether, while pressing their claims, omitted to enumerate the blessings that are to flow from such a procedure. The moral, political and social blessings that are to spring from this institution in Oregon have not been described. We have not heard a syllable with respect to the aid that the people of Oregon are to derive from this institution in their career of civilization. The high and important influences which slavery is to exercise upon their prosperity and happiness have not been touched upon. This omission is certainly remarkable. If we are called upon to force this institution upon the people of the territories, let us know at least some of the benefits that are to grow out of it.

Sir, there are many reasons why slavery should not be planted there. The country is not adapted to such an institution. The soil, the climate, the character of the resources of the country, and I may add, that of the population likely to occupy it, all forbid its introduction. In what one particular can the people of the territory be benefitted by extending this institution there? But the question is, whether we shall force this institution upon them? Whatever effect you give to their laws, they may be regarded as expressing their sentiments and wishes. Are you prepared then, to impose upon the people who are just laying the foundations of their social fabric, an institution which they have thus solemnly repudiated. The honorable Senator from Georgia says that all the people of the South desire is to be let alone. All I ask on behalf of the people of Oregon is, that they should be left free to choose their own institutions. I would not obtrude upon them an institution which is offensive to them.

It is not my purpose to go into a discussion of the merits or demerits of the institution of slavery. I trust I indulge no fanaticism on the subject. I have no desire to display before the Senate its supposed horrors or to entertain honorable Senators with the thousand and one stories of its atrocities—all doubtless exaggerated, and many utterly false—which constitutes the aliment upon which fanaticism feeds. Much less am I disposed to impute it as reproach to the people of the South that this institution exists. It is an institution inherited from their fathers—entailed upon them—and whether they choose to retain or abandon it—whether it can be got rid of at all, and if so, how, are questions which I am willing to leave to the people of the South themselves as the persons most interested, and best qualified to judge. The vindication of the people of the South by the honorable Senator from Georgia, against the charges alluded to by him, was, so far as I am concerned, unnecessary. I am willing to add my testimony, that my observation, so far as it has gone, though it has not been very extensive, sustains all that he said on that point. I have found the condition of the slaves infinitely better than what I had supposed it to be.

But, sir, I choose to deal with this this subject not as a matter of reproach to the people of the South, not as a question of morals, but as a political question, of transcendant importance, to be determined by our legislation. In that point of view I regard it, and in that aspect I feel at liberty to discuss it. Sir, I am confident that I speak the sentiments of three-fourths of the people of this country, and of a very great proportion of the people of the slaveholding States, when I say that the institution itself is an evil and a curse. When I say that it is an evil of which they would get rid in a moment if they could do it with safety, I believe I speak the general sentiment of the slaveholding States. Very few men at the present day can be found willing to defend this institution, as in its origin and inception just or expedient. Who is there at this day, if the institution were not in existence amongst us, who would raise his voice in favor of the introduction of the first colored slave. Who, indeed, would not protest against it not only as an outrage upon humanity, and as incompatible with the fundamental principles of our institutions, but as introducing a political evil to endure to all generations, increasing in magnitude and in danger, the consequences and the termination of which no human sagacity can foresee. And yet, with this sentiment in relation to the institution pervading our people, we are called upon to extend it. The honorable Senator from Georgia seems to be alarmed at the idea of the institution being pent up in some of the old States. Why should it not be pent up? Where is the necessity of inflicting the institution—if gentlemen will pardon the phrase—on territories where it does not now exist? I can conceive of but one consideration which should excite anxiety in this particular, and that is the accumulation of the slave population and the necessity of a safety-valve to the increase of that population. If the institution is limited it is not necessary that the population should be pent up. Admitting the force of this consideration, the question results still—whether that increase, if it should be thrown off, should be thrown off upon the rest of the world as freemen or slaves? Shall they be sent forth in the character of freemen, to aid in the extension of civilization over our immense territorial domain, or shall they be sent as slaves, extending and perpetuating an institution acknowledged on all hands to be an evil? Will you let these men, created in the likeness of their Maker, go forth free—possessed of all the rights and advantages which the God of nature has bestowed upon us all—or will you send them forth as the representatives of this relic of a barbarous age, and the living monuments of the insincerity of your professions? Sir, I am opposed to this extension of an institution which I hold to be utterly at war with the opinions and moral sentiment of the age. The sense of the Christian world, and I may add of the civilized world, is universally against it. Shall we set set the example of perpetuating and extending an institution which the whole civilized world, with the exception of a portion of our own people, have combined to exterminate.

Sir, I desire to preserve something like consistency in our action. It is but a few weeks since, in this chamber, we passed resolutions of sympathy with the people of France, congratulating them upon the events that had transpired there. We have seen the throne demolished. We have seen aristocratic and hereditary distinctions, sanctioned by time, and venerable for age, abrogated. We have seen the masses rising in their might, and amid the throes of revolution, prostrating their arbitrary, and as they deemed them, tyrannical and oppressive institutions, and proclaiming the doctrines of universal liberty and political equality. Nay, more, we have seen the shackles stricken from the African, and as one of the first fruits of the revolution, the whole system of African slavery exterminated at a blow—fully, absolutely, and forever, in all the dominion of the new republic. And we raised aloud the voice of approbation and of sympathy. Yet, while the resolutions are yet floating to their destination, as if in mockery of our professions, our congratulations and our sympathy, we are engaged in extending the same system of African slavery over the immense region now subject to our dominion, and preparing the way for its further extension to our future acquisitions. While we are congratulating the world upon the progress of the great principles of human liberty, and the overthrow of ancient despotisms, shall we be called upon to propagate a system of slavery which reduces our fellow-man to the condition of a brute—which converts a being, created originally in the likeness of his Maker, into an article of merchandize, like the beast of the stall? Let us be consistent. Let us prove the sincerity of our professions by our action.

Sir, I have had occasion heretofore to express my alarm at the spirit of conquest and aggrandizement which has infatuated and debauched the country. Happily, for the present at least, that spirit has been quelled. How long it may slumber—how soon it may awake to covet new acquisitions—how soon it may seek to grasp Canada, or the West Indies, or the remainder of Mexico, time and the dispensations of Providence will disclose. But nothing, certainly, was further from my expectations than to find the Senate of the United States promulgating the doctrine that in our career of conquest, while professing to extend the area of freedom, we are in reality adding to our possessions only for the purpose of carrying slavery in our train, and planting this relic of barbarism wherever the stars and stripes may float in triumph.

Sir, I did not intend to detain the Senate so long. This controversy upon the subject of slavery is one which heretofore I have endeavored to avoid. I had cherished the hope that what is called the Missouri compromise might have proved effectual, to some extent at least, in the settlement of this agitating and troublesome question, and that in the end the threatening storm which still hangs over us might be averted. But if the compromise is to be undermined because the power to make it is denied—if the genius of slavery is to exalt itself above all power—if it is to intrude upon our territories without our leave and in defiance of our prohibition, a new issue is made, more difficult than any heretofore presented. If gentlemen are satisfied with the Missouri compromise, perhaps the country may be also satisfied. But if that is to be overthrown, and not only so, but if we are to be told that we can impose no prohibition, prescribe no boundary to this institution, the prospect of the settlement of this question is forever at an end. It can be adjusted and settled only when these arrogant and offensive pretensions are withdrawn.

Sir, I would gladly have remained silent on this subject, but after listening to the doctrines which have been advanced in this debate, I am driven to enter my solemn protest against them by an imperious sense of duty to myself and my constituency.

Mr. MASON obtained the floor; and Ordered. That the further consideration of the bill be postponed to Monday next.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriation for certain fortifications of the United States, for the year ending the 30th June, 1849, with the amendments reported thereto, and the reported amendments having been agreed to—

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved further to amend the bill by adding the following section:

"SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, or so much thereof as may be necessary, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in the improvement of the dam at the head of Cumberland Island, in the Ohio river."

Mr. ATHERTON opposed the amendment on the ground of its impropriety in such a bill as the present. It was very important that the Senate should act upon the bill at once.

Mr. BENTON supported the amendment. He felt it his bounden duty to call the attention of the Senate to the subject. They were now very near the close of the session, and they all knew that great measures were frequently lost at such a period merely because there was not time to give them a few moments consideration. The amendment proposed to remove an obstruction to the navigation of the Ohio river, which affected the commerce of the whole line, and which had been occasioned by an improvement made in that river by the power of the federal government. Both Houses of Congress, uniting with the Executive under various administrations, had sanctioned that improvement, and he held it to be decided that it was the work of the federal government. He then described, from personal observation, the very serious obstruction to navigation, occasioned by the present condition of the dam at Cumberland island and strongly insisted on the immediate action of Congress, for the purpose of repairing the injury, and remedying the delays and dangers arising from the dilapidated condition of that dam, frequently causing great sacrifice of property, and sometimes of human life.

He had himself been detained frequently in consequence of this obstruction. On one occasion, in which he was accompanied by his family, the passengers were all obliged to leave the boat, and wait until with very extraordinary exertions and the aid of other boats they were enabled to pursue their journey. He had in his hands a letter, written by a gentleman, worthy of credit, which described the serious injuries constantly occurring to the commerce of that river. It presented the Whole story in a mech more impressive manner than could be done by any language of his own, and he therefore begged to read it to the Senate.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to submit to you a brief statement of the substance of my information relative to the condition of the dam in the Ohio river, at Cumberland island, for the last two months, derived promptly from communications received from individuals entitled to the highest consideration, residing in the neighborhood of the great public nuisance, and very dangerous obstruction to the navigation of that important river. The re-sult of this information is, that ever since the latter part of April last, with occasional intervals of freshets of short duration, the navigation of the Ohio, at Cumberland island, by reason of the late breach in the dam at that place, has been partially and at times almost entirely suspended, except for flat boats and steamers of small size, and many of these latter have only been able to pass through the breach comparatively empty, and at great hazard. Since the breach in this dam was formed, caused by an extraordinary flood in the river, many steamers have been detained by this obstruction for near a week at a time, and at a cost of from five hundred to one thousand dollars, and as high as two thousand dollars each. Captain Shelmess, commander of the steamer Peytona, a gentleman of intelligence and great moral worth, who has been navigating the Ohio for more than thirty years, gives it as his opinion that during the summer of 1847 the dam at Cumberland island caused a loss to owners of steam and flat boats of a sum largely over one hundred thousand dollars. And this gentleman asserted to me that a single detention at this dam of the steamer Peytona, in the summer of 1847, caused to him a loss of over two thousand dollars, although the steamer was saved. The enclosed memorial sets forth the true condition of this public work for two years past, and is signed by more than ten thousand petitioners, living on or near the Ohio, who are well acquainted with this dangerous obstruction to the commerce and navigation of this great river.

In low water there is no safe channel for boats navigating the Ohio, except through this dangerous breach; and on account of the frightful rapidity of the current rushing through it, dashing over the rugged and projecting rocks, it is often found utterly impossible for steamers having engines of moderate power to stem this current without the aid and assistance of larger boats, having greater power, stationed above the dam to row them through by means of large cables.

Many flat boats, freighted with ponderous cargoes, descending the river, and attempting to pass through this dangerous breach, are totally lost, leaving oftentimes the unfortunate owners wholly bankrupt, to bewail their losses, without the consolation of knowing that a single tribunal in the country will hear their humble petition for redress against the power that created the nuisance, and thereby destroyed their hopes and their fortune.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

P. C. LANDER.

Hon. THOS H. BENTON

The honorable Senator remarked that he could corroborate every word of the letter, and concluded by an earnest appeal to the Senate, in favor of the immediate adoption of measures for the removal of this dangerous obstruction to the navigation o f the western waters, which had been created by the federal government.

Mr. CLAYTON had nothing to say in opposition to the views of the Senator from Missouri in relation to the result of the improvement at Cumberland Island. He was himself favorable to the improvement of rivers and harbors; but this was a fortification bill, and he could not see any propriety in appending to it the amendment which had been proposed. The fortifications and defences of the country had been signally neglected for many years past, and this was the first bill which had been proposed for a long period providing for putting them into a proper condition, and preventing them from going to ruin. The effect of inserting the amendment must be manifest to all who heard him. Other propositions of a similar character would follow. If the amendment were successful, he should at once move a proposition to improve the harbors of his own State. The Senator from Maryland said he would do the same thing, and thus they would have a harbor bill and fortification bill combined; leading inevitably to the defeat of a measure in the necessity of which all agreed—the improvement and preservation of the fortifications of the country.—All were aware that the Executive would veto the bill if it provided for the improvement of rivers and harbors. He made no objection to the proposition of the Senator in itself. He was a friend of internal improvements, and had voted for improvements on that very river; but this was not the occasion to present such a proposition. He trusted it would not receive the approbation of the Senate, unless it was designed to defeat the passage of the bill.

Mr. BELL earnestly hoped that the amendment would be added to the bill. The dam for the improvement of which the appropriation was asked, was daily presenting fresh and dangerous obstructions to the navigation of the Ohio river. It had been urged by the Senator from Delaware, that the bill should be appended to an general improvement bill. This could not be done because they had none; neither could it be expected that there would be any. It was then said put it to some other more appropriate bill. This could not be done because the navy, the army, and the diplomatic appropriation bills had all been passed; and allowing that they had not, this was as appropriate a bill, he thought, as any to which it could be attached. If it was not appended to this bill, it could not be attached to any other bill this session: and to let the bill go by itself would be to have it laid by until the next session, inasmuch as the House would never be able to reach it upon the calendar before the time for the regular adjournment. It was because it was absolutely necessary that the appropriation should be made this session, that he had pressed the attachment of the bill to the appropriation bill for fortifications. If it were not made, the river would not be entirely free from obstruction until the next two years had elapsed. If they did not get the appropriation until the coming winter, they would have to wait until the succeeding summer before the improvements could be made, and it would not be until the following year that the obstructions would be entirely removed. The government had created the obstruction in this river, and it ought to remove it. For this simple reason he could not think that the President would veto the bill. Gentlemen who felt an interest in the fortification bill, need not suppose that it was in danger because of this proposed appendage of a bill for the removal of an obstruction in river navigation. Allowing that the President should find himself under the necessity of vetoing it, they could by a suspension of the rules in both Houses, pass the bill by a large majority in twenty-four hours after its rejection by him. The Senator from Delaware had said that if this bill was to be appended to the fortification bill, that there were some improvements to be made in the harbors of his State, which he thought extremely necessary, and for which he should desire to bring in a bill and have attached to the bill of appropriations for fortifications. He would ask the Senator from Delaware to contrast the importance of the improvements he desired made, and that contemplated by the passage of the bill before them. In the case of this obstruction proposed to be remedied, the commerce and navigation of the entire West was threatened with an almost total suspension. He hoped Senators would take into grave consideration the importance of the improvements contemplated, and would attach the amendment appropriating the requisite amount for the construction of that improvement, to the fortification appropriation bill then under consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD wanted to call the attention of the Senate to what he considered a new feature in the legislation of the country. He referred to the appropriation of some forty thousand dollars asked for at the 63d line of the bill, for the construction of a sea wall upon an island which the government did not own. The bill also stated on the face of the appropriation, that not a dollar could be expended until the government had procured a title to the property upon which the fortifications were to be built. In regard to the amendment then under discussion which he had proposed to the fortification bill, he would say that he regarded it as appropriate an opportunity as could be offered for doing it this session. It was indispensably necessary that it be attached to some appropriation bill this session, or it would be laid over until the next.

Mr. ATHERTON observed that the appropriation alluded to by the Senator from Kentucky was an appropriation for the completion of fortifications in Boston harbor; and the sea wall proposed to be built around the island was recommended by the engineer of the military department of the government as necessary, in order to keep the island from being washed away, and to the completion of the defences for Boston harbor. The improvement contemplated in this bill was in strict accordance with the plan for fortifications in Boston harbor originally laid out. In regard to the amendment, embracing a bill for appropriations for internal improvement, he considered it as out of place in a bill for appropriations for fortifications. If they departed from the principle upon which the Senate had hitherto acted in this matter, it would lead to great confusion.—Each appropriation bill that would be presented would become but the omnibus for the passage through of bills of a totally dissimilar character. It was said this was a case sui generis—so important as to authorize departure from a general rule. The Senate was called upon to pass a bill containing it, in the expectation that if sent to the House by itself, it would not be taken up. How did they know that the House would not take it up? If it was of such pressing importance it was not to be presumed that the House would so far neglect its duty to its constituents as not to give it the necessary consideration it was entitled to. How did we know but that the House of Representatives would insert amendments recommending other internal improvements when sent back; and thus we would have a general system of internal improvements engrafted upon a system for the defence of the country—for the construction of fortifications. He would have the bill pass upon its merits, and not forced upon the House of Representatives by being appended to another bill totally different in its general nature. This was the only way, he thought, that our legislation could be preserved uncorrupted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, asserted, that judging from the opinion laid down by the President in his veto messages, he was authorized to say that this bill, if it went to the President with the amendment for an appropriation for internal improvement annexed to it, would be rejected, and receive his veto. Inasmuch, then, as Mr. Polk, after a careful and thorough examination of the subject, was satisfied that the general government had no power to improve rivers in the United States, and had told us that we had no power to improve rivers, it was perfectly idle to inquire what was the cause that rendered it necessary to make such improvements, whether it was the act of God or of this government. Rivers must remain unnavigable, because the President had said that this government had no power to remove obstructions. This was the condition of things in which this country had been placed by its Chief Magistrate; but he felt bound to say, that if, when presented to the suffrages of the people in '44, he had proclaimed his opinions upon this subject in the manner that he had in his veto messages, he would never have been vouchsafed the opportunity to defeat, by his action, measures of such public importance as the one then before them. Many of those who had worked hardest to secure his election were opposed to his views upon this subject, and in favor of the bills he had vetoed. The amendment, as was evident on its face, was not congruous to the fortification bill; and must certainly lead to its rejection by the President.

Mr. DOWNS knew by practical observation the necessity of the improvements to be made by the passage of the amendment. When before the Senate on a previous occasion he had voted for the bill. He thought it should become a law, and that it was an exception to a general rule. Nevertheless, he was not in favor of forcing legislation upon either of the Houses of Congress. He thought that the House of Representatives and the President of the United States were as much entitled to their opinions upon the question as the Senate. He could not favor the idea of forcing this bill upon them in the form of an amendment to a bill of an entirely different character. Supposing that it was desirable that the improvement in the navigation of this river should be made, when the Senate had passed the bill, they had done all they could to remedy the evil. The attachment of the amendment to the bill as proposed, could not fail, he thought, to lead to other similar amendments which would lead to great confusion and embarrassment in the public business.

Mr. BELL remarked that he did not desire to force the bill either upon the House of Representatives or the President. He had advocated the attachment of the amendment to the fortification bill, merely on account of the peculiar and pressing necessity of the case, that the appropriation should be made this session. He had not the least doubt but that it could pass upon its merits, but he did not think it could be reached on the calendar of the House if it stood alone this session.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, asked for the reading of the amendment.

The amendment was read by the Secretary.

Mr. DAVIS then stated that when the question was before the Senate previously he was entirely in favor of repairing the dam. He regarded the dam as a nuisance, and he thought it would be cheaper to repair than to remove it. But when it came before the Senate in the form of an amendment to an appropriation bill, with which it had not the slightest possible connection, he felt constrained to vote against it. He fervently hoped that if the bill should pass with the amendment, that one of the last and crowning acts of the President's career would be a veto of the whole bill.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Benton, Bright, Clarke, Corwin, Huntegan, Johnson, of Louisiana, and Underwood.—9.

NAYS.—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Berrien, Bradbury, Butler, Cameron, Clarion, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Downs, Fitch, Foote, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, Hunter, Jarnagin, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, Mangum, Mason, Niles, Phelps, Sebastian, Spruance, Stuigeon, Turney, Upham, and Yulee.—30.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, moved to amend the bill by striking out the following:

"For the protection of Great Brewster island and defence of the principal ship channels into the harbor of Boston, Massachusetts, forty thousand dollars: Provided, That no portion of said sum of forty thousand dollars shall be expended for the above purposes, until the United States shall secure a good and valid title to so much of Great Brewster island as may be necessary in the construction of the proposed fortification."

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, remarked that he had moved to strike out this portion of the bill for the reason that it was not rightfully a part of the necessary appropriations for fortifications. The island proposed to be fortified was not the property of the United States. The price of the property, too, would be enhanced by the very appropriation we were making. He considered it premature to make any such appropriation. The present low condition of the treasury also should be considered.

Mr. DIX explained the object of the appropriation, and stated that there was a provision in the law making it incumbent upon the United States to acquire a title to the island, before expending any thing upon it for fortifications. He was in favor of the retention of the clause making the appropriation.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, stated that the recommendation for the appropriation came from the government itself. For a few years past he knew from his own observation, that the sea had made great inroads upon this island, some 100 or 150 feet having been washed away, filling up the ship's channel that ran between it and the island opposite where fortifications were already built. The sea wall proposed to be built would preserve the island and contribute to the defence of the harbor. It was a portion of the original plan of the government in laying out the fortification of that harbor. If the island was swept away, the Senator from Mississippi—being a military man—could readily perceive that it would greatly deteriorate from the strength of the fortifications; and obstruct the ship channel running between the two islands.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts that the fortification and improvement suggested were necessary, but thought that the United States had better wait until it had obtained posssession of the island; and then they could make an appropriation to protect their own property.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, thought that the Senator from Mississippi did not make a proper discrimination, or had not noticed that the improvements contemplated were a part of the original plan for the defence of the harbor. He did not think that the title alluded to could be made a question of much controversy, inasmuch as the United States were not to expend a cent upon the island until they had secured the title to it.

Mr. ATHERTON briefly supported the retention of the appropriation in the bill.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Benton, Bright, Butler, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Downs, Fitch, Foote, Hunnegan, Houston, Johnson, of Georgia, Mason, Sebastian, Turney, Yulee—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Badger, Bell, Bradbury, Cameron, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Dayton, of Massachusetts, Dix, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Jonnson, of Louisiana, Niles, Phelps, Spaunce, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham—22.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following amendment:

"For the commencement of a fortification proposed to be constructed at Proctor's Landing on Lake Borgne, Louisiana, $20 000."

Mr. JOHNSON explained the necessity of a fortification at Proctor's Landing, and stated that Colonel Totten, who is at the head of the engineer corps, had recommended an appropriation for the purpose.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, it was determined in the negative.

No other amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendments concurred in.

Ordered, That the amendment be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass, with amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

REPEAL OF THE PILOT LAWS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to repeal the act of the 2d March, 1837, entitled "An act concerning pilots."

Mr. DIX.—Mr. President: On a former occasion I said to the Senate all I desire to say in relation to the legal questions involved in this bill. I shall not, therefore, repeat what I said then, or enter into any new assignment or discussion of objections arising out of the powers of Congress over the subject of regulating pilotage in the States. But I am constrained by the remarks which were made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] and the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER,] to enter into a somewhat detailed history of the pilot question in New York. I regret that I am compelled to do so, because it has become, in some degree, a dissention between classes, involving private interests; and these are always subjects which I wish to avoid, when I can do so consistently with my duty to the public.

I have stated heretofore that the pilots of New York, in 1836, had entered into an agreement to share equally their joint receipts, and that this combination had led to a relaxation of their accustomed vigilance in looking out for vessels and taking them into port. In consequence of some disasters which occurred, the public attention was called to the defects of the system of pilotage existing in New York. In the annual message of the Governor of the State, on the 3d Jan. 1837, he brought the subject before the Legislature. On the following day select committees were appointed in both branches. On the 11th of February, a bill was reported by the chairman of the select committee in the house of assembly; and after a very thorough discussion in committee of the whole, the bill was reported to the house by a vote of 91 to 7, on the 8th of March. It was subsequently read a third time and passed by a vote of 85 to 5. In the Senate the bill was received on the 14th of March, referred to the select committee of that body, and reported with amendments which were concurred in; but in consequence of the pressure of important busines, it was not passed until the 6th of April. I state these facts to show the deliberation with which the Legislature of the State of New York acted on this important question. The number of pilots was increased, a careful system of examination was established, combinations were guarded against, and all the known and alledged evils of the system were provided for by appropriate remedies, or remedies at least which were considered appropriate and effectual.

The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] in his remarks seemed to assume that the New York pilots of 1848 are answerable for the acts of those of 1835 and 1836. and the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER,] who followed him, made some allusion to them which appears to warrant the same inference. But if those gentlemen will consider how rapidly the lapse of years is thinning the ranks of their own friends and associates, they will not be surprised to learn that the great enemy has been busy with the pilots also. Of the sixty pilots following the business in 1837, there are but twenty-nine now engaged in piloting. More than half have perished at sea, died on shore, or become disqualified by age for the arduous service in which they were engaged. The number of New York pilots holding branches under the laws of the State, is eighty; and of these fifty one have been appointed since the State law of 1837 was passed. Whatever responsibility, therefore, belongs to the pilots of 1836 has, for the most part, gone with them to be met at a higher tribunal than this. I state these facts that the Senate may understand why it will be proper to deal with systems and not with men.

The haste manifested in passing the act of Congress of 1837, of which we ask for the repeal, stands in strong contrast with the legislation of New York. Let me recite the facts as briefly as possible.

By the Senate journal of 1836-'7, it will be seen that a resolution was introduced on the 12th of January, by Mr. Tallmadge of New York, instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of legislating on the subject of pilots on the sea coast, with power to report by bill or otherwise. This resolution was adopted; the Committee on Commerce consisted of the following distinguished gentlemen: Mr. King of Alabama, chairman, Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, Mr. Linn, of Missouri, Mr. Brown, of North Carolina, and Mr. Ruggles, of Maine. The committee, though they had ample time for deliberation, never made a report on the resolution.

On the 28th day of February, the last day of the month, Mr. Wall, of New Jersey, introduced a bill on notice. It was instantly read the first and second time, reported to the Senate, and immediately read a third time—the work probably of as much time as I take to give the details.

But, sir, it is necessary that we should accompany the bill through all the stages of its course. It was received in the House on the 28th of February, the day it passed the Senate, (House journal, page 552,) and on the next day received its proper number of readings and passed. On the 2d of March, it received the President's signature, and became the law of the land.

Nor is this all. The subject had been referred to a committee in the House early in that session. The committee made an elaborate report on the 22d of February, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. In the face of this proceeding the bill was passed, and in the summary way I have stated.

It is as remarkable a specimen of the dispatch of business—business involving a question of constitutional power, and bringing in its train collisions between individuals, and classes, and States—as can be met with. It was hurried, or rather rushed, through Congress, almost at the last hour of its session; indeed, almost at the last hour of its existence.

I have heretofore told the Senate that the Legislature of New York, after becoming satisfied that the act of Congress operated injuriously on the pilots of that State, and after waiting eight years for its repeal, came to the conclusion to repeal her own laws regulating pilotage by way of Sandy Hook, the great outlet and inlet for the foreign commerce of the country, providing only that the pilots then licensed should continue to be pilots. It has been alleged that the New York pilots were applicants to the Legislature for the repeal. This is a mistake. They appealed to the Legislature of the State to—

> To ascertain and determine whether the aforesaid act of Congress does or does not lie, and the legislative power of the federal government, and whether the acts executed under the authority of the laws of the State of New Jersey by the officers of that State, are or are not in violation of the sovereignty of the State of New York, and in contempt of her laws."

It is true, they acquiesced in the repeal of the State laws, and desired it as an alternative, if they could not procure the repeal of the act of Congress. The latter object was always what they sought. Failing in it, they consented to the repeal of the State laws—a measure proposed by the mercantile interest. The pilots believed it would place them on an equal footing with the pilots of New Jersey. It was under this view of the subject, that the New York pilots, on consultation with the mercantile interest, the Chamber of Commerce and Board of Underwriters consented to it. Such appears to be the fact from the petition to the legislature, and the debate on the bill. It was supposed that it would open a fair field of competition to them and the New Jersey pilots, and that their fitness and industry would be the measure of their success.

As soon, however, as the State laws were repealed, the Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Underwriters organized a board of commissioners to examine pilots and give them certificates. Nor was this all. They published a notice, which I will read, calling on the ship masters not to receive a pilot unless he could produce a certificate from them or the State of New Jersey.

> "It is recommended that no vessel receive a pilot, except on her producing a certificate issued by the above board, or those issued under the authority of the State of New Jersey."

This measure was a virtual proscription of the New York pilots, unless they would consent to receive the certificates of this irresponsible board, and acknowledge its authority. It was not to be supposed that they would discredit the licenses they held under the laws of the State by receiving the certificates of a board organized without any legal authority whatever—certificates, which could confer no authority on those to whom they were given.—Was it reasonable to expect them to do so? Certainly not. They possessed in the State licenses the highest warrants of authority. They required nothing more: they should not have been asked to take less.

Though the Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Underwriters have no legal control over the subject of pilotage, their actual control is very great. They represent and indeed wield the commercial influence of the City of New York. The ship masters are subject, in a great degree, to that influence, and hence the recommendation had in many cases the efficacy of a command. It was literally warning the public against employing the New York pilots, though trained from their youth to their vocation, unless they, holding the State authority in their hands, would consent to receive certificates from an irresponsible board having no legal power to grant them. What was the effect? Was it to break up a monopoly—the great evil of which the public complained? The New York pilots were 82 in number; the New Jersey pilots 17; and the merchants' board as it is called, soon after these regulations were published, granted certificates to 16 persons. If the recommendation had been acted on, the whole pilotage of the city would have been given to 33 persons, and 82 persons would have been excluded from all participation in it. But it was not generally acted on. With all the weight it carried with it, the New York pilots continued to be, and are still extensively employed, though, as I shall show, they have felt severely the effect of the invidious distinction, which has been made between them and others.

I will now proceed to state in detail the consequences, which have resulted from the act of Congress; for it is to this act that all the difficulty which exists, is to be traced.

1. There has not been a fair competition. The ship-owners, who represent a considerable portion of the active commercial capital of the city, have contributed to make it unequal. In the first place, the regulation I have quoted has had its influence. The New York pilots are passed by, and the New Jersey and merchants pilots as they are called, are employed in preference—not because the latter are more competent, but because they are considered as prefered by the mercantile classes, on whom the ship masters are often dependent for employment. The injustice of the regulation is more distinctly seen in a practice, which has grown up under it, and become very extensive, of taking a vessel brought in by a New York pilot out of his hands, and giving her to a New Jersey or merchants' pilot to take out.

It may be proper to say that in every State, of which I have been able to examine the laws, and in which those laws are passed with a view to equality, a pilot bringing in a vessel, or a pilot belonging to the same boat, has the privilege of taking the vessel out. The reason is obvious. The inward pilotage is often hazardous and laborious. Vessels are sometimes boarded two hundred miles at sea. Pilots are often out a week or ten days in pursuit of them. They are to be brought into port in all weathers. But the outward pilotage is always easy. Vessels go to sea in fair weather only. The pilot takes his charge a few miles from shore and leaves her. There is no labor, no hazard, and but little responsibility in it. Nothing can be more unjust, more repugnant to every principle of fairness and liberality, than to take from a pilot a vessel he has brought in, and give her to another to take out. It is in fact only by taking a vessel out, that a pilot can be compensated for the labor of bringing her in. Accordingly, this privilege is usually secured by law. The laws of Massachusetts for instance, provide that the pilot who brought in a vessel (or one belonging to the same boat) is entitled to take her out. In like manner the laws of South Carolina provide, that "every pilot taking a vessel in has the exclusive right to take her out," except in case of misbehaviour, &c.

Let us see what has been the operation of the system in New York since the act of Congress passed. That act authorizes a pilot from New York or New Jersey to be employed to pilot a vessel to or from New York. It leaves it optional with the master of a vessel to employ the same pilot, who brought in a vessel, to take her out, or to employ another pilot; and here the regulation of the Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Underwriters comes in, recommending him to employ no pilot not certified by their board or licensed by New Jersey, excluding the eighty New York pilots. The consequence may be readily seen. I hold in my hand several lists of vessels brought in by New York pilots and given to New Jersey or merchants' pilots to take out again. The names of the vessels are given as well as the time of the transactions. There is also a list of vessels taken out by the merchants' pilots, which they did not bring in. This list is furnished by the secretary of the board of commissioners, and is under his own hand. The pilotage on these vessels amounted to $3038,53, and must have been taken from the New York pilots. There are in addition, lists of 148 vessels taken from the New York pilots during a portion of the years 1846, and 1847, and given to other pilots to take out again. Even these lists are not complete. There were numerous cases which were omitted for want of precise information. The average pilotage for each vessel are estimated at $25. They are probably a little more—certainly not less. At this rate, the amount taken from the New York pilots on the vessels above mentioned, and by violating a rule of universal justice, is $6,688.

These facts are proved by unquestionable evidence. In the year 1844, before the merchants' pilots were appointed, it appears by a "remonstrance of the underwriters of the port of New York," Doc. No. 60, House of Representatives, 1st session, 29th Congress, that the New York pilots brought in 1992 vessels, and took out 1610—a difference of 382, the pilotage on which must have amounted to $9,650. By the same return it appears that the New York pilots, 84 in number, piloted in and out 3,602 vessels, or 44 vessels each pilot, giving them, at $25 per vessel, $1,112 50 each, to pay the expenses of their boats and maintain their families on shore. It also appears that the New Jersey pilots, 17 in number, piloted in and out 1,131 vessels, giving them at $25 per vessel, $1,663 23 each, or $550 73 each more than the New York pilots. A very considerable portion of this difference is owing to the open manner in which the New York pilots have been discouraged by the board of commissioners.

I have stated these facts, Mr. President, in justice to the New York pilots, who have been charged by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] and the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER,] with sinister motives in coming to Congress to ask for a repeal of the act of 2d March, 1837. I have felt it due to them to show that they are laboring under a serious disability, and are the objects of a most invidious distinction under the operation of this act.

But I proceed to other considerations:

2. One of the great complaints against the system in force previous to 1837, was that pilots would not go to sea in search of vessels, but waited at Sandy Hook to receive them. This evil has been remedied; but it has been followed both by inconveniences and injustice, which, perhaps, fully counterbalance it. I will first state the inconvenience. Pilots now go far out to sea in quest of vessels. It is not an uncommon thing for a pilot to present himself 200 miles from New York. Now, there is no particular advantage in this. It may be safely said that no vessel requires or wishes a pilot at a greater distance than 20 or 25 miles from Sandy Hook. If a pilot gets on board a vessel one or two hundred miles from New York, he does not take charge of her. She is ordinarily given to him when she comes in sight of land. It is not every pilot who is capable of taking charge of a vessel out of sight of land and carrying her into port. The consequence of the present over-active competition is that the pilot boats go to sea, vessels constantly pass them, and on reaching Sandy Hook they find no pilots. At the very place where they are most wanted they are often not to be found. I shall refer to an honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] to know whether, on arriving at Sandy Hook in the Great Western, that vessel was not detained because no pilot could be found. I will read some notes from the log-book of the United States' light-ship off Sandy Hook, showing that it is a very common occurrence for vessels to arrive there and be detained for want of pilots. There are over 70 cases on the abstract of the log-book, which I hold in my hand; and in addition, the captain of the ship states on one occasion that there was "a large number of vessels in sight wanting pilots;" on another that "several vessels near us want pilots;" and that there were many other cases which he saw himself, and of which no entry was made in the log-book. While, therefore, the active competition in piloting has corrected one evil, it has produced another.

And now, sir, I will state the injustice of the system. Under the laws of New York and New Jersey, and I believe under the laws of most other States, if a pilot boards a vessel beyond a certain distance from the land, he is entitled to 25 per cent. in addition to his established fees. In New York this distance is some 15 miles outside of the Sandy Hook light. This is called off-shore pilotage, and was intended as a compensation for the extra labor and inconvenience of the pilot. When there was a legally established system, it could be exacted. Now it cannot, and ship-owners and masters knowing this, refuse to pay it. This remark is not of universal application, but the practice is becoming very general. It is believed that four-fifths of the vessels refuse to pay the off-shore pilotage. They are willing the pilot should go 100 or 200 miles to sea; but they are unwilling to pay him the customary addition to his fees. If he presents himself, the first question is, "do you charge off-shore pilotage?" And if he refuses to give it up, the ship refuses to take him. Or if no bargain is made with him, he is required to deduct it when the vessel goes out, or she is given to another person. Under such a system he has no legal security, either for just or liberal treatment.

3. The active competition which has grown out of the existing system, and which would have grown up without the act of Congress under the State law of New York, has not had the effect of securing commerce against shipwrecks and other disasters. I very much doubt whether they have been at all diminished in number. The cases of the Mexico and the Bristol were extraordinary occurrences. They happened at an inclement season, and even if the old system had been continued, such disasters might not have occurred again in half a century. Since that time there have been shipwrecks equally disastrous, except in the loss of life. Some of the property in the Bristol and Mexico was saved; and the deaths which occurred in the Mexico were not from drowning, but from frost—the passengers who were emigrants, having been driven to the deck in a winter's night of unparallelled severity.

I hold in my hand a list of 220 vessels stranded, run aground, or wrecked from April, 1839, to March, 1846—seven years—all under the new system. Of this number over 30 were a total loss—and 22 were engaged in foreign commerce. Some of these shipwrecks were of a most distressing character, on account of the loss of life, with which they were attended. The ship John Minturn, for instance, went ashore on Squam Beach about fifteen miles from Sandy Hook, the captain and his family, the pilot, and thirty-eight others having perished together, and the ship and cargo were totally lost. On the score of property it was probably a heavier loss than that of the Bristol or Mexico.

I have another list of 111 vessels stranded, run aground, or wrecked from February, 1846, commencing where the other list terminated, to the 14th January, 1848—say two years. Of this number 24 were a total loss, a large increase in the ratio compared with former years; and nine were engaged in foreign commerce. In the first seven years above-named, the vessels totally lost amounted to nearly five per annum. During the last two years they have been twelve per annum—more than doubled, though the increase of the commerce of the city has been in a much lower proportion.

I state these facts to show that security to property and life has not increased under the existing system, whatever opinions may be expressed to the contrary. It is true, I have not been able to make comparisons with the period preceding 1837 for want of data. There is, however, an account by Capt. Earl, who was adduced as a witness against the New York pilots, and who stated in 1835 that he had enumerated from memory 39 vessels totally lost within a "few years." The number of years is left to conjecture, but upon the most unfavorable supposition, the loss could not have exceeded that of the last two years.

I have also felt myself called on to make this statement to meet the declaration of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] that "shipwrecks in the neighborhood of that harbor are almost unknown," a declaration which he would not have ventured to make, if he had taken time to investigate the facts with his usual care and discrimination.

From what I have said it will be apparent that the whole control of the subject of pilotage is in the hands of the ship-owners and ship-masters, without legal regulation. The master of a vessel may take any pilot he pleases—he may bargain for the amount of pilot fees—he may, after having taken a pilot two hundred miles at sea when coming in, give his vessel to another pilot to take out. The pilot himself has no security either that the customary fees will be paid him, or that he will have the preference in taking out a vessel he has brought in. He is, in fact, wholly dependent on the ship-owner or ship-master. Is this right?

I believe, Mr. President, that the best systems of pilotage are those which are under the most rigid regulation. The defect of the system in New York is that there is no law—no systematic government or rules. Nor can there be while a master of a vessel is allowed to take a pilot from two different States. It is impossible to enforce prohibitions or commands in one State, when there is a competition between different classes holding warrants or licenses from two separate authorities, neither of which is responsible to the other.

The Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Underwriters have by establishing rules themselves, confessed the necessity of legal regulation. They have no authority to enforce the rules they have adopted, and those rules are not enforced. They fixed the rates of pilotage according to the standard established by the law of New York, which had been repealed; but these rates are not uniformly paid. The pilots are constantly obliged to take less in order to obtain employment. Pilots are required to board the nearest vessel under a penalty of $50; but there is no power to enforce the penalty. The commissioners are authorized by the regulations to impose fines; but it is a perfectly nominal authority. Off-shore pilotage is allowed by their regulations; but vessels, as has been seen, in most instances, refuse or evade the payment, because there is no legal authority to exact it.

If a pilot offers his services to the eastward of the white buoy, about three miles from Sandy Hook, and is refused, he is entitled to half pilotage; but it is never paid, because the commissioners had no power to make such a regulation. They have no authority whatever. Their regulations are a dead letter. All the control there is rests upon the commercial influence wielded by the commissioners and the ship owners.

I believe this state of things to be radically wrong. The reasons for subjecting the business of pilotage to legal regulation seem to me urgent and unanswerable. Let me advert to a single one. The entries and clearances of foreign vessels at New York exceed 1,100 per annum. They are entirely dependent on a judicious system of pilotage for their safety. The regular traders may know the pilot boats, and sometimes may make selections. But strange vessels, without this knowledge, will naturally take the first pilot who presents himself. They can have no knowledge of his qualifications: they are entirely at his mercy; and it is only by a proper system of regulation, under an undivided authority, that we can do justice to the vast foreign commerce, which centres in the city of New York. The act of Congress is the only obstacle to the establishment of such a system. If it were repealed, I am entirely satisfied that a system could be adopted, in concurrence with the mercantile classes, which would meet the views and interests of all and secure every public object.

But, to pursue this point a little further, the New York merchants are not the only parties in interest. New York is the centre of commerce for the whole Union. Foreign countries, as I have already shown, have also a deep interest in the matter—an interest which we have no right to subject to the control, without law, of a single class. It is due to the country that the system of pilotage for the great emporium of the Union should be made efficient by judicious regulation, instead of being thrown open to unrestrained competition. The interests at stake are too important; not property alone, but human life is concerned. I am not aware that there is any commercial country, which intrusts the business of piloting to open competition. It is one of the few matters in which regulation has always been deemed indispensable. Strongly impressed as I am with the importance of freeing commerce and navigation, as far as possible, from all shackles and restrictions,

I cannot, on the fullest reflection, bring my mind to the conclusion that pilotage should be without law.

But there is another consideration. Those who now control pilotage in New York to a great extent, have an interest adverse to the pilots. Their interest is to have piloting done cheap. Bargains are frequently made, and the pilot is compelled to take less than the customary rates—less than the rates fixed as reasonable and just by the Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Underwriters. The tendency of this state of things is to drive the best pilots into other employments, and to introduce an inferior class of men in their place. And from the best judgment I have been able to form, I cannot but think, that if this state of things continues until the present stock of well-trained pilots pass off the stage, New York, instead of having pilots equal to the best in any country, will have the worst.

I am not quite certain, Mr. President, that the interest of insurers is so very decidedly in favor of the highest degree of security to property afloat, as the Senator from Massachusetts supposes. Insurance is regulated by the hazards. The rates are high when the hazard is great, and they are low when the hazard is small. Now, I believe it may be said with safety that the rates of insurance rise in a ratio higher than that of the increase of hazard; and that the profits of insurance are greatest when the security is least. I speak in respect to the operation of principles, and not in respect to motives of action; not only for the purpose of explaining why a very defective system of pilotage might exist without prejudice to insurers.

The Senator from Massachusetts has said that the mercantile interest generally is in favor of the present system, and he intimates pretty strongly that there is not a merchant in New York who is not opposed to the repeal. Now, I can assure the Senator that the memorials from New York asking for the repeal of the act of Congress signed by some 5,000 persons, contain the names of several highly respectable merchants, besides a large number of shipmasters and ship-owners. I can also assure him that I have conversed with some of the most respectable ship-masters who sail from New York, and who believe the present system tends to degrade the pilots, and to render life and property insecure. It is no doubt true that the merchants generally are opposed to the repeal: 1st, for reasons I have stated; and 2d, because it has been industriously circulated by interested persons that the object of the repeal is to establish the old monopoly. The Senator from Massachusetts twice said so; and I regretted to hear it. He has been deceived. There is not a shadow of foundation for the charge. It is this belief which has produced so much hostility to the repeal; and I regret that my honorable friend from Massachusetts should have fallen into so great an error. Let me state a few facts:

The New York pilots assented, in 1846, to the creation of a board of commissioners of three persons, one to be chosen by the Board of Underwriters, one by the Chamber of Commerce, and one by themselves, to regulate the whole business of pilotage. They offered to take into the association of pilots all those now licensed by New Jersey and the merchants' pilots, if found qualified on examination. This proposition contemplated a repeal of the act of Congress and the establishment of a system of pilotage by State legislation. The agent of those two bodies was understood to give his assent to it in this city; and I supposed the matter would be satisfactorily adjusted. But on his return to New York, they refused to accede to it. The pilots agreed that the mercantile interest should have two to one of the commissioners, a complete control, provided they could have legal regulation. Under the existing system this interest has the control without legal regulation. This is the issue joined between the parties. The New York pilots desire no monopoly. They do not ask even for control. They ask only legal protection, for rights universally acknowledged to be just.

The Senator from Massachusetts also stated as his belief, that the papers in his possession showed no persons connected with the shipping interest of the country, except the pilots, desired the repeal of the act of Congress. I have shown this to be a mistake. I might go on and say that two sovereign States have complained of it as injurious to great public interests. But if it were true that none but the pilots desired the repeal of the law, would it be a reason why Congress should turn a deaf ear to their appeal? May not any individual, or any class of individuals fairly appeal to Congress for protection against the operation of its own enactments, when they are oppressive or injurious to the party appealing? I have always supposed it to be the peculiar duty of Congress to see that in the enactment of laws individual rights were not improperly affected. The only question is how far those rights shall give way to great public interests. And, sir, I insist that on the application of the pilots alone, asking for the repeal of an act which has proved oppressive to them, it would have been the duty of Congress to look into the facts, and to grant the prayer of the petitioners, unless high public considerations rendered it improper. But, as I have already said, the pilots are not the only complainants. Numerous and respectable classes of citizens unite with them; and the legislatures of two States remonstrate against the act of Congress either as oppressive or as injurious to the public interest, which it was designed to secure.

I cannot dismiss this part of the subject without saying that I entertain for the merchants of the city of New York the highest respect. In enterprise, intelligence in commercial matters, and in an honorable discharge of their pecuniary obligations, they are unsurpassed by any any class of men in this country or any other. When I took my seat in this body, it was with an earnest desire to contribute my humble efforts to the promotion of the commercial interest of the country, which I thought had not received all the notice to which it was entitled; and it is to this subject more than any other that I have devoted myself. I shall continue to do so. But in this matter of the pilots, I am constrained to differ from what seems to be the general opinion among the merchants of New York. And yet I am entirely satisfied that if we understood each other, there would be little difference between us. I do not think the great body of the merchants have looked into the subject critically. I have inquired of many of them why they were opposed to the repeal of the act of Congress; and I have received the same answer in every case—"because we are opposed to the re-establishment of the old monopoly." And when I have rejoined, that I was equally opposed to such a measure, that I was in favor of placing the whole subject of pilotage for the city of New York under legal regulation, and leaving the administration of the system in the hands of the Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Underwriters, their representatives. I do not recollect an instance in which they have not acquiesced in the propriety of the suggestion. What I have insisted on is legal control, to be exercised by those who have a practical knowledge of the subject. But I am unwilling to leave it even in their hands without legal control—if for no other reason—because there is no power to enforce proper regulations or punish their infraction. And I do not hesitate to say, if the merchants will look into this question, that there will be a general concurrence in the propriety of the measure I propose. It is possible I may be deceived; but if am—if they shall continue to differ with me in opinion—one assurance I shall still retain—that they will do me the justice to believe I am actuated solely by what I consider the true interests of the city and the country at large.

One word in conclusion. My suggestion in respect to a system of pilotage in New York is this: 1. A board of commissioners of three persons; one appointed by the Chamber of Commerce, one by the Board of Underwriters, and one by the pilots, who shall have power to examine and license all persons desirous of acting as pilots. 2. A classification of the boats, to include those of New York, New Jersey, and merchants' pilots, with all the persons now belonging to them, who shall be found competent, and an assignment of the boats, in turn, to three descriptions of service, viz: cruising out of sight of Sandy Hook, within sight of the light house, and in the vicinity of the Hook. This will correspond substantially with the station system at Liverpool, and will, at all times, insure to vessels arriving at the city of New York, competent pilots, under legal regulation, and under the supervision of the mercantile interest of the city. The first step towards the establishment of such a system is a repeal of the act of Congress, without which it cannot be placed on such a footing as to insure its efficacy.

THE AMERICAN FLAG IN MEXICO.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, in presenting a document in relation to the American flag, stated to have been first planted upon the Capitol of Mexico, said: Sometime since I presented to the Senate a United States flag, which had been intrusted to me for such purpose by an officer of our army. That flag derived its value from the assurance that it was the first national flag raised by our troops on the citadel of the Mexican capital, and additional interest from the fact that it was made ragged by the balls of the enemy. The officer who handed me the flag gave no special history of the circumstances or the individuals connected with the event from which this flag draws its peculiar interest. I believed he was unwilling to do so, because of rival and conflicting statements in relation to it. Be that as it may, the consequence was, that no report or statement was made at the time of presentation showing the corps or individual by whom the service of raising that flag was performed. As I did not then, so I do not now, intend to consider the pretensions or relative merit of individuals connected with that transaction.

This morning letters have reached me from a distinguished citizens of Iowa, and from the officer whose immediate command carried this flag into the city of Mexico, representing that a report made by the latter contained the history of the flag, as connected with the capture of the city, and complaining that it was not presented with the flag. A duplicate of that report was enclosed to me. It seems to be appropriate to the action which the Senate has taken, and as an act of justice, I present it, with a motion that it be read and printed.

Mr. FOOTE.—I feel reluctantly compelled to make a single suggestion. When this flag was first presented to the Senate by my colleague, as an offering from General Twiggs, I confess I did not perfectly understand what flag it was; the name of a distinguished citizen of Mississippi, Major General Quitman, under whose immediate command the first flag of this republic which ever waved over the Mexican palace was raised, having been entirely omitted by my colleague in the explanatory remarks which he made on that occasion. I was certainly under the impression at the time, that it was some other flag than the one raised under the order of General Quitman, which was thus presented to the Senate; and I was quite surprised afterwards at learning that I was in error on this point. Now, sir, as the erection of this flag, under the very imposing circumstances which attended upon the proceeding, has attracted in a very special manner the public attention, and cannot fail to claim the notice of the future historian of the war, I regret that, since it was deemed proper to introduce this subject at all in the Senate, a more ample account had not been given of the whole transaction—such an account as would have done full justice to General Quitman, as well as to other distinguished officers, from none of whom, and particularly from the thrice gallant Twiggs, would I willingly detract in the least degree. Whilst I feel satisfied that my colleague is wholly incapable of intending injustice to his late comrade in arms, in all of whose achievements our gallant State feels such a peculiar and just pride, I feel bound to say that this repeated introduction of the flag, without any particular mention of General Quitman, is decidedly calculated to do him injury, inasmuch as it is a fact very well known, that the circumstances connected with the raising of this flag have been, more or less, in several quarters, a subject of dispute. Having in my possession certain documentary* evidence of the highest character, elucidative of the point in controversy, I shall ask leave, at a seasonable time, to bring the same to the notice of the Senate, that the whole matter may be everywhere thoroughly understood, and due honor be awarded to all concerned in this interesting transaction in our history as a nation. I regret that my colleague did not confer with me upon this rather delicate point before the flag was presented to the Senate, as I would cheerfully have afforded to him all the information which had been put in my hands on this subject, and thus have enabled him to do, (what I feel certain he would have been highly gratified at having an opportunity of doing,) and that is to award full and unstinted justice to one of the most valorous officers, accomplished men, and devoted patriots who has won renown in arms during the progress of the Mexican war.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I am surprised at the course my colleague has thought proper to take on this occasion. Did he not hear me state that in presenting the flag I intended to avoid all questions of individual merit or services—that I had heard of controversy about the transaction with which it was associated, and had received no statement from the officer who handed me the flag. The rival pretensions of which I had heard, and to which allusion was made, were of regiments and of company officers. A controversy between general officers upon such a subject was not thought of by me; the service was appropriate to lower rank. A general with a command should, at such a moment, be otherwise employed. The conflicting claims of which I had heard were among subaltern officers. To them it was a matter of importance. They had the command; the conduct of which they could acquire reputation—no elevated rank to attract observation—no world wide fame which would sink by connection with so small a transaction—to their energy, personal daring, and physical prowess, must bring the favors of war. It is the duty, as it should be the pride, of a commander to aid such subordinates in securing to themselves whatever they may fairly win. As to the reputation of the general to whom my colleague has alluded as a Mississippian, I have to say that State pride and the obligations of my present position, would have rendered me prompt to defend that reputation to every proper limit, if it had been assailed. He must have been a careless reader of the official reports, who does not know that General Quitman commanded the division which first reached the citadel of Mexico. His fame is to rest upon the success of his command. It would sink if it could be involved in a little controversy about the raising of a flag.

To commemorate the last event in a war most brilliant from its beginning to its close—to mark the moment of final triumph, when the long succession of glorious victories brought our army to the goal for which it had toiled, and bled, and performed prodigies of valor—the national flag that was first raised upon the Capitol of Mexico was presented. No notice was taken of the regimental flags which had been previously displayed at various points—no mention made of any individual as particularly identified with the event—all was general, as the flag was national, and the glory that of our common country. The presentation of a national flag, which associated only with recollections of victory, yet shows, by its torn condition, how severe were the struggles through which it passed, and how united our countrymen must

*The documentary evidence here alluded to, we are requested to say, consists in part of the following extracts from the reports of Generals Scott and Quitman. Extract from report of General Scott, Ex. doc. No. 1, page 383:

"Quitman proceeded to the west gate of the city, planted guards and secured the colleges of the United States, the National Palace, contiguous to each of Congress, and Executive departments of the old Mexican Government. For this general service, Quitman might have been anticipated a month, but not as a conquering corps, the object of the head of the Alameda, (a green park,) within three squares of that goal of general ambition."

Extract from General Quitman's report, page 414:

"Captain Roberts of the rifle regiment, who had led the advanced company of the storming party at Chapultepec, and had greatly distinguished himself during the preceding day, was directed by me to plant the star-spangled banner of our country upon the National Palace. The flag was finally hung—some which had never waved over that palace since the conquest of Cortez, was displayed, and saluted with enthusiasm by the whole command." Rep.

have been, might have been expected to constitute an occasion on which rivalry and contest for individual pre-eminence would have slumbered rather than been aroused. Certain it is, that I had no expectation that any one would object to the printing of a report which is official in its character, and can only thus be made public.

Mr. BUTLER.—Remarks made on occasions like this, however transient, might assume an historical interest, especially to military men having a sensitive jealousy of reputation. The first flag raised on the walls of Mexico was hoisted under the direction of Major General Quitman, commanding the Rifles and Palmetto regiment, and being in the advance. In the midst of the fire of the enemy, General Quitman, with his own hands, first hoisted a handkerchief, and then called for a flag; and that flag was the Palmetto banner of the South Carolina regiment, and it was placed on the walls by a lieutenant of that regiment.

Mr. FOOTE.—I am very much indebted to the Senator from South Carolina for the seasonable and brilliant tribute which he has rendered to a patriotic son of Mississippi, in what has just fallen from him. True-hearted men everywhere will be ready to approve the generous display of sympathy for a gallant officer, which has been made by the Senator from South Carolina; and as a Mississippian, and the devoted friend of the distinguished personage so kindly referred to, I thank him from the bottom of my heart. I feel more surprise at the effect produced apparently upon the sensibilities of my colleague, by what I have said on this occasion. It is surely needless for me to disclaim all intention to wound his feelings or involve him in the suspicion of being influenced by motives in the least degree unworthy. In all that I have said, I have been alone actuated by a profound sense of duty, and so must all have perceived who have witnessed the proceedings now in progress. I must again express my regret, though, that I was not conferred with before the flag was presented to the Senate, and for the reasons already stated.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I will tell my colleague why I did not. The flag was sent to me as a member of the Military Committee to be put in the possession of that Committee. But that could not be done until it had been presented to the Senate.

Mr. FOOTE.—I again say, that I intended to present no accusation of unworthy conduct against my colleague. I readily confide in his declaration that he designed no injustice to General Quitman in what he has done; and yet he cannot fail to perceive that such must have been the consequence resulting from his acts, had no further explanation been given. I could not easily be induced to believe that the State of Mississippi holds within her confines a wretch so base as to attempt to undermine the fame of a gallant officer, by indirect means, in the absence of that officer. I have not accused my colleague of belonging to that class of officers who are noted for entering perpetually into a scramble for petty honors; nor did I charge him with endeavoring to secure to himself a monopoly of the glory acquired on any occasion during this war; and why he has thus gone out of his way to vindicate himself, I am not able to perceive. Not being conscious of having done anything to ruffle the feelings of my colleague, I can only attribute the excitement which he has displayed to the delicate relations existing between himself and General Quitman, for which I am certainly not at all responsible.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—When the flag was presented to the Senate I made no claim for any one, denied no pretensions of any one. knowing that some controversy existed, I said not a word about individuals as connected with planting it on the capitol at Mexico. I then supposed the contest was confined to subalterns. General Twiggs certainly set up no special claim for himself—he was not at the citadel when the flag was raised, if I have correctly understood the positions of the troops. nor was he mentioned otherwise than as the officer from whom the flag was received for presentation.

Why, then, does my colleague continue to make baseless suppositions, and follow them with a declaration that he makes no charge against any one. Except by the report presented today, nothing has been claimed by any one in connexion with this flag; and the Senate was not asked to take any action on the report beyond having it printed.

I did not understand my colleague as imputing to me personally any of the charges which he has disclaimed. My answer was not made under any such supposition. If I had so understood him, my reply would have been different, and made elsewhere. My colleague understands me.

When I presented the flag, the Senate was asked to take such order respecting it as should seem proper. I offered no resolution; and after some discussion, the matter was postponed. On a subsequent day a resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey was adopted. There was full notice, and enough of discussion to have attracted attention—certainly to have prevented any one from pleading a surprise.

Mr. FOOTE.—I have expressly and repeatedly declared that I did not design in aught to reflect upon my colleague. He says he did not understand me as designing any imputation upon him; and yet he has thought proper, very gratuitously, as I consider, to declare, and in a manner, to say the least, decidedly significant, that had he understood me as intending to assail him, he would not have replied to me here, but most certainly have resorted to a different arbitrament for satisfaction. I feel called on to declare in reply, what my colleague, I am sure, will not be at all inclined to doubt, that though seeking no altercation with any one, whenever he shall feel inclined to take the course which he has intended, he will find me as ready to accommodate him as any man in Christendom.

Mr. BORLAND.—A sense of duty which I deem imperative, impels me to say a few words in connection with this subject.

I do not rise to present a competitor for the honor of raising the first American flag upon the capitol of Mexico. But as it so happened that the taking of the City of Mexico fell, in part, under my own observation, I will state, very briefly, the facts of the case—as observed by myself; leaving the reputation that may justly belong to any individual for a participation in that affair, to rest upon the facts as set forth in the official reports of commanding officers.

On the 13th of September, the first division of the American army, commanded by Major General Worth, after gloriously participating in the assault and capture of Chapultepec, marched upon the City of Mexico, by way of the aqueduct, and suburb of San Cosmé. Reduced by heavy losses in previous battles, (especially at Churubusco, and Molino del Rey,) it numbered barely eighteen hundred men, of all arms. With this small force, General Worth fought his way, against greatly superior numbers, from early morning, until just before night-fall, when he confronted the main body of the Mexican army, commanded by Santa Anna in person, at the gate of San Cosmé; and before night had closed in, he had carried this strong and important point, destroying or driving in, the large Mexican force, and capturing a heavy gun the enemy were forced, in their haste, to abandon. Here, taking up his position, and throwing forward the sappers and miners, under Lieut. Smith, some distance in the city, he awaited the arrival of two heavy guns he had requested of the General-in-Chief. When these—a 24 pounder, and a 10 inch mortar—arrived, under Capt Huger, and Lieut. Hagner, of the ordnance, they were placed in position in the gate-way of San Cosmé. By the energy and skill of Lieut. Hagner, this was accomplished by 9 o'clock; and, then, five shells from the mortar, and three shot from the 24 pounder, were fired into the city, in the direction of the palace. This done, General Worth, with his staff, retired, to rest from the severe fatigues of the day, in quarters selected for him about a quarter of a mile within the gate; and a portion of his force occupied a position quite as far in advance. Thus placing the 1st. division of the army some half mile within the gate, and nearly in the heart of the city. Before retiring to rest, General Worth made this remark to the officers about him: "gentlemen, within three hours, the city will be surrendered to us!" In remarkable veneration of this, scarcely had we fallen asleep, when, at one o'clock, we were aroused by a delegation from the municipal authorities of the city, who came to say that Santa Anna, his government, and army had fled, and the city was placed at our disposal. The three shot and five shells had carried terror and consternation into the Mexican hosts—had driven their President, his government, and army, forth in flight, and placed their proud capital at our feet! This delegation, in charge of Capt. Mackall, Assistant Adjutant General, was despatched to the General-in-Chief, then at his quarters in Tacubaya. At day-light, (morning of the 14th) Capt. Mackall returned, bringing an order to General Worth, to move forward his division as far as the Alameda, and there wait for further orders. This order was promptly executed. The position was taken. And while holding it, that scattering and assassin like firing commenced from the house-tops, the windows, and the corners of the streets, under which Col. Garland was shot down, within a few feet of General Worth, and which, continuing generally through the day, killed and wounded many other gallant officers and men. In the meantime, orders were sent, by the General-in-Chief, to another distinguished General, (Major General Quitman,) who the day before, along the aqueduct of Tacubaya, had, with unsurpassed gallantry, led his division through a perfect storm of lead and iron hail, to the gate of Belen, and carried it by assault; himself among the first to mount the walls. The orders I allude to, were that General Quitman should move his division, then at the citadel, to the national palace, or capitol. Then it was, the American flag was first hoisted, by an American soldier, upon the walls of the Mexican capitol; and this, there is no doubt, under the immediate direction of Major General Quitman.

What measure of reputation shall belong to him, on the one hand, who first hoisted our national flag upon the walls of the Mexican capitol—or what to him, on the other hand, who struck the blow which caused the enemy to surrender that very capitol into our hands, I undertake not to determine. To each, and to all who did their duty in that gallant achievement, high honors are, undoutedly due. But the meed of each, as compared with that of the other, has yet to be awarded by the generous, yet discriminating public sentiment of our countrymen. As a small rivulet to the ocean of that sentiment, I have presented, here, a few of those particular incidents, which I saw with my own eyes, which I heard with my own ears, and which will be found confirmed by the official reports of the whole transaction. Of these I make no application here. They will properly compose the verdure and the sheen of that garland which, at another day, and from other hands, shall crown the impersonation of our country's glory.

Mr. DAYTON.—I think the debate we have had here illustrates very clearly the questionable propriety of the Senate of the United States taking any cognizance of the question at all. I felt, from the beginning, that even the presentation of the flag in this body, was a matter which might as well have been omitted, and that it several hours been perhaps in some proper destination, had it been sent by the officer in command to the appropriate department—But it having been placed in the hands of one of the members of this body for presentation to his committee, he certainly could get it there only in the mode which he adopted. And I may add here, that so far as regards the records in the Senate, nothing appears which adds to, or takes away from the merits of any officer of the army. The resolution has no reference to General Twiggs, General Quitman, or any one else; it simply states that this was the first national flag that was hoisted over the city of Mexico. If the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] referred in his remarks to any officer by name, his colleague has not given us the benefit of the matter by his concurrence. These facts are subject rest. With great respect for the opinion of others, I will suggest that this whole subject be laid upon the table.

On motion by Mr. DAYTON, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table.

THE ADJOURNMENT RESOLUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution passed by the House of Representatives, fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. MANGUM.—When this question was last before the Senate, it will be remembered that the Senator from Mississippi, abandoning the tone and character of the debate, which had been concise, business-like, and strictly confined to the consideration of the most appropriate day to adjourn, having reference to the state of the business before Congress—gave an entirely new direction to it, and pushed insinuations quite offensive to the self-respect of those to whom they might be supposed to apply.

Although extremely anxious to avoid any discursive and desultory discussion, touching mere party questions, and the position and views of Presidential candidates, yet I was constrained to deny, promptly and peremptorily that the whig party, or that I as one of that party, was unwilling to meet any question pending before Congress. It will be remembered that the Senator from Mississippi at once exempted me from the category of timid and shrinking whigs, who were unwilling to face all their responsibilities, but still persisted in the justice of his insinuation against others, and entered upon a wide and extended field of aggressive party debate, and by a series of interrogatories addressed to me personally, thrown out with a somewhat triumphant air, fastened upon me this discussion, which I could not have avoided, without seeming to shrink from an investigation of whig principles and whig pretensions.

I regret that this subject has been called up so early to-day, and before the Senator from Mississippi has taken his seat, because it will be remembered that when I gave way on a former day, at a late hour, for adjournment, I was in the course of presenting a series of interrogatories in regard to the opinions of General Cass, because, looking at the positions of the two gentlemen, it is matter of interest to the people of the United States, that their views and opinions should be understood. I have inquired the opinions of General Cass in regard to internal improvements—the improving of harbors in our great inland seas, and the removing of obstructions in the Mississippi and its great tributaries, and I have received no information from the Senator, excepting the very general, and to me, unsatisfactory statement, that General Cass stands upon the provisions of the constitution.

Passing from this subject to that which the Senator from Mississippi seems to regard as of the very greatest interest at this period—that which is termed the Wilmot proviso—I endeavored to ascertain what were General Cass's views in relation to that subject, and was told by the Senator that those views had been explicitly presented to the country in a letter addressed to Mr. Nicholson, of Tennessee, and that there could be no doubt in regard to them. I replied that I had not read that letter—I meant no disrespect, but averse to useless labor—I had waited for the last edition. I have sat by as a calm spectator—I have seen waves of opinion followed by waves of opinion, modified, reformed, and sometimes reversed—the political phantasmagoria having just amused a somewhat listless attention, as in boyhood one has sat and watched summer evening's clouds in their ever varying and fantastic forms—their bodies of shadow edged with brilliant sunlight—all unsubstantial and full of change. Imagine these waves in their eager chase one after another, to be frozen as suddenly as a flash of electricity, then you have something you can steadily contemplate. So, when General Cass, in his letter of acceptance of his nomination for the Presidency, by the Baltimore convention, announced that "this letter, gentlemen, closes my profession of political faith," I considered this last edition—"the Nicholson letter"—as final, as restricted. As at our last meeting on this subject, I received no light from the Senator from Mississippi, but barely a reference to this letter, I have since read it and studied it with care. I must regard it as definitely fixing General Cass's position on this question. He declines giving further answer; this closes his "profession of political faith."

Let us examine this letter, and the principles contained in it with care and with candor. This brings me to begin where I left off the other day—what are the views and principles of General Cass on the matter of this proviso? My proposition, one that I shall maintain beyond the possibility of refutation, evasion, or escape—that I shall demonstrate conclusively to every fair and unbiassed mind, is that General Cass, in the "Nicholson letter," has evaded the only "real issue" on this subject, and left the public wholly in the dark in regard to his opinions. And here, undoubtedly I shall be a little tedious, but I beg the Senate to bear with me, as I mean to be particular and exact.

To arrive at conclusions on this subject, precise and satisfactory, it is necessary to have fixed in the mind the exact and precise points in controversy between the North and the South.

There is no controversy between the North and the South in relation to slavery as it exists in the slaveholding States in the South and West. The North—I mean the whole North—with the exception of that band of mad and wild fanatics, who would desecrate and destroy the constitution to accomplish the immediate abolition of slavery, and their numbers and their influence are believed to be small and comparatively insignificant—I say the whole North—the intelligent, the wise, the patriotic, the law-abiding and constitution loving people of the North—are impressed with a deep sense "that domestic slavery is one of the greatest of evils, both moral and political." This conviction, I cannot doubt, they honestly entertain, yet the whole North, with the exception referred to, stands upon the compromises of the constitution upon this subject. They occupy the ground taken by Mr. Webster in his celebrated speech in reply to Mr. Hayne, delivered in the Senate of the United States, in January, 1830, to wit:

"There is not, and never has been, in the North a disposition to interfere with the interests of the South. Such interference has never been supposed to be within the power of government, nor has it been, in any way, attempted. The slavery of the South has always been regarded as a matter of domestic policy, left with the States themselves, and with which the federal government had nothing to do. Certainly, sir, said Mr. Webster, I am, and ever have been, of that opinion. The duties to slaves, of the South I leave where I find it, in the hands of their own governments; it is their affair, not mine."

These opinions are in exact accordance with the plain meaning and intent of the constitution of the United States, and in exact conformity with the opinions of a committee, consisting of six northern men out of seven in the House of Representatives, to whom the subject was referred in 1790, and to the resolve of that same House of Representatives, passed in that year, in the following words:

"Resolved, That Congress have no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or to give greater freedom to them, or to meddle with the regulations of the separate States, to provide rules and regulations therein, which humanity and true policy may require."

These are now the opinions of the North.

I have heard, in this chamber, no opinion avowed by any one—nor in the midst of the excitements, and irritations, and jealousies arising out of the annexation of Texas—nor out of the Mexican war, which was supposed to be begun and prosecuted with purposes of territorial acquisition, have I heard, or heard of, any opinion expressed in this chamber, or in the other branch of Congress, or in any other respectable quarter in the North, in opposition to, and in conflict with, the true and plain meaning of the resolution just referred to, or at variance with the clear and explicit remarks of Mr. WEBSTER, just cited.

There is, then, therefore, no controversy between the North and South in regard to slavery in the States of this Union. When, therefore, General Cass, in his "Nicholson letter," avers that the federal government has "neither the right nor the power to touch it (slavery) where it exists" in the States, he does no more than avow an opinion held in common by every Senator in this chamber. I regret not to see the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] in his seat. Were he here, I should take the liberty of asking him whether he dissents from the opinion of Mr Cass, and I am sure his answer would be in the negative, as I cannot be mistaken in my recollection of having heard the Senator from New Hampshire avow that opinion on several occasions during the present session.

What, then, is the "real issue" between the North and South? It is not in regard to slavery in the States. It is wholly and exclusively confined to slaves in the territories belonging to the people of the United States, and which territories it is alleged are held by this government in trust for the use and common benefit of the people of all the States. The North, very generally, are opposed to the extension of slavery, and particularly to its introduction into territory where it has hitherto not existed—as for instance into Oregon and the territory acquired by the late treaty with Mexico—to wit, New Mexico and California. The people of the North very generally assert the power of Congress under the constitution to apply to those territories the ordinance of 1787, (now commonly called the Wilmot proviso,) applied to the territory northwest of the Ohio, to wit:

"That there shall be no other slavery nor involuntary servitude in said territory, otherwise than in punishment of crimes whereof the parts shall have been convicted."

The South, on the contrary, very generally assert that Congress has no power to legislate touching the territories, the common property of all the people of all the States, in such manner as to exclude citizens of fifteen States of the Union—the slaveholding States—from emigrating to these territories with their slave property. The South, it is believed, is not unanimous in the denial of the power of Congress, but approximate unanimity in the assertion, that such legislation against the will, and without the assent of the South, would be flagrantly unjust or eminently inexpedient. For, say they, territory acquired by a common sacrifice of blood and treasure, and held as the property of all, should not be so governed as to exclude the citizens of one-half the States of the Union, unless they sacrifice their property in their slaves.

This, then, is the real issue. No one affirms the proposition that Congress can interfere in any way with slavery in those States where it now exists; nor do any dispute the power of a sovereign State to introduce and establish slavery within her limits, if it be her sovereign will and pleasure to do so. The real question is therefore confined to the territories. The question recurs, what are General Cass's views on this subject? As far as I have been able to trace the history of his opinions, I find that some two years ago, he was openly, avowedly, and zealousy a Wilmot proviso man. His declarations were strong and unreserved in this chamber, not in speeches, but in conversations publicly held with gentlemen of all shades of party politics. The declarations of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER,] made this day, are full and explicit to this point. They are but the repetition of declarations made in the presence of General Cass on a former occasion in this chamber, and in public debate—emphatically invoking his attention, and meeting neither denial, explanation, or apology. That they are accurately stated, is strongly confirmed by the admission of General Cass in his "Nicholson letter," that "He was strongly impressed with the opinion that a great change had been going on in the public mind upon the subject, in his own as well as others."

The next historical trace that I find, is in General Cass's vote upon the three million bill in the winter of 1847. He voted against the proviso; and I find that his biographer, in "a sketch of his life and public services," printed in June, 1848, treats the subject so as to leave room for a fair inference that he voted against it, not because he was opposed to the principle, but because it was out of place in that bill. The biographer says:

"The Wilmot proviso was introduced into the Senate as an amendment to the three million bill, by a federal Senator from New England. The design of the mover was evidently to defeat the bill to which it was to be attached, and to embarrass the administration in the prosecution of the war. General Cass voted against the proviso for reasons given at the time of the discussion."

I have not found any published speech on that occasion. He, however, had evidently somewhat cooled down his fiery zeal, if he had not to some extent modified his earlier opinion. The next and final trace of General Cass's views is to be found in the "Nicholson letter," and what is that?

1st. That Congress cannot touch the subject of slavery in the States. Messrs. Giddings, Hale, and all, agree with him in that.

2d. In respect to the territories, he says:

"Briefly, then, I am opposed to the exercise of jurisdiction by Congress over this matter, and I am in favor of leaving to the people of any territory, which may hereafter acquired, the right of regulating for themselves under the general principles of the constitution, because I do not see in the constitution any grant of the requisite power to Congress."

Upon a hasty or careless reading of the foregoing, General Cass would seem to stand side by side with southern men, and to have adopted the prevailing opinion of the South. But it is not so. It is manifest evasion; and why? Because, under our system and unvarying practice, a territorial council or legislature can be created only by act of Congress, in the form of an organic law. The territorial government can do nothing unless by the assent of Congress previously or subsequently given. Yet General Cass is "in favor of leaving to the people of any territory" this great question. He cannot leave it to the people of the territory; and why? Because they cannot act, unless first upon authority given by Congress, and that act of Congress must be approved by the President. Can General Cass, as President, approve such act of Congress? Not at all; and why? Because he declares

"I do not see in the constitution any grant of the requisite power to Congress."

Or, secondly, the people of the territory cannot act, unless with the subsequent approval of Congress.

Take New Mexico: Their territorial government abolishes and prohibits slavery, the Congress of the United States concurs, and the act goes to the President. What would Gen. Cass do in such a case? Suppose the opposite: New Mexico recognizes and establishes slavery, Congress concurs, and the act goes to the President. What, in this case, would General Cass do? In both, or either, he must meet the acts with his veto; and why? Because, in his opinion, Congress has no jurisdiction over the matter, and of course he cannot approve an act having no warrant in the constitution. What, then, is the consequence of these opinions of General Cass? It is that every act of the people of a territory, whether affirmatively or negatively, on the subject of slavery, must be annulled by the President's veto. What beautiful confusion will arise out of this masterly statesmanship! Sir, a gentleman must be hard pushed when driven to such a resort; the responsibility must, in his mind, be fearful when he shuns a question of such magnitude, by throwing it upon the people of New Mexico, and such a people! the definitive settlement of these questions—they having no power to settle them—questions that are said almost to shake the pillars of this glorious Union.

But suppose the people of New Mexico had the power to settle these questions, with what admiration must we contemplate the profound wisdom and consummate statesmanship of General Cass in devolving upon such a people the adjustment of these great stirring and agitating questions! Who and what are the people of New Mexico? The entire population is either black or mixed—the black with Indian or the original Boors, the most abject, degraded, and debased race in all Mexico—in morals scarcely above the brutes—in intelligence depressed to nearly the lowest point of rational creatures. In the whole of New Mexico—of course including Santa Fe—I have been informed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] that but a single white man was resident at the opening of the war. I need not say to this Senate that the Senator from Missouri is perhaps the very best informed man in this body upon all matters concerning New Mexico and California. And yet to these people and to this population Gen. Cass would leave the adjustment of these difficult matters, that are to endure, not only for this generation, but in all future time. Is it because they are better judges in these matters than those who occupy these halls of Congress, or the people of this Union? Or is it because it is the only device by which a gentleman rather hard pressed by a dangerous question can escape responsibility? It is a most hanging device, it deceives no one. The very boys in the streets would laugh it to scorn.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Do I understand the honorable Senator to say, that Mr. Cass, if elected President, can take no other course in accordance with the principles contained in his letter, than to veto the Wilmot proviso if it should be adopted by Congress?

Mr. MANGUM.—He can take no other course if he follow the principles laid down in his letter; and, moreover, veto every thing done by Congress or the territories, either in favor of, or against slavery.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Does the Senator from North Carolina urge that as an objection?

Mr. MANGUM.—That is another question. We have been taunted with supporting a candidate who has no opinions on the subject, or at least without knowing what his opinions are. I meet that taunt by showing that General Cass stands exactly no where upon the subject, and although our southern friends are fluttering themselves with the idea that we are to get a President who is not hostile to the South, they are, in point of fact laboring under a delusion. Mr. Cass has not committed himself at all upon this question. But General Cass stands not only upon this letter, but also upon the "platform" of the democratic party, as laid down by the Baltimore convention. Let us examine that and General Cass's connexion with it, to ascertain whether any thing appears there to extricate him from mysticism.

In the first place I will read from Mr. Cass's letter of acceptance, to show that all the dogmas and canons of his party, as set forth in that platform, are by him fully and unreservedly recognized and adopted. He says:

"I have carefully read the resolutions of the democratic national convention, laying down the platform of our political faith, and I adhere to them as firmly as I approve them cordially."

Now, let us see what this platform is. I may say in advance, in pretty nearly the language of an ingenious and gifted friend of mine, that all the principles and dogmas contained in it may, with sufficient accuracy for all practical purposes, be referred to three classes: 1st. Affirmations, that nobody denies; 2d. Negations, that no one controverts; 3d. Resolutions and declarations, that no one believes. I think it probable that my ingenious friend would refer to the last class, all those resolutions and avowals of confidence in the capacity, firmness, integrity, energy, ability, and wisdom of this administration so signally displayed in all our affairs at home and abroad. The truth is, it consists of little more than barren generalities, high-sounding professions and ingeniously turned periods, in which it is as difficult to find any thing precise, explicit, and exact, as it is to ascertain General Cass's opinions upon the Wilmot proviso.

But to the platform. I will read the 7th canon. It is in these words:

"That Congress has no power under the constitution to interfere with or control the domestic institutions of the several States, and that such States are the sole and proper judges of every thing appertaining to their own affairs not prohibited by the constitution; that all efforts of the abolitionists or others, made to induce Congress to interfere with questions of slavery, or to take incipient steps in relation thereto, are calculated to lead to the most alarming and dangerous consequences; and that all such efforts have a direct tendency to weaken the fraternal feelings of the people and endanger the perpetuity of the Union, and ought not to be countenanced by any friend of our political institutions."

It will be remembered that this is a precise copy of the canon of 1844, and that again of the canon of 1840. The democratic party has professed steadily and consistently for eight years the principles contained in this canon. I feel, therefore, bound in justice to retract something of what I said the other day, of the pseudo-progressive democracy calling in every six months or so, their political architects to construct a new platform as the old one became too narrow, or otherwise unfit for their incessant shiftings and changes, gyrations, marchings, and counter-marchings in their political drama. One reads this canon with a sort of admiration, it is so precise!—so explicit!—so peculiar to the party! And then it is so catholic, so national, so conservative, so patriotic! Can any one who loves his country feel less than respect and gratitude to the democratic party, which spreads so broad a shield over the domestic institutions of the South? Why cannot the whig party cherish a like comprehensive patriotism? Why leave to the democratic party the exclusive merit of guarding our southern hearths and firesides? of protecting the weaker sex or sleeping infancy in the silent watches of the night, from the torch of the incendiary and the knife of the assassin? Why cannot the whigs come and stand upon this platform? The democratic answer is ready. It is our ground, not whig ground; it is a part of the pure democracy, it is ours, wholly ours, exclusively ours, and peculiar to us and to our creed. Let us see.

I find in the journal of the House of Representatives of the first session of the 28th Congress, page 476, that Mr. Campbell, on the 26th February, 1844, moved the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That justice and sound policy forbid the federal government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to enrich the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country.

"Resolved, That Congress has no power, under the constitution, to interfere with or control the domestic institutions of the several States; and that such States are the sole and proper judges of every thing appertaining to their own affairs not prohibited by the constitution; that all efforts of the abolitionists or others, made to induce Congress to interfere with questions of slavery, or to take incipient steps in relation thereto, are calculated to lead to the most alarming and dangerous consequences; and that all such efforts have a direct tendency to weaken the fraternal feelings of the people and endanger the perpetuity of the Union, and ought not to be countenanced by any friend of our political institutions."

It will be perceived that these resolutions are identical—word for word with the 4th and 7th canons of this vaunted democratic platform; that the first resolution, which is identical with the 4th canon, contains the peculiar doctrine of the democratic party on the subject of "black and abominable tariffs," and it contains the whole of their doctrine which they boast as theirs exclusively.—The resolutions were divided, and the vote was taken upon the first part of the first resolution, in the words following:

"Resolved, That justice and sound policy forbid the federal government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to enrich the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country."

What do you suppose, Mr. President, was the vote on this question? You suppose, of course, that none but democrats voted for it. It being a part of the 4th canon of the democratic platform, is therefore peculiar to the party. But the journal tells a different tale. The vote stood, yeas 166, nays 4. The entire whig party, with the exception of four, voting for this exclusive democratic doctrine.

The question was then put on the remainder of the first resolution in these words:

"That every citizen of every section of the country has a right to demand and insist upon an equality of rights and privileges, and to complete and unqualified protection of person and property from domestic violence or foreign aggression."

Upon this question, this exclusive democratic doctrine, strange to tell, the vote was unanimous; yeas 172, nays 00. So much for this resolution. Does not every one see that it is couched in terms so general, so inexact, so unspecific, that no one can find a ground for disagreement. This, perhaps, should excite the suprise of no one. A party so progressive, so full of change, so perpetually tossed on the waves of excitement and of faction, ought to leave themselves sufficient "sea-room." It is provident, as being politic; it is commendable.

Mr. FOOTE.—I would like to ask the Senator a question if he will allow me. I wish to know if he did not understand that the tariff of 1842 was a whig measure; and secondly, if he believes that the whigs in two years discarded their former doctrine?

Mr. MANGUM.—As to the first question, whether the whigs voted for the tariff of '42, I say, I think they did generally. But it was not a regularly formed bill—it was truncated. And as to the second question, I say I do not think that their doctrines underwent any change, but on the contrary, that they were steadfast and firm in their principles in regard to this subject. What I meant, and what I mean, I have already indicated. It is that this platform, so gravely exhibited, is unworthy of respect; if it be not mischievous, it is at least ridiculous, as putting forth nothing that any sensible man will seriously controvert. If it have not the merit of meeting the universal acceptance, it has not the dignity of provoking the slightest serious opposition.

Mr. FOOTE.—I wish to state a fact if the Senator will allow me, and I am sure he does not wish to deal unfairly with us, that if he will consult the National Intelligencer and all the leading whig papers for the year 1844, he will find that in accordance with the declarations of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and the distinguished Senator from Delaware, and of the eloquent and distinguished exponent of the whig principles, Henry Clay himself, that in 1844, the issue between the two great political parties was whether the tariff of '42 should be retained or not. Now the question I desire to put is, does he or does he not recognize the tariff of '42 as a regularly agreed upon measure of the great whig party of that period? If he answers affirmatively, then I have only to say that as the two parties harmonized in 1844, a great change must have taken place in the whig party. There is not now, I am sure, a whig who dares to speak in terms of respect of the tariff of '42.

Mr. MANGUM.—The Senator is mistaken in his last remark, wholly mistaken. In regard to the tariff of '42 being an issue between the parties in the Presidential election of '44, I think it was very generally so in the southern States and in some other quarters,

It certainly was not so in the great State of Pennsylvania, for besides having passed by the vote of her favorite son, Mr Buchanan, I have heard from undoubted sources—(and you Mr. President, can correct me, if I err)—that the battle cry of the democratic leaders in the Keystone was the "tariff of '42." "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of '42" was thrown to the breeze on many a democratic banner—it gave ornament and attraction in glaring capitals to many a democratic placard—it was embalmed in poetry and democratic song, and it was commended in enthusiastic and burning eloquence by democratic orators to throngs of thousands and tens of thousands of democratic voters, whose responsive enthusiasm burst out in shouts loud, long, and yet prolonged huzza, huzza for "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of '42."

Nor do I yet suppose it was an issue in the State of New York. The late Silas Wright, the first favorite of the State had voted for it. He was brought forward by the democracy for the first office in the State in '44, and was elected. I can hardly think the democracy much denounced that tariff while enthusiastically supporting its ablest advocate. Sir, the Senator must remember the "Kane letter." That tells the whole tale. It was not designed to be an issue in the regions where that letter was most circulated. Sir, let me remark as to that tariff, that before it was passed, the ship of State was aground, the national fisc was paralyzed; this vast country, with its vast resources, was as powerless as a stranded whale: the emissaries of an exhausted and hungry treasury were hawking its credit at every money counter in America and in Europe; they were repulsed empty-handed with contempt, with scorn, or with derision; every proud American felt the humiliation as a brand burning into the bone—the tariff was passed—the whole scene was changed. Public credit was re-established; business readjusted, and a sudden spring given to the prosperity of the country wholly unparalleled. I am not now going into that subject.

Let me return to the next resolution and the 7th canon of the platform.

The question then recurred on the first clause of the second resolution, in these words:

"Resolved, That Congress has no power under the constitution to interfere with or control the domestic institutions of the several States, and that such States are the sole and proper judges of everything appertaining to their own affairs not prohibited by the constitution."

This clause passed by a vote of 151 yeas, to 2 nays. I find that Messrs. GIDDINGS, JOHN P. HALE, PRESTON KING, and every other northern man, save two, voted for this clause of the canon set forth in the democratic platform, as being of such potency to protect and preserve the slave institutions of the South.

The question was then put on the remainder of the resolution, in these words:

"That all efforts of the abolitionists or others made to induce Congress to interfere with questions of slavery, or to take incipient steps in relation thereto, are calculated to kindle the most alarming and dangerous consequences; and that all such efforts have an inevitable tendency to diminish the happiness of the people, and endanger the stability and permanency of the Union, and ought not be countenanced by any friend of our political institutions."

This clause also passed—yeas 128, nays 23, by the vote of the great mass of the whig party, and so little was this regarded as anything peculiar and exclusive, and so unmeaning was it deemed that I find among the yeas the names of JOHN P. HALE, PRESTON KING, as well as others, whigs and democrats, that are known to entertain feelings of deep hostility to the institutions of slavery. If such be the merits of the democratic platform upon the two great questions, the tariff and slavery, its value upon minor questions may be easily estimated.

I return to General Cass and the Wilmot proviso. The "Nicholson letter" leaves us in the dark. The platform holds nothing to aid us. The Senator from Mississippi stands mute or speaks in oracles as unintelligible and as incomprehensible as are the opinions of General Cass himself. Embarrassed as I am, and utterly at a loss how further to proceed in these hitherto unavailing inquiries, it is barely possible that I hold in my hand what may show that I am engaged in a wild-goose chase, that I am in search of the philosopher's stone, that I am vainly attempting to grasp an evanescent shadow, in short, that I am looking for an opinion where none exist, or if it exist, it lies hidden in the deep, dark and silent recesses of the mind that formed it. It is a very curious thing that I am about to present to our friends of the democratic party, Mr. President, do you recollect anything of the "Kane letter?" The fruits of that letter were so perfectly miraculous; the electing of a man who in his wildest mood had never dreamed of such elevation over the head of the foremost man of the age—I say, such were the fruits, that a bold, reckless, sagacious, I will not say unscrupulous party would not be likely to abstain from the use of like means, when working heart and soul for a like result. No, sir. Here is a second edition of the "Kane" principle. Principles, says the Senator from Mississippi, are indestructible, eternal. I suppose that may be true, whether good or bad. The latter in the hands of skilful, adroit and unprincipled tacticians, are capable of an infinite variety of applications, and with a little ambi-dexterity such as that which once appeared in a "Kane letter," may be revived as at once ornamental and useful in the life of a distinguished statesman. I hold in one hand, "A sketch of the life and public services of General Lewis Cass." I hold in the other, "A sketch of the life and public services of General Lewis Cass."

Mr. FOOTE.—Where were they published?

Mr. MANGUM.—They were published at the Congressional Globe office, Jackson hall, D. C., price 50 cents per hundred copies.

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the Senator inform me where he obtained them?

Mr. MANGUM.—It is sufficient that I have them. The Globe office will not dare deny their publication there; their types speak the truth, and if needs be, there is other evidence at hand. One of the pamphlets has written upon it "North," the other "South." One is evidently designed for a northern latitude and the other for a southern. The one, as I supppose, designed for the North contains on the last page an eloquent outburst of Mr. Cass on the Mexican war, in reply to some poor remarks of mine. I will not detain the Senate by reading them, as we have all been thrilled and electrified by them heretofore. It contains also on the same page a long extract from a speech delivered by Mr. Cass, at Odd Fellows Hall in this city, at a meeting held to express the sympathies of the American people with the people of France upon the result of the late French revolution. It also has on the same page an account of Mr. Cass's nomination for the Presidency, with some remarks upon his qualifications, public services, his age, his virtues and his manners, but not one word on the "Wilmot proviso." On the preceding page there is a very slight notice of Mr. Cass's vote on the three million bill in the winter of 1847, and against the attaching of the proviso to that bill, from which the inference is fair and plain that he voted against it, because it was out of place there and for that reason only. The other pamphlet designed, as I suppose, for the South, has on the last page the same remarks by Mr. Cass in reply to me; nothing upon the subject of the French revolution. But the "Wilmot proviso" and his opinions on it are strongly and impressively noted by the biographer, with a commentary calculated to mislead the public, utterly false in its reasoning and conclusion, as I trust, I have conclusively shown in a preceding portion of my remarks. The pamphlets are in all other respects, as far as I have been able to see, identical, precisely alike. I read what is found in this pamphlet for the South on the "Wilmot proviso." It is as follows:

"In December, 1847, General Cass gave his views at length upon the 'Wilmot proviso,' in a letter to Mr. Nicholson, of Tennessee. In that letter he avowed himself opposed to the measure, and to the exercise of any legislation by Congress, over any of the territories of the United States, respecting the domestic relations of their inhabitants. He believed that all questions of that nature should be settled by the people themselves, who ought to be allowed 'to regulate their internal concerns in their own way;' and that Congress has no more power to abolish or establish slavery in such territories than it has to regulate any other of the relative duties of social life—that of husband and wife, of parent and child, or of master and servant. He said, in conclusion:

"To the United States, as a political community, the whole question is one of domestic policy, having no relation to the Union, as such, and to transfer it to another, created by the people for a special purpose, and bound to the subject matter involved in this issue, by none of the ties or principles we go back to the end of peace and safety. Leave to the people, who will be affected by this question, to adjust it upon their own reasonable and, in the main manner, and we shall render unnecessary to the strongest principles of our government, and furnish another guarantee to its permanence and prosperity."

Mr. FOOTE.—Does the Senator charge that there is any repugnancy or conflicting principles in the two pamphlets?

Mr. MANGUM.—They do not come in conflict, for one takes the road directly to the North, the other the shortest cut for the South.

Mr. FOOTE.—Does the meaning conflict?

Mr. MANGUM.—The meaning of the two is not at all coincident. They do not approximate each other on the "proviso;" there is no similitude on that subject; there is manifest incongruity, and I think, antagonism. In the pamphlet for the North General Cass is represented as voting against the "proviso," because offered by a federal Senator from New England, with a view of embarrassing the administration in a vigorous prosecution of the war. We all know that General Cass in season and out of season, whether sleeping or waking, always went for a "vigorous prosecution of the war." Why, I can almost fancy that I now see the late Senator Cass rising from his seat, with his good-natured face slightly touched with a shade of anxiety, and moving "the postponement of the previous order, and to proceed to the consideration of the ten regiment bill," and if opposed, I can almost see the slight air of bustle very slightly tinging, I don't say detracting, from his bearing, invariably courteous and gentlemanlike.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Will the Senator allow me two or three words, as I have been notified that at the close of his speech another bill will be called up, and I shall not then have an opportunity of making any observations? I trust the Senator will not, for one moment, suppose that either General Cass, or any friend of his, would ever countenance the publication of documents for one region of country different from those published for another. I know not where these two documents proceeded, nor by whose authority they were published, but I am authorized to assure the honorable Senator that the Congressional committee, appointed to prepare and publish documents, have nothing to do with anything of the kind; on the contrary, they have unanimously and expressly declared that no document should go out with their authority that was not intended for each and every part of the Union. Can the whig party make a similar declaration?

Mr. MANGUM.—I am not at all surprised at any sensibility that is exhibited by the Senator from Indiana. I should feel it myself. But I have advanced no charge against General Cass that he had any participancy in any such meditated fraud. Nor have I any reason to believe that such is the case. As to what gentlemen may do in this House or the other, I know nothing. I do know, however, that here is a plain, palpable case of meditated fraud—one of great enormity—seeking to mislead and delude the people upon matters of the highest delicacy and greatest importance to their interests.

While your jails and penitentiaries groan with culprits, convicted of "false pretences and frauds" in trifling pecuniary matters, what ought to be done with the vile malefactor who, by flagitious frauds like this, cheat the people, not out of a few shillings, but out of their dearest rights, in matters touching their private happiness and the public prosperity!

Here are the pamphlets—I hand them over to the gentleman to examine—hoping they may be able to investigate the fraud, trace it to its source, drag the guilty culprit from his hiding place, and expose him and his infamy to the scorn, the hisses, and the contempt of the public.

Mr. FOOTE.—The letter of General Cass respecting the Wilmot proviso was written as early as December—long anterior to the French meeting—and I would ask the Senator, as a candid man, if it is not reasonable that the friends of General Cass should desire to promulgate his views and opinions in regard to the French revolution; and whether that is not sufficient?

Mr. MANGUM.—I certainly think it would be very proper in a life of General Cass, published as late as June, 1848, a reference should be made to his views upon the late French revolution. They could not have been referred to in the March edition. But I do not see the propriety of excluding from the June pamphlet all the matter contained in the March edition upon the "Wilmot proviso"—a question so widely agitating and deeply dividing the public opinion.

I cannot conceive how the biographer should have deemed a sympathizing speech of more moment to the public, in a sketch of the life of a candidate for the Presidency, than his views upon a great and ab-orbing question, that some, in the excess of their alarms, imagine may shake the pillars of the Union. It cannot be so. The purpose must have been suspect—should such was meditated. To shake the pillars of the Union! The "Wilmot proviso" to shake the pillars of the Union! I feel no such apprehension. These fears are idle—they are ridiculous. This Union, thank God, is not in the keeping of ambitious political aspirants or disappointed politicians. This great work of Washington and his compatriots—the ark of our safety—sprinkled with the best blood of the Revolution, consecrated to the affections of our countrymen—this Union, in its strength and its grandeur will repose upon the hearts of twenty millions of freemen; and when factionists, agitators, and conspirators shall assail it, will remain as firmly and quietly seated on its foundation as do the eternal Alleganies in the midst of a transient summer tempest.

Sir, I am a southern man, identified with southern institutions; I take a common destiny with my countrymen, whether for weal or for woe; I would live or I would die, as I trust, by the side of my countrymen upon a proper occasion; but as to this "Wilmot proviso," as a practical question, I regard it as of exceedingly slight importance. I stand by the rights of the South; I reject this "proviso," as implying an offensive disparagement: I resist it, as having no warrant in the constitution, in good faith, or in equal justice. But what is it after all? Of what practical importance is it? Where can it apply to the real detriment of southern interests? Can New Mexico become a slaveholding country? A secession of bleak and sterile hills and volcanic mountains—fit only for pastoral life or mining operations—with no land for cultivation save only the narrow valley of the Rio Grande, which winds its way as a riband amongst rocks, barren hills, and rugged and bare volcanic mountains; and that valley packed with a population for two hundred years beyond the capacity of the soil to support but for the flocks and herds that wander and browze among the hills and mountains. Sir, talk not of periling this Union for New Mexico, or the whole of Mexico, or the whole wide world. This, the home of our fathers, great, free, and happy—our own happy home—the home we would transmit to our children—to peril this; and for what? For lands, that no wise man desired. No, sir; I had rather see New Mexico and California engulfed by an earthquake, receded to Santa Anna, or held in independence by its own degenerate population; I had rather see any or all of these than to disturb deeply the harmony of this Union. Our first duty is at home; our mission is "to promote the general welfare, to form a perfect Union, and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." To peril this Union! To destroy it! It cannot be done. I have an abiding, never-failing confidence in the virtue, good sense, and patriotism of our people to defend and preserve it against all its enemies, foreign or domestic. Sir, what virtuous man who loves his country, and is proud of its glories and renown, could suffer that image of its greatness that he bears about with him in his heart to be dashed to the earth as a mirror, and shivered to pieces, each fragment reflecting but the broken fragments of divisions, sections, and States of this once glorious and happy republic? None, not one; for all the broad lands that all the empires of all the earth could give him. But, sir, I quit this topic. I had no idea of touching it. My business just now is with much smaller things—"de minimis." I talk. Well, sir, there was another question I asked the other day. I got no answer—none that I could understand. I asked what were Mr. Cass's views on the subject of internal improvement?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—What are General Taylor's views on that subject?

Mr. MANGUM.—General Taylor will leave that subject to the wisdom and sound discretion of Congress. I propounded the interrogatory the other day to the Senator from Mississippi. What would General Cass do with the river and harbor bill? I suppose Mr. Cass is in quite a dilemma. I believe he has uniformly voted for all the internal improvement bills. If I am in error, I beg his friends to correct me. He certainly voted for that harbor bill which met Mr. Polk's veto. But then he was free—he was not in chains—he had not voluntarily assumed the fetters of the Baltimore platform. What would he do now with that bill; or rather what could he do? In the platform I find the following canon:

"That the constitution does not confer on the general government the powers to carry on a general system of internal improvements."

This, like the rest of that inimitable platform, is quite general and indefinite enough. But, unfortunately for Mr. Cass, Mr. Polk, who gave in his adhesion to this article, has given his exposition of it by vetoing the harbor bill that Mr. Cass voted for. Notwithstanding great and extensive clamor against Mr Polk's veto, the Baltimore convention readopted this canon, and approved by resolution Mr. Polk's conduct. Mr. Cass has given in his adhesion to this creed; and now what can he do? Of course, in like case, exactly what Mr. Polk did. I trust this is not a case where Mr. Cass, by virtue of his former votes, is to stand in the North and on the lakes as an internal improvement man, and in the South, particularly in the Ancient Dominion, as a straight-laced '98 and '99 man—out and out against all internal improvements by the general government. In decency, I feel bound to suppose that Mr. Cass will adhere to the principles of the platform; and where they are a little Delphic, that contemporaneous expositions will be his guides. So, if this "wave of opinion" is hard frozen, and shall never thaw under the sun of popularity or the woonigs of soft breezes, coming up the great Mississippi and its great tributaries, we may set down Mr. Cass as against river and lake harbor improvements.

But, sir, these matters are of comparative insignificance. My objection to the election of Mr. Cass to the Presidency, takes a higher and deeper range, and is connected with higher and graver matter. I consider him as the true representative of the worst type of democracy—of that portion of it which I regard as fraught with most danger to the peace, prosperity, and enduring glory of the country. After all we have seen, who could hope, in the event of the elevation of General Cass to the Presidency, that we could pass through the four years of his administration without being involved in one or more wars? Opinion throughout the world is in strange and fearful commotion—portentous of change—deep, radical, and sanguinary. Speculations bold, daring, audacious are aiming to sap the foundations of existing political systems, and are threatening with disintegration the social. The power of the press, in conjunction with the example of the only really free political and civil institutions, are just beginning to be felt and developed. That power and that example will go on working their wonders. The results will be seen in the fall of dynasties, the crushing of thrones, and the toppling down of monarchies and despotisms. The upheavings of that great down-trodden mass of human beings, like the fabled Enceladeus, may, in their frantic writhings and contortions, throw up and broadcast over Europe, the smoke, the ashes, the fires, and the burning lava of revolution. The first great shock has been felt, and thrones, and cloud-capped towers, and gorgeous palaces have passed away and disappeared. There is now a troublous and fearful pause in this great phenomenon. The heart of Europe quakes in the fear of the unknown future. May God, in his kind providence, bring order and liberty out of this wild chaos of struggle and of passion. What may not be feared when these down-trodden millions shall have severed their chains, and burst from their manacles, feeling a buoyant sense of enlargement; untaught in the simplest elements of regulated liberty, feeling a keen, stinging sense of revenge for past oppression: and more, a consciousness of irresistible physical power? What may not be feared? Is there any satisfactory ground to believe or to hope that Europe will not, at no distant day either, be enveloped in war? In that event, what should be the policy of this country? It has been marked out by the great Washington. Is that policy likely to be respected by the proud, the passionate, and the reckless progressive democracy? At such a crisis is it safe to elevate to the Presidency the one, more than all others, representing that type of the democracy? What is the distinctive characteristic of that portion of the democracy that Mr. Cass most truly represents? What is it as exhibited steadily and uniformly during this administration?

It is "jealous of honor and quick to insult." It is aggressive, reckless, grasping, and, I fear, rapacious. It is addicted to quarrel with strong proclivities to violence and excess. Bearing itself boldly, haughtily, and offensively, with a courage that never quails, with a rashness that defies danger, and whose maxims scorn to count the cost in life, in money, or in good repute in the world, when stimulated by passion or impelled by popular cupidity. This bold, aggressive spirit first disclosed itself in the Oregon controversy. Mr. Cass was thoroughly identified with the extremest views on that subject. The question had been under discussion for more than twenty years between the British and American governments. That discussion had been conducted with good temper on both sides. It was apparent there were deep and honest convictions on both sides, entirely in conflict. Compromise or war between two proud, haughty, and powerful nations was obviously the only alternatives. We had just compromised a dispute very similar in many of its features with the same power, in a spirit of magnanimity, justice, and a sense of mutual convenience. After this compromise negotiations had been opened under the auspices of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] and it was in progress marked with a kind and friendly spirit.

Mr. Polk comes into power. He at once and peremptorily asserts our claim to the whole of Oregon as clear and unquestionable. Forestalling all amicable settlement, he takes the alternative of unconditional concession on the part of Great Britain, or war. Every one knew the concession was impossible, and, therefore, (in the language of Mr. Cass) "war was inevitable." Without saying any thing about the taste, what was the wisdom or policy of such a course, I leave to the judgment of others.

This question of war was settled by the firmness of this Senate, and a wise policy on the part of Great Britain. The country owes more, under Providence, to this happy co-operation than to the wisdom or the prudence of the Executive department of the government, or of Mr. Senator Cass. When the historian shall come to consider this part of our annals, I think it probable he may long doubt, as many of us have doubted, the real objects and purposes of the Executive. Whether the Executive bona fide and in fact meant to push out the pretensions he had set up, or whether, feeling that he had come into the Presidency with but little character, he meant to make "a name and a fame" for boldness, spirit, and high patriotism—relying in the last resort upon a mediation between the "British whigs" and the "nullifiers" to hold him up and to thwart and arrest the extreme energy of his patriotism. So, that if he should get neither war nor the whole of Oregon, he might go before the country with high claims for asserting all the people's rights, which he undoubtedly would have obtained but for this unholy coalition. There were some of us who were determined that this shallow stratagem, if it existed at all, should not be played off on us successfully. Whatever were the purposes, this is certain, that the President, when nobody did hold him up, had the coolness and philosophy to hold himself up. "Oh, my countrymen, what a fall!"

Let me do General Cass the justice to say, that when his leader backed out of this dangerous controversy, he submitted with the most imperturbable good humor. General Cass is a warrior, and his leader might have been, had he lived in the days of Agamemnon.

The war with great Britain having been settled—this "name and fame for spirit" might be extinguished forever, if one could not be got up elsewhere. We had exactly the state of relations with Mexico that most favored these ambitious aspirings. With a statesman at the head of our government, the war with Mexico might have been avoided as easily as I can now avoid offering you, sir, a personal indignity. Had the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] remained in the State Department, and his wise counsels could have prevailed, we should have had neither war, or scarcely the rumor of war. The matter of Oregon being settled, with a wise forbearance the Mexican matter would have settled itself. For with all the vaunting and gasconading spirit of Mexico, she never would have thought seriously of war against us but for the hope and expectation that we would at the same time be engaged in war with Great Britain. In that event she might have hoped for much, but alone and single-handed she never would have dreamed of it.

Disregarding this obvious policy, the Executive pushed into Mexico a minister who acted upon them more like a firebrand than a messenger of peace. The President sent an army from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande. That made the war inevitable. It was an act of war—the one-man power in its worst, most dangerous form—and I hold him and his advisers—the country and posterity will hold him and his advisers, General Cass as one of them—responsible for this dangerous violation of the constitution, and for all the blood and treasure that that war has cost our people. It may be that it was not wickedly begun; if not, the President weakly blundered into it, and I may say he blundered out of it; for peace came against all Executive expectation, and when, in truth, they had no one in Mexico authorized to make a treaty. Yet when come it did, it is due to the President to say—he being probably more anxious for peace than any other man in the republic—that he patriotically and, I think, wisely overlooked serious irregularities, and against a strong opposition in his cabinet, took the responsibility and sent the treaty to the Senate. I do not desire to stint my commendation of the course—next to not doing wrong at all, is the virtue of repairing it as soon as possible; and here let me say, in justice to General Cass, that notwithstanding his high war spirit, and that the ten regiment bill was not passed through the Senate, yet with commendable assiduity he set about getting the treaty ratified. But General Cass, not to be thwarted wholly, though he had not got or "swallowed" the whole of Mexico, yet he afterwards got through his ten regiment bill; and but for the Baltimore convention calling him from his post—to the loss of his country—if the ratification in Mexico had been a little longer delayed, it cannot be doubted that Mr. Cass would have got through his twenty regiment bill also.

That this war has been prosecuted from the very first with views of territorial aggrandizement, is now obvious to every one. If it did not originate in views of that sort, it was continued to signalize and illustrate an administration that had little hope of achieving much in the higher walks of statesmanship. Mr. Cass has encouraged, aided, and stimulated every excess. The election of Mr. Cass will be but the elongation of this incompetent and dangerous administration, grown into greater hardihood and rashness by reason of the singular good fortune with which they have escaped the natural consequences of their want of judgment and forecast. The aggressive ambition of this portion of the democracy is boundless and unappeasable. When it shall lift its foot again under the auspices of Mr. Cass, it will be planted on the Sierra Madre, Tehuantepec, and, perhaps, Cuba.

Mr. FOOTE.—Is the Senator opposed to receiving accessions of territory?

Mr. MANGUM.—Yes, sir, I am opposed to the acquisition of a foot of territory by conquest, or in any other manner, unless with the general concurrence of my countrymen. I prize the harmony, mutual confidence, and kindly feelings among the States of this Union, above all acquisitions made, or ever to be made.

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator has announced himself as being opposed to the peaceful acquisition of Cuba?

Mr. MANGUM.—Yes, sir, I am opposed to the acquisition of it, but there may be greater evils than the acquisition of Cuba.—I do not desire to see Cuba change its nationality. I should be unwilling to see that great key, that commanding position in the gulf, in the hands of any great and formidable naval power. It might be a less evil to acquire it. It might be a case requiring the interposition of all our power and resources to prevent it. But these are hasty and unconsidered intimations, and I shall reserve to myself, in imitation of the Senator's model statesman, Mr. Cass, the liberty of giving a new edition, if upon consideration, I shall deem it expedient or necessary. Regarding Mr. Cass as restless and aggressive, as having but little appreciation of any fame, but that which is enthroned under the shadow of laurels steeped in blood—seeing him always ready to augment the Executive power, even now overshadowing and fearful—seeing him always the apologist of Executive usurpation or abuse, having been him for the last four years, always bowing at the footstool of power—in a word, believing him as yielding to power, as he is unsteady in his policy and opinions—I should regard his election, which no body now expects, as a great national blunder, perchance, catastrophy. A race of intense ambition is always dangerous to the virtues. I have thought that I have seen in General Cass a disinclination, and I read no simulated homage to his blunders, the weaknesses, and the vices of this administration, wholly unbefitting a high, proud, pure, intelligent and inflexible patriot. I could hope I have been mistaken; for I owe him personally, no unkindness, but the reverse. It gives me pain to have to deal so freely with his public character. If I speak in a light and irreverent tone of mockery, and scoffing, it may be, that a lurking feeling restrains me from a more stern and burning indignation. If he shall miscarry in his enterprizes of ambition, as from present appearances, miscarry he must—I could hope that no agonizing grief shall fall upon him, to embitter the remnant of life, such as Cardinal Woolsey writhed under, when in his extremity, he exclaimed, "had I served God as diligently as I have served the king, he would not have given me over in my grey hairs."

Sir, I turn from these reflections, and look out for a safe resting place for the country and its great interests in this crisis of troubles and portentous change. I think, I see safety in the great and conservative principles of the whig party, and the representative of that party. I mean General Taylor. And here let me say to the Senator from Mississippi, that I have just read his printed speech in the main with much pleasure. There were a few things I regretted to see. I regretted to see such labored disparagement of General Taylor's understanding. He writes nonsense, says the Senator. I am very sure, when the heat and excitement of debate shall have passed away, the honorable Senator true to his instincts of justice and generosity, will regret the passage even more than I do. Again. The Senator speaks of a letter concocted here, "deceiving and deluding, &c." I know nothing of the origin of the letter. This is certain, whether written by General Taylor or not, its sentiments were his and published by his authority. Now, I appeal to the gentleman's candor, to say, whether he believes that General Taylor would intentionally deceive or delude any human being? Again. Speaking of Mr. Fillmore. The Senator charges him with being favorable to the "Wilmot Proviso," not upon any word that he [Mr. Fillmore] has spoken or written—neither is alleged—but upon circumstantial evidence detailed in a letter of Mr. Croswell's, and upon divers extracts from divers newspapers, &c. Now I submit to the Senator whether angry extracts from partizan and perhaps, venal and subsidized prints, is the sort of evidence that should find its way into this body to impeach or exonerate any one of opposite politics—not by statements of facts, but upon surmise and inference. Sir, it is the least reliable and most untrustworthy evidence of which I can conceive. Libel and vituperation are the vocation of the licentious press. Many an angry and unprincipled libeller fishes up day by day his dirty and dependent bread from the vile pools of slander and calumny. What public man escapes the malignant shafts of a licentious press? If any, he is shielded by his insignificance rather than by his public virtues and public efficiency. Why, sir, let me remind the Senator, that he too, has been the mark for many a personal arrow—for the most unmeasured vituperation. Is there any one here who would rake into those vile reservoirs of calumny, for matter of impeachment against him—him whom we know and respect, for his high impulses and generous and frank nature? No, sir—not one. I would scorn it from the bottom of my heart. That there are presses, and many of them conducted with perfect honor and veracity, we all know—and yet we and they know there are many others, a disgrace to the profession. That great engine of modern civilization is entitled to all respect, when pure, and the severest condemnation when otherwise

But to return—this debate of the honorable Senator's and mine is a sort of model debate—its gyrations, sinuosities, and episodes are without limit, coherence or continuity. I have said safety might be found in the whig policy, and in their leader, General Taylor.

The Senator from Mississippi has drawn a strong and vivid picture of the eminent abilities, the large attainments, and the thorough accomplishments of General Cass in all things pertaining to public affairs—of his steadiness, his perseverance, his manliness, his independence of power—his singleness and frankness—concealing no opinions—giving no conflicting assurances—his fearlessness, as a statesman, of popular clamor—and his abhorrence of being elevated to high station by management, dexterity or in any way, than upon a full inspection and consideration of every act, sentiment, principle, or inclination of his mind. The Senator indicates, that General Cass may be regarded as carrying his heart in his hand, and opening to the public gaze the deep, dark, and mysterious recesses of that most mysterious of all created things. This picture is presented in contrast with that of General Taylor —and this latter exhibits General Taylor as utterly ignorant—as having no mature opinions on public affairs, a mere soldier—as an equivocator—exhibiting woudrous variety as to the substance of his opinions—as having flooded the country with electioneering letters—as a mere epistolary driveller—filling his friends with regret, and his enemies with commiseration—as writing "long, verbose and meaningless letters, full of false grammar, confused ideas, and the most rude and unpolished nonsense." In short, the substance of what the Senator said, is, that General Taylor is an ignorant, equivocating, electioneering character—having no opinions; or, if he have, withholding them, and taking the benefit of conflicting and false interpretations—or, what is the same thing, being "art and part" in a fraud sought to be played off upon the people of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, look on this picture, and now on that—the first is the democratic Hyperion; the latter, the whig Satyr. Now, my first observation is, that if the honorable Senator will strike out the names, and exhibit the pictures simply, there is not a man, woman, or child in the United States that would take the one for General Cass, or the other for General Taylor. I have always heard, and readily believe, that General Cass is unexceptionable and kind in his domestic relations. Why, sir, his very children would not recognize the portrait that the Senator—who is a skillful artist—has painted for their kind, affectionate, and dearly beloved father. And again, those children—some of them I have known as models in excellence and accomplishment—who affectionately wear in their inmost heart the image of their dear father, would see almost as little resemblance between that image and the portrait by the Mississippi artist, as we see between his Hyperion and his Satyr.

But what shall I say of the portrait of General Taylor? Would his children recognize it? No, sir; no. They might look upon it as the picture of a low, vulgar, ragamuffin deserter, who had just returned from the wars. Sir, the artistical skill of the Senator reminds me of a vulgar story that I have seen or heard somewhere of the Dutchman's horse painted at first with masterly and exquisite skill, and exhibited in public with paints and brushes at hand, for all the amateurs—the judges of horse flesh—just to touch and alter, so as to exhibit a perfect animal. The amatuers, (they were doubtless democrats of the genus-locofoco,) went to work, one elongated the ears, another—but you know the story—at length a non-descript was produced, and but for "horse" written under, none could have known what it was ass, lion, or horse. The Senator first works at the ears, (that is instinct—democratic instinct) but he should recollect that the merest dauber might make an ass of Bucephalus—the proud Bucephalus that spurned any rider but the master of the world. I would commend the next efforts to be made upon the mane, and if he can paint a few pearly "dew-drops" on the said mane, he may have awakened in his mind an idea of the noble and powerful animal, before which the demonocratic rambles, and rumbling—will fly.

Sir, to be serious, this studied disparagement of General Taylor need not, and ought not, to excite a feeling of indignation. The ravings of despair are objects of commiseration—not of resentment. They can do no harm. The people of this country have sense, they have sagacity, they have judgment. They are better judges of men, and the worth of men, as I verily believe, than even this Senate. I mean no disparagement of this body—which for talent, virtue, and patriotism, need not shrink from a comparison with any other. But I mean the people live, move, and have their being in a clear, pure, and calm atmosphere; no cliques, no passions, no prejudices, no artificial standards, no personal interests strong as we have to bias and thwart strong, sound, plain, common sense. No, sir, this studied—I must think—ungenerous disparagement, can do no harm. I have no purpose to eulogize General Taylor. It would be as offensive to his simple tastes and delicate sense of self-respect, as it would be unbefitting me. I am not, by nature, strung and tuned to give out the music of eulogy and encomium to men in power, or to be in power. It is not my wont—to me, it would be a new vocation. Sir, I leave him in his simple dignity and grandeur of character—"when unadorned, adorned the most." Would you have the Venus de Medici furbelowed and flounced in the tinselled finery of modern millinary? Would you have the statute of Hercules crowned with a tawdry cap and feathers? Would you have me weave garlands for the pinnacles of the Sierra Madre, that lift their heads and bathe their naked brows in sunlight far above the region of the clouds? Given down to immortality as they are in history, in poetry, and in song, by the associated glories of the hero of Monterey and Buena Vista, I leave them in their simple grandeur. The people well know how to estimate him. His strong sense, fine sagacity, and unerring judgment—firmness of purpose, incorruptible integrity—and his open downright frankness and honesty of heart—firm and fearless as it is kind and humane. His expansive views—looking to the whole country as his country, and every part of the country as his part of the country—knowing no partizan cliques or mere sectional interests—planting himself upon the constitution and the whole constitution, and serving the people and the whole people. All this the people know well.

Sir, I shall support General Taylor, and support him cordially, as the true representative of all the great conservative characteristics of the whig party. I shall support him as a man of peace—as opposed to all wars of conquest—as opposed to that rapacious policy that would pick a quarrel with a neighbor, and then seize his goods. I support him for his sound constitutional views in regard to the relative duties of the respective departments of the government. King Veto will not be put in chains, but confined to his proper sphere. He will not be permitted, as a marauder, to make forays upon every department of the government and upon every public and private interest. I support him also, because I believe he will suffer the will of the people to become the law of the people within constitutional limits; because I believe that things that lie before us in the unknown future may be of vastly more magnitude than all the transient party questions of the day; and because I have confidence in his moderation and good sense above all, in his moderation and right-mindedness. If I have learned any thing in public life, it is, that pure intentions and single-mindedness, with strong good sense, is worth more than the most splendid abilities and the largest experience without them. It would be sad were it otherwise. He who seeks what is right, and seeks it with singleness of mind, will rarely miss it. What care I whether General Taylor can or cannot play at a game of sophisms with expert and dexterous political dodgetricians? What care I whether he can, with "metaphysical scissors,

> Sever and divide
> A hair 'twixt north and northwest side.

What care I whether he has exact and precise views (do we all have them?) upon many of the transient and unimportant questions of the day. Might not Washington have been worried in political metaphysics—say the resolutions of '98 and '99—by many a knight of the green bag, scarce out of his "teens?" and one, too, who would not have been intrusted by his neighbor with the trial of a cause of the value of one hundred dollars? And yet the people intrusted in the hands of that same Washington the honor, the safety, and glory of this great republic. Were they unwise?

What I do care to know is, that his views are moderate, conservative, national—all tending to peace, to wholesome and gradual development, and progress. He who has learned by experience the miseries and horrors of war, if he be a good man, will generally be the most strenuous advocate of peace as long as peace can be preserved with national honor. Who so pacific as Washington? Who could have curbed the wild passions and preserved peace during the phrenzy of the first French revolution but Washington? Who so powerful an advocate of peace on the continent of Europe as he who struggled on a hundred battlefields—Soult? Who has done so much to preserve the peace of Europe as Wellington, the conqueror of Napoleon? And Taylor, with equal virtue, equal moderation, and equal bravery, will act upon the wise maxims of peace.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I do not rise to reply to the Senator from North Carolina, or to follow him through all the windings of his lengthened speech, but simply to make an explanation in relation to the pamphlets which he saw proper to hold up to the Senate as designed, one for the North and the other for the South. Since I made the brief explanation which was hastily given to me by a gentleman, a member of the other House, who happened to be in this Chamber when the charge was made, I have received the full explanation. I put it to the Senator from North Carolina, for whose character as a gentleman of honor I entertain the most sincere regard, whether there is in fact, any importan or essential difference between the two editions of this biography of General Cass? My attention has been called to this matter for the first time by the Senator from North Carolina, and before to-day I never saw the publication. It seems that the first edition was issued in March, and the second in June, and that in the last edition an extract from the proceedings in the national convention is substituted for a reference to the proceedings of certain State conventions which appeared in the first edition. I must confess, then, that I was not prepared for what appeared to me to be the uncandid course of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MANGUM, (in his seat.)—No uncandid course upon my part.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I said what appeared to be an uncandid course; and certainly that was the last quarter in which I expected to find any want of candor. But it is said that there is an omission in relation to the Wilmot proviso. Let us examine this charge presented with such imposing gravity. I find that a brief extract of some nine or ten lines from the letter of General Cass to Mr. Nicholson of Tennessee, is omitted in the June edition. And why? I have the explanation to make by authority from the Gen-office, and I presume no man here will pretend for one instant that either Francis P. Blair or John C. Rives is capable of uttering a falsehood. The young man who wrote this biography of which an edition was issued in March, was desirous, after the nomination had been made at Baltimore, to introduce some new matter—the letter for instance, of General Jackson to General Cass, which was published after the biography was written; and was also desirous to substitute for the State nominations a portion of the proceedings of the Baltimore convention. The price of the work for general distribution was fifty cents a hundred copies, and if new matter had been introduced without omitting some of the old, the size of the pamphlet would of course have been increased and its price enhanced. In these circumstances it became necessary to omit some of the matter in the first edition in order to give place to the additions which were desired.

A SENATOR, (on the whig side)—Indeed!

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Ah! Let him sneer whose heart and conscience are clear of fraud. I now ask the Senator from North Carolina—and I appeal to the whole Senate—if at the first blush it did not appear as if the words "north" and "south" had been inscribed upon the pamphlets by the parties by whom they were issued?

Mr. MANGUM.—I meant, certainly, to convey the idea that the words had been written upon the pamphlets since the publication, and nobody could have supposed otherwise.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—This is a most serious charge. It imputes fraud to the democratic party—a party that to this hour has never been sustained by fraud or collusion—never, never! I will say to him on the authority of the conductors of the Globe office, that not a single copy of the edition published in March has gone to the country since that of June was emitted. Sir, General Cass stands far beyond the reach of any such assaults. What man is there who ever retired from a seat in this body with higher honor. Even Henry Clay himself, who once honored a seat there, on that side of the chamber, never took bolder ground—never more promptly assumed his position upon every question than did Lewis Cass. In vain can you attempt to fasten upon him any charge of inconsistency; and as for this petty fraud which you fancied you had established, his friends spurn it with contempt collectively and individually. We hurl it back, as the offspring of a heart as base and as black as hell itself.

Mr. MANGUM.—Does the Senator mean to apply these odious epithets to me?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—No, sir. Certainly not; I intended to apply them to all who would impute such a despicable fraud to us.

Mr. MANGUM.—I have listened to the explanation of the honorable Senator with a great deal of interest; but I must confess that I am not entirely satisfied. Upon a question so leading—a question so profoundly interesting—a question that is supposed to shake at this moment the very pillars of this Union, I must be permitted to say, the omission, and as it certainly appeared, the studied omission of the sentiments of General Cass in one edition of his biography, while they were retained in another edition does look very much like meditated fraud. At all events, it strikes me that the substitution of an extract from a speech about the French revolution, though its eloquence might have surpassed that of Cicero and Demosthenes, for the declaration of his sentimenis in the Wilmot proviso was in very taste.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Why, what has been excluded? A mere extract from this letter to Mr. Nicholson, which has been published and republished in every paper in the Union.

Mr. MANGUM.—Not only that extract, sir, but the preceding paragraph which draws conclusions, as I undertake to say, utterly erroneous in reference to the contents of that letter. Will the Senator look at it?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I will read it, sir, with great pleasure.

"The Wilmot proviso is such a blot in the history of the legislation of this country, that I cannot but regret that it has ever been introduced into the halls of legislation. I am not prepared to say that I would not, under any circumstances, consent to the principle of a specific purpose, and function to the subject matter involved in this case. By going back to the principles, we go back to the real of peace and safety. Leave to the people, who will be affected by this question, to adjust it upon their own responsibility and in their own manner, and we shall render another tribute to the original principles of our government, and furnish another guarantee for its permanence and preservation."

Mr. MANGUM.—But the honorable Senator excludes the preceding paragraph, beginning with the words, "In December, 1847, General Cass," &c.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Shall I read that also?

Mr. MANGUM.—If you please.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—This is I suppose the paragraph to which the Senator alludes.

"In December, 1847, General Cass gave his views at length upon the 'Wilmot proviso' in a letter to Mr. Nicholson, of Tennessee. In that letter he avowed himself opposed to the measure, and to the exercise of any legislation by Congress, over any of the territories of the United States, respecting the domestic relations of their inhabitants. He believed that all questions of that nature would be settled by the people themselves, who ought to be trusted to regulate their internal concerns in their own way," and that Congress has no more power to abolish or establish slavery in such territories than it has to regulate any other of the relative duties of social life, that of husband and wife, of parent and child, or of master and servant. He said, in conclusion:

I now read a portion of the letter which the Senator from North Carolina did not read.

But, after all, it seems to be generally conceded, that this restriction, if carried into effect, could not operate upon any State to be formed from newly acquired territory. The well known attributes of sovereignty, recognized by usage belonging to the State governments, would sweep before them any such barrier, and would have the people to express and exert their will and pleasure. Is the object, then, of temporary exclusion for so short a period as the duration of the territorial governments, worth the price at which it would be purchased?—worth the discord it would engender, the trial to which it would expose our Union, and the evils that would be the certain consequence, let that trial result as it might?"

Mr. MANGUM.—I did not read that, because I did not have General Cass's whole letter before—I had only the extracts in the pamphlet.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Yet that is the strongest part of the letter, and distinctly—as I understand it—and I think I understand it—asserts———

Mr. MANGUM.—Will the Senator allow me to explain?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Certainly.

Mr. MANGUM.—I did not read it, because it is not contained in either of the editions which I had. That is surely a very satisfactory reason for my neglect. Let me give the history of these various editions. Two were placed in my hands, and I read them in order to ascertain if they were identical. I found that they were precisely so, with the exception of this matter touching the Wilmot proviso. In this one, intended for the South, in an extract from the Nicholson letter, with the commentary of the biographer, and I think his deductions are false. In the other, the only reference to the Wilmot proviso is that contained in a very brief paragraph alluding to Mr. Cass's vote on the Wilmot proviso, and assigning as a reason that it was urged at that time with a view of impairing the reign of the administration in the prosecution of the war. Let me here remind the Senator that I took occasion to remark that I felt it due to myself to state that I imputed nothing to General Cass as taking part in this matter. I know that hungry mendicants hang upon the skirts of all parties—the leeches that desire to gorge themselves—and that they are capable of the lowest, dirtiest, and most detestable artifices.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I believe that I know the author of these biographers of General Cass. He is a young man, whom I have met accidentally. He is about twenty-five years of age, and judging from his countenance, which seems frank and open, I think he is incapable of fraud. But, indeed, there is no fraud in the case. The explanation which I have given, shows that no fraud has been attempted—no fraud committed. Take the whole letter—the famous letter of General Cass to Mr. Nicholson—and can there be any doubt as to the sentiments of our candidate? And certainly you must take the text and the context together. The gentleman from North Carolina is a lawyer, and an able one. He has honored the bench, and knows that it is against every rule of law to extract a single sentence without taking the context. But it does seem strange to me, that representing the gallant old State of North Carolina, the Senator, whom I have always been proud to call my friend, should have assailed General Cass for holding doctrines conservative of the domestic institutions of the Senator's own State.

Mr. MANGUM.—I never made any such charge. I said that he had made no avowal upon the point at issue.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Does not the last extract which I have read contain an avowal—a very strong and explicit avowal? The Senator from North Carolina himself could not desire one more emphatic. But, will my friend pardon me if I ask why it is, that while assailing our candidate for what he thinks proper to term bad principles, he did not come forward with some of the principles of his own candidate? He has assailed our platform at Baltimore—where is your platform at Philadelphia? Here it is—(holding up a blank sheet of paper,) not one solitary principle is inscribed upon it. You take your candidate on trust. You once took John Tyler on trust, and never were curses of execration so deep and so loud as those which you have never ceased to pour out upon his devoted head. But you are ready to take another upon trust. You have nominated General Taylor—and I am the last man alive that would assail him as an individual—I believe him to be a good, honest, brave old soldier. But, by his own admission, he never cast a vote in his life for any officer, from constable up to President. You say you will dictate to him. But we seek in vain for any indications of your policy. True, you assail us for the Independent Treasury, which has given security to the finances of the country; and on account of the tariff of '46, which is this year yielding us thirty-two millions, although you told us it would not bring over sixteen or seventeen millions. You assail us also on account of this Mexican war; but remember that General Taylor was a great instigator of it, and a leading actor in that war. Nay, the Senator from North Carolina himself earnestly aided in giving to that war an official character.

Mr. MANGUM.—(in his seat.)—Protesting against the preamble all the time.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—The Senator says that he cannot comprehend our principles by our resolutions. Let him look at our practice—let him see the results of this very war. I thank the Senator for his aid. His course was patriotic, as I believe his heart to be. The war has resulted in the acquisition of an empire. But, then, the Senator charges us with covering up our principles in language which cannot be comprehended. Pray what proclamation of principle do you make to the country? At Philadelphia—

here, everywhere, it is "old Zack for President and old Whitey for Vice President!" Yes, so it was openly proclaimed in the Philadelphia convention. And are you certain that the gentleman who made that nomination will not be a member of the cabinet, and insist in making "Old Whitey" a judge of the Supreme Court? Caligula made his horse a consul, and built him a golden stable, and an ivory manger, as my friend suggested. These are your principles—this the proclamation of your policy. And yet you assail us for having demolished the bank of the United States, whose gigantic arm overspread the land, and in whose grasp the public liberty had well nigh perished! You assail us for having destroyed your tariff of '42, which built up such colossal fortunes as that of the accomplished gentleman who can give fifty thousand dollars every three or four months to inscribe the name of "Abbott Lawrence," on some great literary or charitable institution. We broke it down, and enacted a law which stopped the accumulation of millions in individual hands, and increased the comfort and the means of the great masses of the people. But, then, you have nominated "Old Zack" and "Old Whitey." It may be that the intelligence of the American people has become suddenly blind. Madness may have seized upon us. The times are portentous. One of the signs of the times was alluded to in a very pleasant spirit by my friend from North Carolina—the demonstration made by that arch-apostate to his country and his party—Martin Van Buren. It may be that madness has seized upon the land, but I will not believe it. On the contrary, I believe that the ides of November will show the Senator from North Carolina and his friends, rising from the banquet which they would fain taste—the banquet of the spoils—as, in the language of England's more than Homer—

> "Rose the Doric strong,
> Herculean Samson, from the harlot lap
> Of Philistean Delilah, and walked > Shorn of his strength."

Yes! in the very act of raising that Taylor flag you are doomed to be forever shorn of your identity and strength.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I do not rise for the purpose, at this time, of discussing the question before the Senate. The Senator from North Carolina informed the Senate that he had in his possession two pamphlets, containing a sketch of the life and services of General Lewis Cass; and that finding them on examination to be different in certain particulars, he was led to believe that one was intended for circulation in the North, and the other for circulation in the South, and had so endorsed them. His reason for that supposition was, that in one of the pamphlets he found, what purported to be the sentiments of Lewis Cass on the Wilmot proviso; and that in the other he was unable to find anything on that subject, except a very brief reference, which was calculated to make the public believe that General Cass would have voted for the proviso in other circumstances. The passage alluded to will be found in the edition which is supposed to have been intended for the North, and is as follows:

> "In the winter of 1847 the Wilmot proviso was introduced into the Senate, as an amendment to the three million bill, by a federal Senator from New England. The design of the mover was evidently to defeat the passage of the bill, by which it was attached, and to embarrass the administration in the prosecution of the war. General Cass voted against the proviso, for reasons given in his speech on the occasion."

It is evident that a casual reader, not acquainted with the reasoning given, would have supposed from this passage that, but for the proposed amendment, General Cass would have voted for it; and that his vote was given against the amendment, in order to prevent embarrassment of the Administration in the prosecution of the war. That paragraph the Senator from North Carolina informed us was also to be found in the pamphlet which he imagined was intended for the South. But, in order to retain it palatable in that latitude, it was accompanied by a portion of a letter said to have been written—and no doubt was written—by General Cass to Mr. Nicholson. And in introducing that he says:

That portion of the edition purporting to be published in March is not to be found in that edition purporting to be issued in June. Taking these two pamphlets together, the Senator from North Carolina was, I think, perfectly justified in supposing that, by whomsoever these two pamphlets were prepared, the opinion to make them exactly the same was for the purpose. That finding an exact similarity between the two in every thing excepting this one particular, he was justified in the inference that the pamphlets were intended for different meridians, and that, as the South felt exceedingly sensitive upon the subject of this interference by Congress with the rights of southern citizens to migrate to the territories of the United States with their slaves, their good opinion was to be won by convincing them that this democratic nominee would veto any bill looking to any such unjust, or supposed to be unjust, discrimination between the rights of citizens of the South as compared with those of the North. Now, I understand the explanation of the honorable Senator from Indiana, which he supposes to be entirely satisfactory, to be this—that the French revolution having intervened, or the intelligence of it having been received, after the issue of the edition of this biography issued in the month of March, it was thought proper by the biographer——

Mr. HANNEGAN, (in his seat.)—And after the nomination at Baltimore.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I understand. It was thought proper by the biographer to give to the public the opinions of General Cass on that revolution and the questions connected with it; and that in order to do so, and at the same time keep the pamphlet within such a compass as would enable the publishers to dispose of it at the contemplated price, it was necessary to omit some portion of the March edition, as otherwise the pamphlet would exceed the number of eight pages, and of course be charged with higher postage.

Mr. HANNEGAN. (in his seat.)—And a higher price. It was done at his own discretion altogether.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That, then, is the explanation. What is it worth? It may be satisfactory to my friend from Indiana, and perhaps, standing per se, it may be satisfactory to others; but notwithstanding the indignant feelings of the Senator from Indiana, expressed with that impulsiveness which characterizes him, and which does dim honor—notwithstanding the emphatic declaration of the Senator that the democratic party is incapable of fraud, he needs not be informed that partizans on either side are sometimes doing that which honorable men would scorn to think of doing. But the explanation has no existence in fact.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I had it from a member of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON.—He may have been taken in, as the Senator was taken in. The unfortunate "federal Senator" [Mr. CURTISS] having heard something of the issue of these pamphlets obtained possession of copies, one of them dated in March and one in June. Now, what will the Senator from Indiana say in behalf of that young man, only "twenty-five years of age," with a countenance beaming with candor and frankness, when he is informed that in the copy of the June edition which has fallen into the hands of the Senator from Vermont there is no such omission!

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I will give you the names of my authorities for the explanation. General Bayly, of Virginia, and Howel Cobb, of Georgia.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Honorable men! And you are "all honorable men!" Now, will my friend from Indiana have the goodness to take that edition dated in March, which came into the possession of the Senator from Vermont, and do me the favor to see whether, on the eighth page of that pamphlet, something is not said of Gen. Cass's opinion of the Wilmot proviso.

Mr. HANNEGAN, (with the pamphlet in his hand.)—Yes, it is here, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Now, that is left out, says the Senator, in the edition of June, in order to make room for additional matter. But I hold in my hand a copy of the edition of June in which that very omitted passage is to be found. So then, we have two editions in June, one intended for the North and the other for the South.

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON.—When I have concluded, I will allow the Senator any thing.

Mr. FOOTE.—I merely wish to know whether these editions were issued by the same authority and by the same person; whether they are not second and third editions of the first pamphlet issued by other persons?

Mr. JOHNSON.—They have all been published at the same office; they are all printed on the same paper, in the same type; and, for aught that has appeared to the contrary, written by the same young man of only "twenty-five years of age," with the frank and candid countenance.

A word or two upon the apparent purposes of that publication, and I have done. It was stated, during the last campaign, (and every one conversant with the history of the election knows that it was true,) that publications were issued to the North which never found their way to the South, and vice versa. I am well aware that my valued friends of the democratic party are as incapable as any of us of perpetrating such a fraud for such a purpose as that of elevating any man to the Presidency—a position conferring honor only when obtained by honorable means. But such things have been done. Why, I ask, in the name of all that is decent, honorable, and of good report, why is it that we find issuing from the "Congressional Globe" office—from the democratic hall—from "Jackson Hall"—two versions of the life of General Cass, the same almost in all particulars, except in this single particular, about which the public mind is more sensitive than on any other subject? Why is it that there issues from that office not only two editions, dated one in March and the other in June, characterized by such a difference; but that, in the month of June, the same month of the same year, in the same city, and from the same office, there is found emanating two editions of this biography marked by the same designed difference? It is no error of the press. The compositor is not to be visited for the sin. How did it happen? It did not do itself. Who did it?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—(in his seat.)—Some villain!

Mr. JOHNSON.—No doubt! I say, too, it was "some villain!" and what has been done since the deed was perpetrated? I make bold to say that hundreds of thousands of these editions of June have been scattered broad-cast over the land—the one in the North and the other in the South. I did rejoice to hear the Senator from Indiana make the explanation which was apparently satisfactory. It gives me unmixed gratification to believe that within the atmosphere of Congress, there could be found no man base enough to act either as employer or employee in the work of attempting thus to deceive the public for such a purpose. But the explanation fails to the ground. The facts set it altogether aside. Talk about "platforms!" There is but one platform which can command any respect. It is the platform of honor and integrity. Honorable men of all parties must unite in indignant reprobation of the miserable artifice—the paltry trick, which this day's discussion has detected and exposed. Nor let it be said that this divergence from the question directly before the Senate, has been profitless, or a waste of time. A base attempt to delude and defraud the American people has been frustrated. The author of it, whoever he may be, stands convicted of "false pretences" in the judgment of the whole community.

Of Gen. Cass's pretensions to the Presidency, I shall speak hereafter on a proper occasion. But if here, no man would more indignantly denounce than he, this miserable trickery which would almost disgrace that class of our fellow men who are so degraded as to seek the means of support by cheating at the gambling table. Their operations are limited to a small circle; but this mode of electioneering, pernicious and detestable as it is, affects the interests of the people of the United States, and not their's alone, but those of all who love constitutional freedom throughout the world.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I am very much surprised by the disclosure which has been made by the Senator from Maryland. Had I been aware that there were two June editions of this biography of General Cass, I would have announced that fact to the Senate.—When I interrupted the Senator, I was satisfied that there must be some mistake about this matter, and I think so still. At once and however, on the part of every democratic member of both houses of Congress, I disclaim all participation in this transaction. On the part of every friend of General Cass, I indignantly repudiate any share in any attempt to deceive the public mind. As to the nature of the occurrence itself, permit me to say one word in reply to my friends from Maryland and North Carolina. The omission, alteration, difference, or by whatever other name you please to call it, is quite unsubstantial. Whoever may be the unhappy and misguided man who made the alteration, if it was designedly done, it is perfectly preposterous to bring the thing forward as a grave charge against General Cass and the democratic party. Why has it been presented here? Is this chamber to become a mere arena for Presidential gladiatorship? Are we to step from our high estate and sink into the mere business of electioneering for rival candidates for the Presidency? I protest against every thing of the kind. I hold a seat in this chamber to be far elevated above all those fancied enjoyments of the station to which so many aspire, and in pursuit of which so many have gone mad. Why should we waste our time in discussing the pretensions of Presidential aspirants? Do you want the history of Lewis Cass? Do you wish to investigate his principles? If you do, go study the history of the country from about the middle of Mr. Jefferson's administration to the present hour. Do you desire to know his political views upon any of the great questions that agitate the country? Go to your journals—to the records of your proceedings and debates, preserved here by your faithful official reporter. There you will find his sentiments declared with that frankness and manliness which characterize him. There is no dodging about him. The record of your debates shows, that he was always prepared to declare his views and sentiments, and that every interrogatory and every demand met a full and prompt response. This is the record that we read daily, north, south, east, and west, and I do protest against this attempt to hold General Cass and the democratic party responsible for this alleged deception.

Mr. MANGUM.—We do not hold him responsible for it.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Well, then, I have nothing more to say on the subject.

Mr. FOOTE.—It must be obvious to all that the Senator from Maryland has failed most egregiously in his attempt to establish his charge of there having been two editions of the life of Cass published in this city under democratic direction, one for circulation in the North, and the other in the South; differing from each other in regard to the Wilmot proviso. The truth is—as I am told can be easily proved, if necessary—that there never have been two editions on hand at the Globe office at the same time; and that, of all the editions published, as large a number were sent to one section of the Union as to the other. In addition, I will remark, that there is really no repugnance, or very material difference of any kind, between the two editions which have been subjected to criticism here, so far as the Wilmot proviso is concerned. One of these editions runs somewhat more into detail on this subject than the other, which it was deemed expedient to enliven and adorn with the letter of General Jackson, and General Cass's views in regard to the revolutionary movements in France—a subject which he is well known to have discussed at a public meeting in this city some time after the first edition of his life had issued from the press. Besides, sir, this earnestly urged charge becomes perfectly ridiculous when we reflect upon the fact that General Cass's letter to Mr. Nicholson, plainly declaring his hostility to the Wilmot proviso, has been published, in pamphlet form, by thousands upon thousands, and distributed all over the republic, and has been republished in every leading democratic and whig newspaper on the continent; so that it cannot be possible that any intelligent man can any where be ignorant of his true attitude. Why, sir, I have seen some ten or a dozen different lives of General Taylor, and some of them ridiculous enough, God knows; but who ever thought of holding him or the whig party responsible for any of them? I will not argue this matter gravely; I scorn to do so; it is unworthy of this body and the respectable Senator who introduced it to our notice.

The Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] has closed his elaborate defence of General Taylor; an address characterized by ability, learning, and a peculiar astuteness of mind. But all will admit, who have listened to it, that he has given no new information to the Senate and the country relative to General Taylor's political opinions. This is just as I had anticipated, and had before-hand ventured to predict. Surely, if any one knows anything positively on this subject, the Senator from North Carolina cannot remain in ignorance. He is one of the most prominent leaders of the whig party; and though it be true, as he says, that he is but newly initiated in the Eleusinian mysteries of Taylorism, yet sufficient time having elapsed since General Taylor's nomination to allow the Senator from North Carolina to give in his adhesion to him, I do not see why we might not reasonably demand from him one or two substantial political reasons at least for supporting him as a Presidential candidate. If not originally as much in the confidence of his chosen candidate as some others, I trust that he at least occupies such an attitude at present as will enable him to learn all that it is important for him to find out concerning the principles of his candidate, to enable him to do efficient service in his support.

Mr. President, I regret that my friend, the Senator from North Carolina, who so decidedly declines a regular vindication of the whig ticket, should have put himself to the trouble of assailing that of the democratic party. More especially do I regret that he should have gone out of his way to denounce General Cass's alleged change of opinion upon the Wilmot proviso. I have heretofore explained the conduct of General Cass in regard to this imputed change of opinion, and will not trouble the Senate further on the subject at this time. But before my friend from North Carolina so boisterously complains of General Cass's supposed inconsistency, and charges it so fiercely to be a deeply disreputable thing for a statesman of years and experience to undergo and confess the least alteration of judgment upon a grave public question, I am of opinion that it would be at least decent in him to reflect, that perchance he is not himself now the advocate here of all the principles which he once zealously maintained. I shall not go at large and minutely into the history of that worthy Senator, for the purpose of pointing out his inconsistenceies; but there is one remarkable change of opinion, made manifest by the Senator for the first time, I believe, in the progress of this debate, which is altogether so glaring and material that he will excuse me for making specific reference to it. He will please recollect, that while the Senator from North Carolina was addressing the Senate, I propounded several interrogatories to him, which he undertook to answer. Among them were the following: What were General Taylor's views touching the origin of the Mexican war? Did he believe it to have arisen by the act of Mexico, or by the act of the United States? Was Mexico in the right in regard to the commencement of the war, and our country in the wrong? Or was Mexico in the wrong, and our country in the right? The honorable Senator avowed that he could not answer for General Taylor, but had no hesitation in answering for himself; and, in doing so, declared, that it was his deliberate conviction that the war had been commenced by the President of the United States, and unjustly and unnecessarily commenced by him. I shall not stop now to defend the President and our own country from the present animadversions of the Senator from North Carolina. I prefer reminding the Senator of what he himself said in this body, on a very noted occasion. When, sir, on the 12th day of May, 1846, a bill was received from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act providing for the prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the Republic of Mexico," and was undergoing considering in this chamber, the honorable Senator from North Carolina addressed the Senate at some length, and used, in the progress of his speech, the following language:

"He had no disposition to embarrass the passage of the bill. He should, however, greatly hesitate to vote for it in its present shape, inasmuch as it was equivalent to a declaration of war; but he was prepared at once to vote supplies to any amount, whether of men or money. All he asked was, that the political question as to the actual existence of a war might be separated from the vote of supplies. If the friends of the Administration wished their fifty thousand men and their ten millions of dollars, they could have both in half an hour, if they would not embarrass the bill by connecting it with the other questions." * * * * "They were not willing to assume the fact, without evidence, that a state of war between the United States and Mexico did actually exist. Suppose that the troops which crossed the Rio Grande [Mexican troops of course] had acted without the authority of their Government, (as now, Mr. President, we know they did not,) and that the collision which had unhappily taken place was owing to their own unauthorized act, was any Senator prepared to say that, according to the doctrines of national law, this constituted a state of war between the two nations? The act of these military officers might yet be disavowed," &c. * * * * "If we were actually at war, then he was under the impression that our forces ought to cross the river, and that we should not stop until we had dictated peace at the capital of the Mexican empire."

Well, Mr. President, we have since ascertained, and the Senator will not deny the fact, that all which was done by the Mexican officers and soldiers referred to, so far from being disavowed by their government, was done by express orders of that government, and has been repeatedly sanctioned and justified in the most solemn and formal manner. We all know that a state of war did actually exist on the 12th day of May, 1846, not by the unauthorized act of Mexican officers and soldiers, but under the express authority of the Mexican government; and the President ascertaining these to be the actual facts of the case, did, in accordance with the recommendation of the Senator from North Carolina, use all the men and money placed in his hands, in the vigorous prosecution of the war, and has actually "dictated peace at the capital of the Mexican empire." And now what is the conduct of the Senator from North Carolina? Why, he turns short round upon the President, asserts that he brought it on, and not the Mexican government at all, and denounces him the harshest manner for what he has thought it incumbent upon him to do in vindication of the national honor. If the Senator from North Carolina will specify one such act of inconsistency in the whole history of General Cass as a statesman, I shall be willing to admit that the censures which he has bestowed upon him are not wholly undeserved.

Mr. NILES—I think, sir, that the Senator from Mississippi has done remarkably well! I rise only for the purpose of saying, that considering this as a "ratification meeting," and comparing it with the accounts of similar meetings all over the land, I must congratulate the Senate and the country that it has been conducted with so much decorum and propriety! There have been no cheers, no groans, no hisses. All that seems to be wanting is the introduction of a resolution for the ratification of the nominations of Presidentinl candidates. Whatever their powers of defence, I must congratulate honorable gentlemen on both sides on their ability in assault. They have reminded me of an anecdote of Dr. Franklin. Two men got into a violent quarrel, and after abusing each other, and calling all sorts of hard names, they agreed to refer the matter to the Doctor. The Doctor heard their statements, and then remarked, that he did not understand the matter himself, but it was undeniable that the individuals aggrieved seemed to understand each other remarkably well. In the present instance each party appears to have a much better acquaintance with his opponent's side than with his own! Each has been very successful in attacking the candidate of the opposite side, but neither successful in defending his own. I rose for the purpose of saying that I think this irrelevant debate has proceeded far enough; and I shall feel it to be my duty to make a point of order if it is persisted in.

Mr. CLAYTON then obtained the floor, and,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 5, 1848.

REPORT FROM THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate, a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, communicating information in possession of the Treasury Department, in regard to the manner in which the interest on the public debt has been paid at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and other places, which was read and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. NILES presented two petitions of citizens of Troy, New York, praying a reduction of the postage on letters.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.

SURVEY OF RED RIVER.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for a survey of the Red river from its mouth to the head of its navigable waters, which was read the first and second time by unanimous consent; and it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and that it be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a joint resolution designating of two brass field pieces captured at the battle of Bennington in 1777, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled bill, I am directed to bring it to the Senate for the signature of their President.

THE ADJOURNMENT RESOLUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution passed by the House of Representatives, fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. NILES.—I gave notice the other day, that if this debate was followed up, I should raise a point of order.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I believe I have the floor.

Mr. NILES.—I will allow the Senator to proceed of course, as he is entitled to the floor; but if he pursues the irrelevant course which this debate has already assumed, I shall be compelled to call him to order.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I do not know that I should have troubled the Senate upon this resolution, in relation to the subject which is the common topic of discussion here, had I not been directly and personally appealed to by the Senator from Mississippi, who seems to apprehend that I have some particular knowledge of the views and opinions of General Taylor upon the various political questions which are agitated in this country. I am averse, as all who know any thing of my course here will acknowledge, to the introduction of topics which are irrelevant to the matter before the Senate, and I feel now the awkwardness of my position in rising to discuss, before such a body as this, matters which have no sort of pertinency to the subject under consideration. Yet, appealed to as I have been by the Senator, I cannot withhold a full and free expression of my own opinions in regard to those topics which have excited so much interest in him. Let me say in the outset I have no other means of access to the opinions of General Taylor than those which every other citizen of this republic has.

Mr. NILES.—I rise to a question of order. And my point of order is, that this discussion, in regard to the character, qualifications, and general fitness of General Taylor, of General Cass, and other candidates for the Presidency, is irrelevant to the question before the Senate, and hardly consistent with the decorum of this body, or the dignity which we ought to maintain. It is a range of debate which, I believe, has never been tolerated here since I have had the honor of a seat in this body.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I very much regret, that the Senator from Connecticut should have felt bound to raise this question of order. Since the Senator intimated his intention to raise the question, I have examined the rules of the Senate, and I can find nothing therein, that will authorize the Presiding Officer to determine that this debate is not pertinent to the subject of the resolution. Besides, if Congress can settle the point, as to who is best entitled to be elected to the Presidential chair, the people will be relieved from the trouble of determining the question.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senator is aware, that a matter of this sort must be decided without debate.

Mr. FOOTE.—I wish to set myself right.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—The question must be decided without debate.

Mr. FOOTE.—I merely desire to make an explanation.

Mr. BERRIEN.—The Senator's object can be attained, by taking an appeal from the decision of the chair. The question will then be open to debate.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I wish to say a word before the chair decides.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—Oh, no, let the decision be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT stated that he had been, for several days, of opinion that the debate on this resolution had taken too wide a range; and now, that the point was made, he decided that the Senator from Delaware was out of order.

Mr. CLAYTON.—From that decision I appeal; and I wish to state to the Senate the grounds upon which I make the appeal. The honorable Senator from Mississippi, who introduced this subject into the discussion, told us that he supposed that gentlemen on this side of the chamber—friends of General Taylor—were anxious for an early adjournment, and their object was to avoid a discussion of those very topics to which he said he was about to provoke us. This subject, then, having been connected with the discussion upon the resolution, I think it is not out of order for us to pursue it. We wish to show, what is true, that we do not aim to shorten the session for the purpose of avoiding any question that may be proposed. And I think I need only appeal to the justice of gentlemen on the other side, after all that has occurred here, to allow us to be heard in reply to the interrogatories of the Senator from Mississippi. The debate has proceeded until all that can be said on one side has been said, and now with what propriety can gentlemen refuse to allow us to reply? I make my appeal to their sense of justice as well as their generosity, to reverse the decision of the chair.

Mr. MANGUM.—With a view that no precedent may be set to embarrass the progress of the Senate, I move that the question of order, together with the appeal lie upon the table. I understand the effect of that motion will be to leave the discussion open as before.

Mr. TURNEY.—The chair has decided the discussion to be out of order, and it must be so considered, therefore, until that decision is reversed.

Mr. MANGUM.—My purpose is, if the motion I have made prevails, to follow it with another motion, that the Senator from Delaware be permitted to proceed.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Will the Senator withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. MANGUM.—Certainly.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I am sorry that this debate has arisen, but having arisen, and having been permitted to proceed thus far, I doubt the propriety of cutting off the debate at its present stage. The point of order should have been made earlier, and not having been made, the better way will be to permit it to go on to its conclusion, with the understanding that it shall conclude to-day.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I feel all the embarrassment of my position under the sense of duty which, as a member of this body, I feel that I owe to the country. I would hear the Senator from Delaware with great pleasure; I believe with the Senator from South Carolina, that the debate ought to have been arrested long ago, but I cannot persuade myself, that because I have failed to do my duty heretofore, I am absolved from the obligation to perform it now. I ask of Senators, if we are meeting the wishes of our constituency by a discussion of this sort? We are approaching the termination of the session; there is important business to transact; the country is looking to us to transact it, and we are doing what? Employing our time with the discussion of questions with which we have nothing to do. I cannot, under a sense of the duty I owe to the country, acquiesce in this thing. I regret that the debate has gone thus far, and I regret that gentlemen, if the decision of the chair is sustained, will not have an opportunity of expressing their views as fully as they desire upon all questions; yet I think that the Senator from Connecticut in making the motion he has made, has performed the duty that was incumbent on him.

Mr. FOOTE.—It is most evident from the remarks of gentlemen who, I think, have not weighed the matter as they should have done, before they made those remarks, that I am responsible as the originator of this debate. The debate is pronounced to be out of order, and I am recognized as the main offender. I am very clear that this debate is as strictly in order as any debate that has occurred since I have been a member of this body. Who is to prescribe for us the course of argument we are to pursue upon any question? I presume there can be no rule of the Senate which makes it necessary that a member should practice hypocrisy, and conceal his real opinions. I entertain an opinion—and that opinion I have stated solemnly and earnestly—that the desire manifested by some members of the body to have an early day for adjournment was dictated by a disinclination on their part to meet certain issues. I stated that I was anxious to ascertain what disposition was likely to be made of a great question connected with the organization of the territories of Oregon, California, and New Mexico; I was desirous that that question should be settled before we adjourned, for if not settled, I apprehended that fearful consequences might ensue. And I stated, with equal explicitness, that I was unwilling that Congress should draw its labors to a close before we had ascertained the views and opinions of a certain distinguished member of the whig party, who is before the people as a candidate in the Presidential contest. Is it not a fact, that members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, have been part and parcel of the convention by which their candidate was nominated, and is it not reasonable to demand that they should disclose, upon what principles the contest is to be conducted on their part? I confess that I am responsible for the commencement of this debate, and I know that most of the members of this body with whom I am in the habit of acting, so far from censuring me for having done so, record their approbation; and as to the debate being irrelevant, Senators will bear me out in saying that it is not more so than many other debates that have taken place here. Some years ago, I recollect, the Senator from Massachusetts made one of the most masterly speeches ever made in ancient or modern times, and the Senator from South Carolina, in replying to that speech, remarked that the Senator had spoken upon every question but the one before the Senate, and to that he had not given even a passing glance. I have heard a good deal said about Senatorial usage, and I undertake to say that Senatorial usage will bear me out in the course I have pursued in relation to this debate. If I am wrong, I have not erred without precedent. And not to allow the Senator from Delaware an opportunity to discuss the question would be doing him serious wrong.

Mr. HAMLIN.—I was myself gratified that the Senator from Connecticut deemed it his duty to arrest this debate. I shall vote to sustain the decision of the chair, because I believe it is right, and because we can do it without discourtesy to the Senator from Delaware. I design to do it without entering at all into the question as to the propriety, or the importance, or the origin of this debate. When this resolution came from the other house, the opinion was expressed by gentlemen who had long held seats on this floor, that we should undoubtedly be able to adjourn at a much earlier period of time, if we were to agree upon a time for adjournment and return the resolution to the House. In the discussion of the resolution it would certainly be appropriate to allude to the various subjects that will necessarily come before us for our consideration, but it would be clearly out of order and inappropriate to discuss the principles or the merits of those measures for the purpose of deciding upon a longer or shorter period as the time for adjournment. I shall be as much gratified as any member of this body to listen to the Senator from Delaware when he shall have occasion to address the Senate, and I would suggest to the Senator, if it would be equally satisfactory to him, to let us hear from him upon some question that will hereafter come before us, to which the remarks that he proposes to make will be more appropriate. I trust, however, that the decision of the chair will be sustained, for it is in accordance with parliamentary law, and it will enable us the sooner to close our duties here. If the interests of the country were to be forwarded by it I should be willing, for one, to sit here in ratification meeting during the remainder of the year; but as I conceive that there is no propriety whatever in such a course I trust that this debate will be closed.

Mr. MANGUM.—I hope the Senator from Delaware will withdraw his appeal.

Mr. CLAYTON withdrew the appeal.

Mr. MANGUM.—I now move that the Senator from Delaware be permitted to proceed, and upon that motion I call the yeas and nays.

They were ordered.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I wish I could find in the motion which is now submitted to the Senate a relief from the embarrassment which I feel upon this occasion; but I cannot; and the yeas and nays being called I desire briefly to say, that the appeal of the Senator from Delaware being withdrawn, the decision of the chair that this debate is out of order, stands as the decision of the Senate. This is, then, a motion that the Senator from Delaware be permitted to proceed out of order. Upon that question I am willing to respond by my vote.

Mr. DOWNS.—I am very sorry that I feel it my duty to oppose this motion. I should certainly be gratified to hear the Senator from Delaware, and if I thought that justice to him required that he should be allowed to proceed, or if the debate had been entered into upon one side alone, I should certainly vote for the motion; for although I consider it very unfortunate that the debate has taken place, still I would not have refused an opportunity to gentlemen on that side of the chamber to participate. But is it not a fact that the debate has been confined to one side of the chamber. Gentlemen of both parties have entered into it, and if there be any difference, those upon that side of the chamber have been heard to the greatest extent. Now, it seems to me, that the debate ought to proceed no further, for if we have a speech from the eloquent Senator from Delaware, shall not we on this side desire to reply to it? In this way, there would be no end to the discussion. To sustain this motion would be, in effect, annulling the decision of the chair. I hope that by common consent the debate will now be terminated.

Mr. BORLAND.—It seems to me that until we have heard what it is that the Senator from Delaware is going to say, it is difficult to determine whether he is out of order or not. It is certainly an extraordinary course to decide that a Senator is out of order in debate before he has commenced his remarks.

Mr. BADGER.—I shall vote for the affirmative of this question, and I wish to state in three words why I shall do it. With the greatest respect towards the Presiding officer of this body, I am of opinion that the decision made by him upon the point of order was not a correct one; and I regret that the honorable Senator who took the appeal thought proper to withdraw it. I understand the case to be this—and I have learned it from the decisions of the Presiding officer heretofore made—when a debate arises upon any question, and gentlemen go into a discussion of matters not strictly pertinent to the question before the Senate, it is out of the power of any member, or of the Presiding officer, to arrest the progress of the debate, if not arrested at its inception; because it involves the unanimous consent of the Senate that the subject shall be discussed; and unanimous consent takes it out of the parliamentary rule.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I find nothing in the rules of the Senate in relation to irrelevancy; the question of relevancy or irrelevancy, then, I apprehend is left altogether to the discretion or sense of propriety of Senators. And I should regret to see any rule enforced here which would limit and restrict debate. This body is differently constituted from almost every other legislative body. Its members being the representatives of sovereign States, the same rules, therefore, which apply to other representative bodies do not necessarily apply to this. I can see no great harm that can arise from any irrelevant debate that may occur here, for public opinion operating upon those who engage in such a debate will always serve to restrain it within due bounds. I shall vote for the motion for leave to proceed.

Mr. BUTLER.—The question has assumed some degree of complexity. It would seem that we were denying the Senator from Delaware the right to reply; but the form in which the question presents itself will not change my decision, nor induce me to alter my course in regard to it. I shall vote to sustain the decision of the chair. I would be as willing as any Senator to indulge the Senator from Delaware, but this debate has assumed a latitude unknown certainly heretofore in the American Senate. I dislike very much the tone of the debate; it is altogether unworthy of the Senate.

Mr. FOOTE.—I understand the Senator from South Carolina to say that the course the debate has taken is in violation of Senatorial usage, and that it does not harmonize with the dignity of this body. I should suppose that the magnitude and importance of the subject discussed would make it harmonize with the dignity of any deliberative body; and with regard to irrelevancy, I beg to call the Senator's attention to the case to which I have referred, where a distinguished Senator spoke for hours and days, without touching upon the question before the Senate. There are numerous cases of the same kind that might be cited, but this will suffice; and unless the Senator is prepared to disprove this precedent, I shall certainly expect from him some modification of this assertion, that a debate of this kind is without precedent. I maintain that, if I have erred in originating this discussion, I have erred with men distinguished for wisdom, and I would rather err with such men, than be in the right with ordinary men.

Mr. BUTLER.—I assure my honorable friend from Mississippi, that I had no intention of censuring him for having originated the debate. What I object to is that a debate so latitudinous in its character should be pursued. The Senator probably was not aware to what extent it would be carried, but he should recollect that sometimes, "Large streams from little fountains flow."

Mr. NILES.—The question now before us is a novel one in this body, or in any other. By a vote of the Senate upon yeas and nays, we are to decide whether a member of this body shall proceed in his speech "out of order." I am not disposed to debate that question. The point ordinarily is where a member has been called to order, that he shall be allowed to proceed "in order," and this carries with it an admonition to the Speaker, or Presiding Officer to keep him in order if he can.

But this debate has extended to the great issues that are before the country, and I beg to know if those issues have any bearing whatever upon the question of the adjournment of Congress? Sir, I have raised the question of order for two reasons: not merely because the debate was irrelevant—for I am an advocate for the utmost freedom of debate—but because I believed the debate to be unsuitable to the dignity of this body—derogatory to the position which I hope the Senate of the United States will ever maintain. Another reason was the importance of disposing of the public business, which is urgently demanding our attention. And we have now had a debate which has consumed two days of the session, upon matters not connected with any one of the subjects of legislation before us, but relating to the views and opinions of the candidates who are to be brought forward at the Presidential election. What must be the judgment of the people of this country upon such a proceeding as this? I have listened to the debate with the deepest pain and regret; and Senators contend that it cannot now be arrested, having been allowed to go on thus far. This is a very extraordinary position indeed. If the debate was out of order at the beginning, does it become less so because it has been permitted to proceed for two days? And shall we suffer it to go on for weeks?—and that immediately consequent on the statement that has gone out, of the urgency of the public business and of the difficulty of disposing of it for want of time? It must be manifest to Senators that we are recklessly wasting the time in speeches that properly belong to the stump. It is a course of proceeding that is altogether unbecoming the Senate of the United States.

Mr. FOOTE.—I must be permitted to vindicate myself from the aspersion of having introduced a discussion that is unbecoming and derogatory to the dignity of the Senate. The Senator from Connecticut characterizes this debate as an indecent and reckless waste of time. If the Senator intends to apply such epithets to me, I hurl them back. I think the Senator was unfortunate in the selection of his phrases.

Mr. NILES.—My remarks had no relation to the connexion which the Senator has with the debate; they were in reference to the state of the public business.

Mr. FOOTE.—I understood the Senator as referring to the introduction of the discussion when he used the term. I would rather have any character in the world fixed on me than that of reckless. The Senator says that questions have been discussed here that the Senate has nothing to with. The Presidential election involves certain questions which are necessarily associated with it in the mind of every intelligent man in the United States. Now, let me ask this question—it is a grave question: Whether the Senator considers it more indecent or reckless to have these matters discussed here in courteous terms, or to sit at our desks and do what I belive the Senator has lately done, indite a long epistle to a certain newspaper in New England, entitled the "Liberator?" discussing a certain subject in a style not only little becoming a Senator of the United States, but were it not for the respect which I entertain for the Senator, I would say in a reckless manner—in a manner calculated to make every patriot ashamed of the author of such a production? Sir, the honorable Senator knows to what I allude. I ask the Senator whether he will not permit us, who are not so fond of leiter writing, but who prefer a friendly interchange of opinion here to filling the columns of newspapers with coarse and vituperative language, to indulge our preference? and I appeal to his magnanimity to bear with us, and I contend that he has furnished us with an excellent example for the discussion which has here taken place.

Mr. NILES.—I do not know that the Senator from Mississippi is responsible for any letter I may write.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland—(interposing.)—What is the question before the Senate?

PRESIDING OFFICER.—The question is upon the resolution fixing the time for the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—Then I call the honorable Senator to order.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—The Senator from Connecticut is about to speak in reference to a letter said to be written by him. I have not the slightest objection to hear the Senator upon that or any other question, but if he is about to enforce upon the Senator from Delaware a rule, I insist that the same rule shall be applied to himself. I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Connecticut shall be permitted to proceed equally with the Senator from Delaware, but I am entirely unwilling that he shall go into new matter, and take up the time of the Senate with reference to topics which he will not allow the Senator from Delaware to discuss. I ask the decision of the chair.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—If the Senator goes into a vindication of the letter referred to, it will be out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I now move that the Senator have leave to proceed.

Mr. BRIGHT moved that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow, with a view of taking up the Oregon bill; and on this question he demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Buckmaster, Dix, Dodge, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Hunter, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Walker—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Berrien, Bayhie, Calhoun, Cameron, Clarke, Clayton, Davis, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Foote, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Metcalf, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Tappan, Underwood, Upham, Webster, Westcott—29.

Mr. TURNEY moved that the resolution lie on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays thereon, which were ordered.

The question being taken upon the motion of Mr. TURNEY, it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Davis, of Mississippi, Downs, Hunter, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, and Turney—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Bodland, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Metcalf, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, Walker, and Westcott—32.

Mr. NILES resumed, and said that he only intended to show that the cases were not at all parallel. His position was, that they were responsible for the waste of time consequent upon the introduction of irrelevant matters in debate. In regard to his own course in the Senate or out of it, he was not called upon to defend it—not at all. He might submit to the Senate whether it was most consonant with the dignity that was supposed to belong to the Senatorial character, to write a political letter in answer to a call, at his room, or to leave the body and be absent for a week in the train of a political candidate—as a sort of tail to a Presidential kite. But he would not go into that matter.

Mr. BADGER.—Before the question is taken I beg to read the decision of the presiding officer, to which I referred a few minutes since. I find by reference to the official reports of proceedings and debates, that, on a motion to take up the bill for the occupation of Yucatan on the 4th of May last, a debate sprung up in this body about a great many matters, which were universally considered as not at all relevant to the question pending. After some time had been thus spent, I find that this decision of the presiding officer proceeded upon the ground that all the rules of the Senate are subject to be dispensed with by common consent. And if this be true in regard to the most solemn and strict rules of the body, there certainly cannot be any hesitation in applying the principle to a general parliamentary rule regulating the conduct of debate. The case is entirely analagous to the present.—It is clearly the duty of the presiding officer to arrest an irrelevant debate, but, if no objection is taken it is considered that the unanimous consent of the Senate has dispensed with the rule.—The rule becomes pro hac vice, suspended.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, said that if the question were on the decision of the chair, he should vote to sustain it. But, as that was not the question, and as the Senator from Mississippi had in the course of his remarks referred directly to the Senator from Delaware, he should now vote in favor of allowing that Senator to proceed.

Mr. HALE remarked that he had great respect, nearly approaching to reverence, for the Senator from Delaware, but his conviction of the impropriety of the debate was so deep, that he would be compelled to vote against giving him liberty to proceed.

Mr. FOOTE.—I am not at all surprized at the course of the Senator from New Hampshire, inasmuch as he never was guilty of any violation of parliamentary rules.

Mr. HALE.—Well, I did'nt mean to surprise any body!

Mr. TURNEY.—The motion is to allow the Senator to proceed out of order. That would establish a very bad precedent. I move to lay the motion on the table; and ask for the yeas and nays.

Two members only rising, the yeas and nays were not ordered; and

Mr. TURNEY withdrew his motion.

The question was then taken upon the motion to allow the Senator from Delaware to proceed, by yeas and nays, with the following result:

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. MANGUM, that the Senator from Delaware be allowed to proceed, and it was determined in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Borland, Breese, Calhoun, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Foote, Greene, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Metcalf, Miller, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Westcott—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Benton, Berrien, Bradbury, Bright, Butler, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Hale, Hamlin, Hunter, Mason, Niles, Sebastian, Turney, Walker, and Yulee—22.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Mr. President: The decision of the chair was indeed unprecedented, and directly in opposition to his own solemn decision, on a case precisely similar to this, made by him only a few weeks ago. Neither I nor my friends originated this political debate. We were content to leave Gen. Cass and Gen. Taylor in the hands of the people, and the Senate will unanimously bear me witness, that I have never introduced an irrelevant topic into any debate here. The political friends of the gentleman who occupies the chair began this discussion. They attacked Gen. Taylor and his character, and scoffed at his claims to the Presidency. They were allowed to proceed without interruption from the chair, through a debate which extended through the greater part of two days. The Vice President was, by the rules of the Senate, bound to call his own political friends to order, if he thought the debate was out of order. But not a word about order was heard from his lips till I took the floor to reply, and then he arrested the debate, and put a seal upon my lips. The Senator from Mississippi had charged upon me and my friends that we desired to evade the discussion—that Gen. Taylor had no principles which we dared to avow—and said that he had, on consultation with his friends resolved to provoke us to a debate on this subject, and to see that we should "dodge no blows which in chivalry and honesty we were bound to take." He even charged us with a design to pass the resolution for a speedy adjournment of Congress in order to avoid and dodge this very discussion. He went further, sir. He called on me personally to meet him in debate on these questions. Yet, after he had been permitted to indulge in this strain of attack on me and my friends, his own party associates seize the occasion, the moment I rise to take up the glove he has thrown at my feet, to dodge the encounter. These are the circumstances under which twenty-one democratic Senators have this day voted to deny me the freedom of speech. They have a large party majority here, but such and so gross was the injustice of this attempt to stifle a discussion which they themselves provoked, that a majority of the Senate has overruled their purpose; and to that majority, and especially to the chivalrous Senator from Mississippi, [Mr FOOTE,] who has expressed his own deep sense of the injustice done, I tender my thanks.

I have already stated to the Senate that I have no means of access to the opinions of Gen. Taylor, which are not in the possession of every member of this body, and every citizen of the country.—Honoring his character, as I sincerely do, I have never yet had the pleasure of an introduction to that distinguished man—I have never addressed a letter to him in my life, nor received one from him. I have formed my opinions of the principles of the man from his writings and actions, and from what any other may have seen in the public prints. To these means of information all have equal access, and all can form an opinion as well as I can, on the whole subject of debate.

I think it is also due to General Taylor to say, in the outset, that the position which he has assumed before the country, as a candidate for the Presidency, has been entirely misapprehended in the course of this debate. He has been held up here as merely a whig candidate, bound to sustain every whig principle with which that party has ever been identified. It has been alleged that he is bound to carry out all the dictates, and obey all the behests of a mere party—that he runs merely as a party man—that he is bound hand and foot by party pledges—and, that he must carry out, at all hazards, and under all changes of time and circumstances, every ancient known measure proposed by the whig party. Now, undoubtedly Gen. Taylor is a whig, but I do understand him as occupying any such position as that which I have just described. He, himself, has repudiated it in every letter having reference to this subject. It is true that he has been nominated by the whig party; but it is also true that he was originally nominated by a meeting composed both of whigs and democrats. Thousands of democrats had nominated him for the Presidency before he was nominated by the whig party. Naturalized citizens and native Americans, in all sections of the country had nominated him before he received the nomination of the Philadelphia convention. And now, the great objection urged against him, is that the whig party of the Union has confirmed the nomination which Gen. Taylor had previously received. He was nominated by the whig convention at Philadelphia, with the assurance that he was a whig. In every letter that he wrote on that subject, he declared that he was a whig, but he uniformly took the bold and manly ground, that if elected President of the United States, he should not consider himself the mere servant or tool of a party, but even of the party to which he had been attached, but that he should be the President of the American people. Under these circumstances, the honorable gentleman from Mississippi can find no difficulty in answering the questions which he has propounded with regard to the principles of Gen. Taylor. If he will examine the principal letter which Gen. Taylor has written with reference to this subject, the letter to Capt. Allison, he will see the ground on which he places himself as a candidate before the American people. Before I proceed further, permit me to read the following extract from that letter:

"BATON ROUGE, April 22, 1848.

"First—I reiterate what I have often said. I am a whig, but not an ultra whig. If elected I would not be the mere President of a party. I would endeavor to act independent of party domination. I should feel bound to administer the government untrammelled by party schemes.

"Second—the veto power. The power given by the constitution to the Executive to interpose his veto, is a high conservative power; but in my opinion should never be exercised except in cases of clear violation of the constitution or manifest hasty and want of consideration by Congress. Indeed, I have thought that for many years past the known opinions and wishes of the Executive have exercised much and unnecessary influence upon the legislative department of the government; and for this cause I have thought our system was in danger of undergoing a great change from its true theory. The personal opinions of the individual who may happen to occupy the Executive chair, ought not to control the action of Congress upon questions of domestic policy; nor ought his objections to be interposed where questions of constitutional power have been settled by the various departments of government, and acquiesced in by the people.

"Third—Upon the subject of the tariff, the currency, the improvement of our great highways, rivers, lakes, and harbors, the will of the people, as expressed through their representatives in Congress, ought to be respected and carried out by the Executive.

"Fourth—For Mexican war. I sincerely deprecate the prospect of peace. My life has been devoted to arms, yet I look on war at all times, and under all circumstances, as a national calamity, to be avoided, if compatible with national honor. The principles of our government, as well as a true policy, are opposed to the subjugation of other nations and the distinct incorporation of other countries by conquest. In the language of the great Washington, 'Why should we quit our own to stand on foreign ground?' In the Mexican war no national honor has been maintained, unsullied; and, in declaring the end of peace, we have well defined, honorable and even magnanimous to our fallen foe."

Gen. Taylor, then, stands before the country not merely as a whig, but as the great representative and champion of the principle of the right of man to self-government. He maintains the principle that the majority have the right to govern. He stands precisely upon the ground on which Thos. Jefferson originally made a party difference with John Adams. Let me quote a passage from the letter of Thos. Jefferson to John Adams, stating the grounds on which the republican party of 1798 commenced its opposition to the encroachments of Executive power, and to which it owed its true origin. In the 4th volume of Jefferson's Memoirs, page 202, we find the letter to which I refer. It is dated June 27, 1813, and contains the following passages:

"The terms of whig and tory belong to national as well as social parties. They are now the legal and constitutional appellations by which citizens of our own country and by the times which you and I became first acquainted, we were to member the violent parties which agitated the old Congress, and their bitter contests. Thomson and I were seated together, often consulted on the manuscripts of both and we the rights of our country.

"But as soon as the constitution was put into motion, two great parties were drawn. We broke into two parties, each wishing to give the government a different direction. He took his part in the republican party, I in the federal. Each gave the other the more personal reproaches and bitterness of opposition. Here you and I separated for the first time, and new parts placed your name at once by the other selected mine."

Precisely upon that principle, General Lewis Cass and General Zachary Taylor now differ, and stand at issue before the country. General Taylor places himself upon this just principle, laying at the foundation of all republican forms of government—the right of the majority to govern. He holds that the popular branch of the government possesses rights, and that he, if elected President, would be bound to respect them. He says, therefore, in reference to all those great questions which have heretofore agitated the country, and which are properly within the powers of Congress, that he will be guided by the will of the people, as expressed by their representatives. On the other hand, what says General Lewis Cass? He denies that the will of the people shall govern. He maintains the high federal doctrines of ancient days, that the President of the United States, with his veto power, shall control the will of the people. He stands up as the champion of Executive power, and has received his nomination from a party convention, under circumstances which I think, when carefully examined by the American people, will seal his fate as a candidate before them. What were these circumstances? The very first rule adopted by the convention assembled at Baltimore was, that the will of the majority should not govern—that the vote of two-thirds should be necessary to nominate the President. They had laid down that doctrine before on a memorable occasion. I refer to the Baltimore nomination in 1844. The result reminds me of one of those games at cards which is called "Solitaire," in which you know a man plays against himself. Did you ever see a man sit down to play that game who did not cheat himself? The democratic leaders, on this occasion, undertook to play "Solitaire"—the whigs were not present to be cheated—and the very first act or decree was one amounting, in my judgment, to a most flagitious fraud, not only upon the country, but upon the party itself. And it ordained that the will of the people should not govern, and that no man should be nominated for the Presidency without the vote of two-thirds of that convention. Well, now, what must be—(every body knows what was the consequence in this case)—the necessary consequence of the establishment of such a principle by any party? We can all very well estimate the power of one hundred thousand office holders, many of them anxious to perpetuate their dynasty. They can pack a democratic convention with more than one-third of its members, though they might not be able to control a majority. They can send on their relations, their friends and dependants, as delegates, and, under the operation of this two-thirds rule, govern the convention. It was so on this occasion. All the gentlemen who composed the convention went to Baltimore bound to nominate some candidate for the Presidency. To fail to nominate by a convention would be to dissolve the party. They were compelled, therefore, to make a nomination, and when they entered the convention, they were met with a rule declaring that the vote of two-thirds was necessary to nominate their democratic candidate for the Presidency. They knew that within the walls of the convention there stood a packed minority, of more than one-third, representing the office holders of the country, who could veto or negative the nomination of any man not subservient to their views, or who would not perpetuate their dynasty, and continue them and their friends in office. The candidates all understood this beforehand. In such occasions he who makes the most satisfactory bargain with this clique or faction—constituting more than one-third, but not one-half of the convention—is sure to receive the nomination. No other man can get it. I say again, every candidate understood this, and every future candidate will, in all future democratic conventions, understand it. Each of them will know it is impossible for him to procure the nomination unless he can secure the services of those who come there for the purpose of sustaining themselves in office. He is bound then to lend himself to all their views. If they desire to establish a platform of political faith, he must subscribe to it. He has no option. He must either relinquish all hope of the nomination, or subscribe to every dogma that this clique may choose to lay down. Under these circumstances, I ask, what is the inevitable tendency of the party which has nominated General Lewis Cass? Does it not directly tend to the rule of the few over the many, and eventually to a monarchy? It tends to the establishment, in the first instance, of an oligarchy, or an aristocracy of office holders—able to dictate the nomination of any man they please. They have a veto on the acts of the convention as absolute and effectual as that which the President of the United States, whom they may nominate and elect under the magic name of democrat, may have upon the laws of Congress and the will of the people.

Undoubtedly the great mass of the democratic party is honest and patriotic. We who are whigs, and opposed to them in politics, are entitled to a free expression of their opinion in making a party nomination; and we whigs, as well as democrats, are entitled by this political legerdemain—this hocus pocus—introduced by some political magicians into that party within a few years past, which compels that party to accept a nomination made and carried upon them by the minority. Such were the circumstances—such was the fraud—such was the established rule and iron law under which General Cass received his nomination.

Let us inquire, in connection with this, what are some of the other doctrines of the party to which General Cass has been compelled to subscribe. Among other things, there stands prominently the assertion of the great right and duty of the President of the United States to exercise the veto power, without reference to the limitations prescribed by the fathers of the constitution. Every one who has perused the "Federalist" knows that Mr. Madison and his associates uniformly maintained, that the great object of the veto was to enable the Executive and the Judicial Department to shield the constitution and the Executive power within its limits. No man of their day pretended it was designed that the veto power should be extended, as it has been, to every act of ordinary legislation, and every instance in which a party might by the aid of it elevate or sustain itself against the interests of the whole country. It never was imagined by any member of the convention which formed the constitution that the veto clause in that instrument could be so construed as the most latitudinarian expositor has stated the President of the United States should be enabled, by the force of that clause, to become a part of the legislative power of the country. Now, however, you find the doctrine laid down by this party boldly in their public prints, that the President constitutes a part of the legislative power of the country, and that the veto power is unlimited, and was so intended to be by those who made the constitution. Let me call the attention of the Senate to a consideration of the principles upon which this veto power was inserted in the American constitution. The first sentence of the constitution declares that all "the legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in the Senate and House of Representatives." No part of the legislative power is given to the President of the United States. In the judgment of the fathers of the republic the Executive never constituted an essential component part of the legislative power. A qualified power of revision was given to him; but it was never intended that he should exercise any legislative power. In order that we may understand this subject, which enters largely into the great questions now before us, let me read a portion of the debate on the adoption of the constitution. I am particularly desirous of the attention of the Senate to this point, because I wish it to see by whom these extreme notions in relation to the veto power were originally advanced. During this session of Congress, we have heard the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] utter very strong denunciations against Colonel Hamilton as the intentional advocate of kingly and monarchical doctrines, and a traitor to the cause of liberty. I do not stand here for the purpose of branding one of the greatest men the country ever produced with ignominious charges; but I desire to show that the great leader of the federal party, when the subject was first presented to the consideration of the old continental Congress, was the very man to press this veto power upon the convention, and to insist upon its being made absolute and unqualified. In Madison's state papers, page 151, we find:

"Mr. GERRY proposed to have now before the committee, Mr. Wilson, Chancellor Livingston, and Mr. Hamilton's draft of the constitution, in order that it might be compared, so as to give the former an opportunity of explaining the alterations and amendments which he meant to make. These, he thought, if agreed to, would prevent being too much governed by the British model. Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS read the draft of Great Britain, and pointed out the defects in the constitution."

That is the argument in favor of the absolute veto made by one who has been represented in this chamber, as the great aristocrat and monarchist of that day—Mr. GERRY, a democrat of that day—

Mr. MANGUM, (in his seat.) Republican.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I thank my friend for the word. Republican is a much better name.

"Mr. GERRY said he saw no necessity for a great variety of checks; but, such as had been mentioned would be completely met by the veto provided for.

"Dr. FRANKLIN said, he was sorry to differ from the honorable gentleman; but he thought the power very improper. Laws are frequently made in haste, and repented of at leisure; the best corrected by experience; and the worst repealed by succeeding assemblies. The first part of the experiment of three years is the operation of the law. Few laws are known in that time to be bad enough to require repeal. The negative of the governor may be expected to be used frequently. No good law will be passed without the concurrence of three branches of the legislature. Would three fourths of the people be unanimous in wishing a change, when experience proves the inconvenience of a law? Will not the governor, who may be supposed to have a constitutional share in framing the laws, be generally disposed to favor them? Will he not be unwilling to hurt his own reputation, and render his judgment contemptible, by frequent objections? Will he not be constantly tempted to use his negative, in favor of his favorites, and of those who may be disposed to favor designs of his own, which cannot be executed but by means of some favorite law? Will he not be encouraged to do so, when he reflects that his power is temporary, and cannot last beyond the session of the assembly, or at most beyond the second session? Will he not think it hard to be deprived, during that short period, of the power of serving himself, his friends, and his country, by the use of a law, which, but for his negative, would have been made, and continued for that purpose? In England, the power of the crown has been long declining, and seems hastening to its period. Here it is found necessary to give it support. Why? Because the people have more confidence in the king than in their own representatives; they conceive that he has less interest in misusing the power of making bad laws, or preventing good ones. And why should we furnish materials for the constitution of that country, which is to govern a future people, that will entirely reverse the reasons for establishing it? Why should we prepare for our posterity the fetters that we ourselves have thrown off? Why purchase experience by the loss of liberty, and repeat the folly of our ancestors, instead of profiting by their wisdom?

spoliation bill, and in so many other cases that it is difficult to enumerate them. These vetoes have been sustained by Executive influence. Congress has fallen beneath the Executive arm, strengthened as that is, and always will be, by a venal and subservient press and the ready aid of the Post Office Department, with a hundred thousand office-holders, many of whom will always "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning." This whole veto power, as thus exercised, is now sustained by the Baltimore platform, and promptly adopted by General Cass, in his acceptance of the Baltimore nomination. It is part of his established creed.

On the other hand, how stands the man we support on this great and vital subject? He denounces the kingly power—the power for the exercise of which a Stuart and a Bourbon lost their heads—and confines the veto to the cases in which the fathers of the republic intended it to be exercised. He treats it as a "high conservative power." So did they. They declared by their exposition in the "Federalist," that its chief object was "to enable the Executive to defend himself when attacked." They meant it to be a shield, not a sword. "In my opinion," says General Taylor, in his letter to Captain Allison, "it should never be exercised except in cases of clear violation of the constitution, or manifest haste and want of consideration by Congress." He modestly adds, "Indeed I have thought that for many years past, the known opinions and wishes of the Executive have exercised undue and injurious influence upon the legislative department of the government; and from this cause I have thought our system was in danger of undergoing a great change from its true theory." Sir, if he had been forty years in these halls, instead of the tented field, he could not have more thoroughly understood the true theory of this government and its actual and inevitable tendency, as now administered. It is evident he has, in the silent hours allowed him in the camp, by the watch-fire in the night, or amid the intervals of battle and military service, deeply studied the genius of our government and its practical administration.

Sir, it would consume more time than is necessary for my purpose, to show how often the will of the people, expressed by their Representatives in Congress, has been defeated by the iron will of a President, and especially by the exercise of his monarchical negative on the laws. In the language of a distinguished statesman, "the extreme medicine of the constitution has become our daily food." Every man who remembers the history of the last twenty years, will bear me witness, that in this respect, the modern democracy have drifted to a returnless distance from the old landmarks of republicanism. The Executive prerogative is no longer the object of attack, but its advocates have been the unceasing assailants of the rights of the people, and of the popular branch of the government. "The power of the crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished." He has broken down the power of the people to improve their rivers and harbors—dictated a new and untried system of currency in despite of their expressed opinion—and even gone so far as to deny the right of Congress to pay a private claim to an American citizen. I refer to the claim for French spoliations on our commerce prior to 1800, for the liquidation of which a bill passed both Houses of Congress two years ago—a bill, the principles of which he never understood—a bill, to which, it is palpable, he never gave a week's attention in his life, though Congress passed it, after having held it under consideration for a period of nearly fifty years. The government has ceased to be a government of the people, and has become a government of one man. Power, says Junius, is continually stealing from the many to the few, and I may add, from the few to one. The one-man power is the subject of unceasing eulogy among some of the advocates of the Baltimore convention platform, and one of the delegates lately made a speech to show its superiority in concentrating all responsibility in one head, instead of dividing it among many, thus frankly avowing his preference for the monarchical to the republican principle.

We must arrest this tendency to monarchy if we intend to remain a republic. When you talk to me about whig principles, tariffs, the currency, internal improvements, land bills, and public economy, I tell you that, although I am a whig, have always been a whig, and expect to die whig, yet I hold that, in comparison with the great principle now at issue between Lewis Cass and Zachary Taylor, the other principles of any party ever yet known in this country sink into insignificance. I am called upon, in the election of Zachary Taylor, to vindicate the great right of man to self-government, and the right of the people, through their Representatives in Congress, to make laws. I am called upon to deny the right of the President of the United States to assume the position of a legislator; and whenever the day shall come that his right to legislate shall be acknowledged, that moment the republican character of our government utterly ceases to exist. You may call it what you please—you may style the man at the head of the government a President, as Bonaparte was, in the first instance, styled the first Consul, and afterwards Emperor of the republic—but to all intents and purposes your republic is at an end. It becomes a monarchy—an elective monarchy—the meanest and most despicable form in which that kind of government can exist.

Here, then, is the principle upon which I make issue with the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, in the approaching Presidential campaign. I mean to stand by General Taylor as the representative of the right of man to self-government. I mean to support him because he has boldly and nobly proclaimed himself before the country as the champion of this great principle, that the majority should govern. In all those cases where the fathers of the republic intended that the veto power should be applied, he declares that he will exercise it. In all cases where a bill passed by Congress is clearly and manifestly unconstitutional, or has been passed in haste and without due consideration, he will be prepared to apply the veto. He is ready to apply it to sustain the Union of these States against any dangerous infraction of the constitution. But he will permit the people of the country to govern themselves. He will suffer the Representatives of the people and the States, in these halls, to make the laws. He will not set himself up as an essential part of the legislative power of the nation. He will, when he reaches the Presidential stand, stand by the great principles avowed on this subject by Madison and his compatriots of 1787, and utterly repudiate the kingly maxim practised upon in the present day—'Sic volo, sic jubeo, sic veto. Stet pro ratione voluntas."

I propose to look a little further into this subject. I desire the Senate and the people of the country to understand what kind of government it was sought to be established by those who introduced the veto power into the constitution of the United States, and the kindred principles which actuated them. In Madison's papers we find a copy of the constitution which Colonel Hamilton, the father of the veto, intended to propose. Here are three of its provisions.

"ARTICLE I.—SEC. 1. The legislative power shall be vested in two distinct bodies of men—one to be called the Assembly, the other the Senate, subject to the negative hereinafter mentioned.

"ARTICLE IV.—SEC. 10. The President shall have a right to negative all bills, resolutions, votes, of the two Houses, or each house separately, to be styled his laws.

"ARTICLE III.—SEC. 6. The Senators shall hold their places during good behavior, removable only by conviction, on impeachment, for some crime or misdemeanor.

Here are the principles of the government which the author of the veto power intended to introduce. It is manifest that the mind of the author of the veto power was at an infinite distance from the intentions of those who made the constitution. It is evident that he intended to establish a Senate for life, and to make the President a part of the legislative power.

But the Executive practice in these days, (all of which seems to be fully approved by General Cass) is not merely sic veto—but sic volo, sic jubeo. He now assumes the initiative in addition to the veto power. He not only recommends, but dictates to Congress. His opinions are daily quoted in debate here, and control our legislation. It has been but four days since an attempt was made by the Senators from Kentucky and Tennessee, [Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. BELL,] to remove the obstructions in the river Ohio at Cumberland Island. Every body here seemed to think it right to remove it—but it was known and said that the President would veto the bill which contained it, and the improvement fell. So the navigation of the Ohio must be obstructed till Taylor can put it all right, by allowing Congress to make laws. We have now not a single river or harbor bill before Congress—not one measure for internal improvement. Why? Because we all know it is idle to waste our time in passing them, as the President has publicly avowed his resolution to veto them all. The will of the people is nothing. All men here look only to the will of the President. He is the fountain of favor. Now, in the British House of Commons, under a limited monarchy, the independence of Parliament is secured by a rule which makes it out of order for any member to state in debate what is the will of the king; and it is perfectly true, as Colonel Hamilton stated in the convention of 1787, that no king of England has dared to exercise the veto power since the English revolution produced by the whigs of 1688—one hundred and sixty years ago. Why? Because the exercise of a power so despotic, which wholly denies to the people the right of self-government, would, even in that limited monarchy, have cost any English monarch his head. Queen Victoria would not keep the throne a week under one of our Presidential vetoes. We have the name of a republic, but stat nomis umbra—it stands but the shadow of a name. I first came into Congress nearly twenty years ago, and I have since been an attentive observer of men and things here, though one of the humblest of the actors on this theatre, where men, with loud professions of democracy on their lips, cherish the most despotic principles in their hearts: and I now say that the monarchical tendency has every year been growing stronger, that many of our legislative acts of the most important character are drafted at the Executive department, to suit the will of the Executive, and that Congress has degenerated, under democratic Presidents, till it is little better than the register of the edicts of an Emperor. It is but a few days since a member who has served in Congress about thirty years, [Mr. WEBSTER,] declared in his place, that he had never known a President to set his heart on any great measure which he did not force through Congress.

Why is this? Let a democratic report, made to drive the younger Adams from power twenty-two years ago, make the answer. The veteran member from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] in his report on Executive patronage, May 4, 1826, after enumerating the monstrous extent of the power of that patronage, says:

"The wonder of this great power will centre in the President. The King of England is the 'fountain of honor;' the President of the United States is the source of power. He possesses over the entire system of federal appointments, jobs, and contracts, the bar 'power over the 'support' of the individuals who administer the system. He makes and unmakes them. He chooses from the mass of his friends and supporters, and may dismiss them at will, upon a like promptly-level human action, the dismissal, in all cases, depending upon the pleasure of the appointing power. He must weigh, maturely, all acts in all elections to State and federal offices. There may be exceptions, but the truth of a general rule is proved by the exception. The intended check and control of the Senate, without new constitutional or statutory provisions, will cease to operate. Patronage will penetrate this body, subdue its capacity of resistance, chain it to the car of power, and enable the President to talk, as well and almost as much with them without, the nominal check of the Senate. If the President was himself the officer of the people, elected by them, and responsible to them, there would be no danger from the concentration of all power in his hands; but it is the business of statesmen to act upon things as they are, and not as they would wish them to be. We must then look forward to the time when the public servants will be associated, even the civil and military officers of the federal government, will be encouraged, when its influence over individuals will be multiplied to an immense extent, when the nomination for the President and any man through the Senate, and an recommendation can carry any measure through the two Houses of Congress; when the principle of public action will be open and avowed, the President wants no vote and I want his patronage; I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me whatever I may want. What will this be but the government of one man? and what is the government of one man but a monarchy? Names are nothing—The nature of a thing is in its substance, and the name soon accommodates itself to the substance. The first Roman Emperor was called Emperor of the Republic, and the last French Emperor took the same title; and their respective countries were just as essentially monarchical before as after the assumption of these titles. It cannot be denied, or dissembled, but that this federal government gravitates to the same point, &c." "Those who make the President must support him. Their political fate becomes identified, and they must stand or fall together. Right or wrong, they must support him, and if he would contrary to the will of the people, he must be supported not only by votes and speeches, but by arms."

I proceed now to answer some of the interrogatories proposed by the honorable Senator from Mississippi; and, first, in relation to the tariff. He asks me whether General Taylor is in favor of the tariff? I answer that General Taylor has expressly declared in his letter to Captain Allison, that he will, on that subject, submit to the will of the people. If they, by their Representatives in Congress, choose to pass a protective law, he will not veto it. If they choose to retain the free trade law of 1846, he will not interfere with it. The Senator asks what is my position in regard to this question? I answer that I am a whig, and as a true friend of the American tariff of 1842, and the principles of that tariff, I am perfectly content with the President of the United States who will permit the will of the Representatives of the people and of the States to become the law of the land. The honorable gentleman referred to a letter of mine, written in 1846, to my political friends in Delaware, in which I avowed myself to be what I have always felt proud to declare myself—a friend to the protection of American industry, and the tariff of 1842. It was a letter written, not as he says, for a Presidential election, but for a State election, and on the eve of it. I shall never abandon it—but I glory in the principle it avows.

The honorable Senator inquired if there was a man on this side of the chamber who was in favor of that tariff of 1842? I am, and I think all on my side of the chamber concur with me. But I do not desire General Taylor to force any tariff upon the country by the exercise of the Executive power. He is willing, on that great question, to let the vote of the people govern; and no man, be he from the North or from the South, who desires to curb the expression of the people on this subject, can justly call himself a true republican.

It is because General Taylor on this, as on other great questions, stands on republican ground, that we desire his election. He occupies precisely the same platform on which Mr. Jefferson placed himself in the origin of parties in this country. He is in favor of strengthening the popular branch of the government, and opposed to the augmentation of Executive power. This was the great dividing landmark between parties in 1798. But, alas! your modern democracy has been driven by its office-holding leaders to a very different position from that occupied by Mr. Jefferson. It now stands as the advocate, the prop, and support of kingly power. [Here Mr. C. addressed himself to the democratic side of the chamber.] You defend all its encroachments. You spurn the rights of the country and of Congress. You decide that the President shall put down the will of the people; and you have nominated a man who stands solemnly pledged before the convention, by his letter of acceptance of your nomination, to veto the will of the people, when expressed through their Representatives, on all great leading questions, in any other way than as a mere faithful agent may dictate. By the action of a convention which the minority was suffered to control, and which took only one night to consider all the great questions of public policy, your candidate is pledged to veto the vote of the people, should even nine-tenths of them decide upon a repeal of the tariff of 1846, and a re-enactment of that of 1842. Now, on this ground, is there any honorable free-trade man who will hesitate to give his support to General Taylor? Every honest democrat—every native and every naturalized citizen—can support General Taylor; and no one can accuse them of apostatizing from any political party to which they may have been attached. I, as a whig, can unite with my fellow-citizens of the democratic party in support of General Taylor, and all I ask of them is to be republican in heart, and allow the will of the people to govern, for that is the great principle laid down by him in the Allison letter, and it towers infinitely above all other questions of party ever made in this country. I cherish no unkind personal feeling toward the distinguished gentleman whom the democratic convention nominated. I have always entertained for him the highest regard on account of the excellence of his private character. But I am now reviewing his public acts—not his private life. I have shown that, instead of occupying republican ground, he stands precisely in the position maintained by Col. Hamilton and Mr. Wilson in the federal convention—pledged to sustain the ultra exercise of Executive power, and to veto and put down the will of the nation on every subject upon which an irresponsible convention have had the effrontery to dictate their arbitrary dogmas to the American people. These men have thus set themselves up above the constitution, and usurped the legislative power.—They seek to control the appointment of Chief Magistrate, and like the Polish Diet, virtually to elect a monarch to ride and rule an abused and insulted people.

Which, then, is the republican party? It is the great national party, composed of democrats, naturalized citizens, native citizens, and whigs—patriotic men of all parties—who now constitute the great Taylor party of the country. That is the true republican party; opposed to the downward tendency of the government in in its administration—anxious to avert its progress to monarchy; and unless the principles of that party be sustained, the liberties of the country must sooner or later fall beneath the axe which has been laid to their root by the proceedings of the interested and intriguing faction which has by turns muzzled, cajoled, and trampled upon the rights of the modern democracy. When, then, I call upon any man to support General Taylor, I do not ask that he should be merely a whig or a democrat, but a republican—a republican not merely by profession, but a republican in heart and in deed.

The party leaders in the convention that introduced this two-thirds rule, and thus cheated itself, refusing to allow the majority to govern, have felt already the consequences of their conduct. This rule was introduced as a permanent principle of the democratic party in the convention of 1844, and was a deliberate fraud upon Mr. Van Buren and his friends. He went into the convention expecting that the will of the majority would be allowed to control its action; and he received the votes of a decided majority of that convention. But the politicians—those jugglers, who understood the game which was to be played—so contrived it, that a majority could not control the action of the convention. They deluded southern men by the pretext that, as the North had a majority of votes, their institution of slavery was in danger, and thus procured their aid to establish the rule, that a vote of two-thirds was necessary to nominate the candidate. They thus rejected Mr. Van Buren; and what has been the result? This political magician, as he was called, has applied his magic touch to your party, and lo! it is crumbling into dust! It is prostrate beneath his feet at this moment. The splendid party fabric—the regency palace—which, by his wizard art, he erected in the Empire State, has vanished like the morning mist, or one of those dreamy mansions of which we read in eastern tales, at the touch of one of the genii. The vengeance of the man who was thus defrauded and defeated, equals that of Mazeppa, the Prince of Barnburners—

> "For if we do but mark the hour,
> There never yet was human power,
> That could evade, if unforgiven,
> The patient search and vigil long,
> Of him who treasures up a wrong."

I say to gentlemen who now vainly attempt to uphold this tottering fabric of progressive, aggressive, and retrogressive democracy, that on the day on which you established that principle, and overthrew the fundamental principle of all republican government, your destiny was sealed! From that hour your doom was irretrievably fixed. Nothing could or can save you from the fate that awaits you. Nothing can save any party in this country that shall dare to establish such an unprincipled rule. The people may be humbugged for a time; but when they have been allowed opportunity for reflection, and see a fraud perpetrated, repeated, and enjoined as a principle, by which the right of the majority is denied, the shackless of party can bind them no longer. They imbibed this sacred principle from their fathers—they were taught it by their mothers amidst the first lessons of their infancy, and they know that without it their government would be converted into a government of pronunciamentos, and could not exist an hour. Whig as I am, and ever have been, I have no hesitation in declaring, that if the whig party were to assemble in convention to-morrow and adopt such a principle, I would leave them the moment I could address a letter to the public.

The Senator also inquires what will General Taylor do in reference to the sub-treasury and the bank. I answer, that General Taylor has pledged himself, in the Allison letter, to let the people govern. If they want this miserable sub-treasury scheme, they will keep it. If they wish to repeal it, he will interpose no veto upon the exercise of their will. On the other hand, how stands Lewis Cass, the champion of the democracy! He stands pledged to retain the sub-treasury in spite of the will of the people. If three-fifths of the people should come here demanding the repeal of the sub-treasury law, Mr. Cass would be bound to trample upon that will. Which, then, is the republican? Which the true democrat?

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the gentleman bear with me while I submit another question? Does he regard the veto power as a conservative one, to be retained, or as one to be struck out of the constitution? If to be retained, should it not be exercised?

Mr. CLAYTON.—I am very glad that the honorable gentleman has put this interrogatory. I hold the veto power to be a great conservative power in the constitution. I do not seek, nor do the friends of General Taylor seek, to strike it from the constitution. We regard is as the fathers of the republic did—as a conservative power to enable the Executive to defend itself, and to be exercised precisely within the limitations laid down by Madison and his associates. General Taylor specifies the causes for which he will apply the veto.

I return now to the consideration of the question of the currency and the national bank, at which point the Senator interrupted the course of my remarks. And I recur to the bank question particularly, that this matter may be put to rest so far as is in my power, now and forever. I do not know a man who supports General Taylor that entertains the most remote idea of bringing the question of a national bank before the Congress of the Union. I do not know a whig on this side of the chamber, or anywhere else, who cherishes any idea of reviving that question. The gentlemen on the other side will rattle the dry bones of the old Bank of the United States in our faces, but they will, by doing so, only frighten the men of their own party who voted in Congress for, and carried that bank charter, and they will attempt in vain to ride any longer on their old political hobby as an anti-bank party. Whatever opinions we may have in regard to that great question, we have all resolved that we will never revive it. If the democratic party want a bank of the United States let them move it. We on this side of the chamber know that a national bank could be of no value to the country unless sustained by the will of both the great parties of the country. I am free to declare here the part which I took in reference to this question. I voted for the bank in 1832; te duce! under your lead, sir; for you, Mr. President, [Mr. DALLAS,] were the chairman of the committee that reported the bill. I only followed that lead. We passed the bank bill with your assistance, your argument, influence, and vote; and your aid extended much further; for when General Jackson vetoed it, you and I concurred in voting against the veto! I will never deny the faith that is in me. As I thought then, I think now. And the day will come when your democracy will, under the pressure of distress, cry aloud for another bank; but no whig will ever start that question again. The question of a national bank should be and will be allowed to remain at rest until men of all parties shall seek to establish, and resolve to sustain it, by an unanimity which shall place it above the reach of the demagogues who will seek to destroy it.

I am asked what General Taylor will do in regard to internal improvements. That is a most important subject, and I think I have already answered the question. It deserves the patient and most deliberate consideration of every American citizen. But on this question, the course of the bold, manly old patriot is as plain as the sun at noon-day. He will leave this question also to the will of the people. If the Representatives in Congress choose to pass a bill for internal improvements, he will not impose his veto on the law. Nor will he write any messages for the purpose of manufacturing internal improvement men, or tariff men, or any other kind of politicians. He will not enter on a career of propagandism. He does not intend to get up a hot-bed for tariffs or internal improvement, but knowing that nothing can prosper which does not rest in the confidence and affections of the people, he will refer these questions to the original sources of power, and will sustain them all with inflexible firmness, so long as the people will them to stand. He does not mean to push things to extremes. His administration will neither be aggressive nor retrogressive; but he will adapt his progress to the mighty energies and capabilities of a nation unexampled in the history of the world for its advance in arts, as well as in arms, in agriculture, commerce, and manufactures.

Now, on this great question, let me ask, where stands General Cass? I must now, in my turn, put the honorable Senator from Mississippi on the confessional, and ask him to illuminate my path by shedding a little light on this subject. I find that the resolution passed by the Baltimore convention in favor of the exercise of the veto power contained these words:

"Resolved, That we are decidedly opposed to taking from the President the veto power, &c. &c., which has saved the American people from the corrupt and tyrannical combination of the bank of the United States and from a corrupting system of general internal improvements."

From the statement of Mr. Yancey, a member of the convention, it appears that these words about internal improvements, which were originally reported by the committee appointed to draft the "Baltimore platform," were objected to, for the reason thus stated by Mr. Yancey, in a speech in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, on the 6th June last, exposing the deeds of this convention:

"Amongst other things, he instanced, as evidence of its unsoundness as an exponent of democratic views, its refusal to adopt its resolutions avowing its principles, and the platform upon which it designed to place its nomination. And now mark the result, he continued. After the nomination was made, a committee was selected to report a series of resolutions. Mr. Yancey said that the committee met on the evening of its appointment, and sat until ten at night. Before it appointed the resolution in relation to the veto power had been amended so as to show its happy effect in saving the country from a corrupting system of general internal improvements. It was unanimously agreed to as sound democratic doctrine, and as a deserved compliment to Mr. Polk. When the committee met next morning the first proposition made was to reconsider that amendment, and strike it out. I inquired why? It had been admitted to be good democratic doctrine the night before! The answer was, 'Gen. Cass voted against that veto of Mr. Polk, and if we put this in we will condemn our nominee.'

"These virtuous politicians—these truly worthy representatives of democracy—had discovered by morning that the avowal of a truth would put an error forbidden that the praise of a patriot would be the condemnation of a political heretic!

"The vote was not reconsidered, but it was, as Mr. Yancey firmly believed, because it was too barefaced even for that body; and if the idea that Cass had voted against Mr. Polk's veto had been thought of before the amendment was adopted, it never would have graced those resolutions. As it is, it will indeed become a thorn in the side of the nominee."

Now, I ask the honorable gentleman from Mississippi will General Cass veto a general system of internal improvements?

Mr. FOOTE.—I am not prepared to state further than this:—that it is my own opinion, which I am almost certain is well-founded, that General Cass is opposed to any general system of internal improvements; and that he would veto a bill in favor of such a system. But, as I said the other day, my own impression has always been, that a liberal system of internal improvements, within the constitution, would certainly meet the support of General Cass. Now, if I have answered the question satisfactorily, I would ask the Senator whether General Taylor will withhold his veto, in case of his election, to any bill for internal improvements that may happen to pass both houses of Congress?

Mr. CLAYTON.—However vague the answer, or the question addressed to me, I reply promptly, that I do not believe the case will occur of the deliberate and well considered passage of a bill for any internal improvement by both houses of Congress which ought to be condemned by the American Executive. General Taylor, while pledged to abide by the will of the people, is also free to restrain any hasty or inconsiderate legislation.

Mr. FOOTE.—The question is not whether such or such a case can occur, but whether General Taylor would so act in certain circumstances?

Mr. CLAYTON.—It is impossible for me to state my opinion as to what the action of General Taylor in a given case might be, unless the case be stated with precision. You might suppose a case in which Congress, having gone raving mad, would vote twenty-five millions out of the Treasury when there were not five millions in it, and ask me whether General Taylor would veto that. But I am now looking, as a practical man, to the cases which which are likely to occur, and I have not the most distant idea that any circumstances will actually exist in which Gen. Taylor will apply the veto to a bill for internal improvements. But how stands the candidate of the other side of the chamber with respect to this question? Perhaps, as his pathway still remains obscured, the honorable gentleman from Illinois can inform me. Does he believe that General Cass will veto a bill for internal improvements?

Mr. BREESE.—I will answer the Senator very frankly. If I did not believe that General Cass would veto such a bill, I would not vote for him.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I believe that the gentleman from Illinois, as well as General Cass, twice voted for the river and harbor bill, and against the veto on that bill. Does he believe that such a bill would meet with a veto from President Cass?

Mr. BREESE.—I do not suppose that it would. And, with all frankness, permit me to say, that as I understand the principles of the democratic party, a palpable distinction has always been made between a general system of internal improvements and mere appropriations out of the Treasury for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Reasonable appropriations for the latter purpose would no doubt receive the sanction of General Cass and the democratic party. But appropriations for a vast and expensive system of internal improvements, I hope never will receive the sanction of either.

Mr. CLAYTON.—We see, from these vague answers, how difficult it is to ascertain what General Cass does or does not mean about these times. I know that he has voted in favor of every internal improvement bill, and against every veto of them. Now, I have always heretofore looked to a man's acts in order to ascertain what he meant to do; and I have hitherto regarded General Cass as a high ultra internal improvement man. I have always believed that he could go further on that subject than I could myself, and that there were some things, besides Mexico, which I found very difficult to take, which he swallowed with great ease. It is apparent that there are two Senators who have very different views of General Cass's opinion upon the subject of internal improvement. I am apprehensive that we are to understand General Cass one way in one part of the Union, and differently in another part. He was called upon by one of his friends at Cleveland, [Mr. Wood,] to state his opinions on this subject, but we were informed that the "noise and confusion" were so great that he could not make any reply, although he was able to tell the audience very audibly, much about his early history, and how he had risen from comparative obscurity to become the candidate of the great democratic party. I am very much afraid, Mr. President, that the "noise and confusion" will continue throughout the campaign, and that we shall never be able to ascertain the opinions of General Cass on this important subject. He has written a letter approving of the whole Baltimore platform. Let me read a portion of that platform which was not expunged:

Resolved, That the constitution does not confer upon the general government the power to commence and carry on a general system of internal improvement.

It seems, then, from the light before us, that the Baltimore convention held the government could not carry on a "general system of internal improvement;" but the honorable member from Illinois says it may carry on a particular system, such as that indicated by the river and harbor bill, which met Mr. Polk's veto. That was first reported by a committee to the convention as a "corrupting system," and Mr. Polk was, in that report, complimented for his veto upon it. But as Mr. Cass had voted for the corrupting system, and against Mr. Polk's veto, and it was held necessary, as Mr. Yancey proves, not to "condemn the nominee," the compliment was struck out, and by the committee not approved. Then, to mystify this whole matter still further, another resolution passed, "that the fruits of the great political triumph of 1844, which elected James K. Polk, have fulfilled the hopes of the democracy of the Union." But the most amusing part of the whole platform is the distinction of the Senator from Illinois between a "general system of improvement" and "mere appropriations for rivers and harbors." The Senator from Mississippi holds the river and harbor bill unconstitutional, but still sustains Mr. Cass, who, he says, is for a liberal system. The Senator from Illinois is for the river and harbor bill. Mr. Polk is against that bill, and also against the liberal system, toto cælo. Yet all are on the platform. Each is orthodox. Is it not clear, therefore, that the platform to which General Cass pledged himself by his letter of acceptance of the Baltimore nomination requires another explanation from himself?

Mr. FOOTE.—General Cass, in his letter accepting the nomination of the Baltimore convention, stated that that letter closed his profession of faith.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I remember that very well. In that letter, after endorsing this unintelligible platform of the democratic convention, he adds, that he will not say any more. He closed the door, became "General mum," and accordingly, in his answer to Mr. Wood, of Cleveland, he refused to throw any more light on the subject. It is palpable that his position is equivocal, and differently understood in different sections of the Union, and that the platform itself is a mere humbug.

The honorable gentleman asked me what were the sentiments of General Taylor in regard to the Mexican war. I think he will find an answer perfectly satisfactory in the Allison letter. Then Gen. Taylor announces a great principle of vast importance to this country. He avows himself opposed to the doctrine of annexation by conquest. He is opposed to war, when the honor of the country does not demand it, and in favor of peace as the general policy of the nation. He congratulates the country upon the successful termination of the Mexican war. But he distinctly announces his own principle, conservative and glorious as it is—one on which we will go into the canvass this fall—that he will oppose all war for the purposes of conquest.

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator seems to have glided past my interrogatory. The question was, did General Taylor approve of the conduct of his own country; or, did he hold that Mexico was in the right? And, secondly, when that war had been waged, up to the time of the treaty of peace, does he not know that General Taylor was in favor of that acquisition of territory which has been made by the treaty?

Mr. CLAYTON.—The gentleman unintentionally assumes, by his question, a knowledge of General Taylor's opinions which his published declarations do not justify, and about which neither he nor I can have any knowledge. We know nothing of General Taylor's opinions except from the letters which have been published to the world; and in them he has given no opinion upon the subject to which the gentleman refers, nor can I conceive that it is of the slightest importance. As a soldier, his position made it improper to question any command of the chief magistrate, and his duty was obedience. It is not necessary, in this connection, to discuss the question whether the Mexican war was just and necessary or not. If Mr. Polk were running as the candidate, I might have something to say on that subject; and when treating of the claims of General Cass, who approved by his speeches and votes in this chamber every act and saying of Mr. Polk on wars, it may be taken up with propriety. But, so far as General Taylor is concerned, the question has passed away with the war, in which he did his whole duty! If he announces himself distinctly opposed to acquisition by conquest hereafter, the question as to the justice of the Mexican war, so far as he is concerned, ceases to have the least importance with men of any party, in the Presidential campaign.

General Taylor has done more to terminate the war than any fifty democrats in this nation. Even the Baltimore convention, in the midst of all its party action, has not hesitated to introduce an acknowledgement that General Taylor and his gallant army, with the other American armies, have done everything that could have been done for the honor and the glory of the country. The platform says, that they "have carried the arms of the nation into Mexico, crowning it with imperishable glory;" that "their unconquerable courage, their daring enterprize, their unfaltering perseverance and fortitude when assailed on all sides by innumerable foes, and that more formidable enemy, the diseases of the climate, exalt their devoted patriotism into the highest heroism, and give them a right to the profound gratitude of their country and the admiration of the world."

General Taylor was not a candidate when this resolution was adopted. They thought, perhaps, that General Taylor would not be nominated; but they did justice to the gallant veteran. And I hope that at this moment the democracy of the Union are prepared to unite with the honorable gentleman from Mississippi in eulogiums upon the public and private virtues of General Taylor.

With regard to General Taylor's opinion on the Wilmot proviso, the Senator has the same information that I have. He knows what interpretation ought to be put upon the Allison letter, and I hope General Taylor may never assume the attitude of a sectional or geographical candidate. Suffer me to say for myself, that although acting in the spirit of the request of the Legislature of Delaware, my colleague and myself, the representatives of a slaveholding State, voted for the extension of the ordinance of 1787 over the territories of the United States to prevent the acquisition of any more slave territory, yet we do not intend ever to connect ourselves with any geographical party upon such an issue. We abhor such an issue in the party struggles of the day, as leading to the most fatal consequences. We look upon the introduction of a geographical party upon such a principle, as tending directly to the destruction of the Union of these States; and there is not one State within this confederacy that loves the Union more than the smallest in population among them all—whose lofty patriotism has become a proverb, and whose proudest boast is, that she was the first to adopt the American constitution, and will be the last to desert it. No, sir. The men of Delaware will connect themselves with no such geographical movement. Most of us entertain the opinion that, when the action of Congress is invoked, free soil should remain free, and that slave territory ought to remain such. The doctrine prevailed among us at the time of the Missouri compromise, and still prevails, that Congress should leave the territory as they found it. We desire to abide by the compromises of the constitution; in that spirit we hold that slavery should be protected, where it exists under the ægis of the constitution, but ought not to be carried by us where it never existed. But, I repeat, I am not prepared to call that a political question, and I deny that you can call either this or the opposite doctrine mere whig doctrine. No man has a right to say that the Wilmot proviso is a whig principle, or that its opposite is a whig principle. We repudiate the question altogether as a political question; and I say that, whenever the members of the great Taylor republican party, which I hold at this moment to be the great majority of the country, shall descend so low as to make a geographical party out of this Wilmot proviso, with a view to President making or getting offices and power in the country, they will lose my respect, and I think that of every honest man. An attempt is now being made to force this upon us as a party question by the extreme partizans of the North and South. But neither the one side or the other of the question forms any part of our platform; and I hope there will be patriotism enough among the American people to keep the question apart from party politics forever. For myself, I am free to say that, although I voted in obedience to the request of the State I in part represent, yet so dear is the Union of these States to me and mine, that if this become a geographical question, I shall resort to the remedy adopted by the men of Delaware in another crisis and in other days—I shall act in the spirit of the men who made the constitution, and compromise the question if I can, on terms equally fair and honorable, both for the North and the South.

Mr. FOOTE.—Do I understand the Senator as saying that he is not prepared to inform us whether General Taylor would veto the Wilmot proviso, as every whig print in New England has said he would?

Mr. CLAYTON.—The letter of General Taylor speaks for itself, and the gentleman from Mississippi has precisely the same means that I or the whigs of New England have of forming an opinion upon this subject. If General Taylor will write to me and tell me what he intends to do, I will be able to inform the gentleman. But for me to intrude my individual opinions on the Senator, the public, or this august body, would be folly. The Senator will please now in his turn take the stand, and inform me what General Cass will do with respect to the Wilmot proviso.

Mr. FOOTE.—No doubt he will veto it. He has announced his opinion that the Wilmot proviso is unconstitutional, and declared that he will exercise the veto power in all cases of unconstitutional laws.

Mr. CLAYTON.—If the Senator is right, then General Cass stands before the country as a sectional candidate—the head of a geographical party. I hope General Taylor will decline that honor. My hope is that he will never lend his great name to either of these geographical parties, but retain the power to settle the question without taking part with either.

To judge of the propriety of General Taylor's position, let us inquire how the Baltimore convention met this question. They positively refused to adopt any resolution denouncing the Wilmot proviso. Other democrats, besides the barnburners, when a resolution to repudiate the principle contained in it was offered, threatened to dissolve the party; the resolution was stifled, and the convention silent. The party expressed no opinion on the dangerous subject—they dared not do it. The platform they adopted did not recognize this geographical question as a party question, and this is in precise accordance with General Taylor's position. The anti-proviso platform of General Cass was manufactured by himself, and he is welcome to the position of chief of one of those geographical factions, with which Washington warned every American to have no connexion.

Among the proceedings of the Baltimore convention I observe that Messrs. Yancey, of Alabama, McGehee, of Florida, and Commander, of South Carolina, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the assertion of non-interference with the rights of property of any portion of the people of the country, or of any State or Territory, by any other portion of the same interested in them, is the true republican doctrine recognized by this body.

Mr. Yancey desired this principle to be incorporated in the Baltimore platform. Now, will the Senator from Mississippi tell me whether General Cass concurred in that report or not?

Mr. FOOTE.—I have no knowledge on the subject. I have stated what must be evident to the Senator, that General Cass discussed the Wilmot proviso in every aspect of it, in the plainest manner, and my impression is that his views will be sustained by the democracy in every part of the country. As to Mr. Yancey

I have not particularly noticed his views, but think that his course will meet the general reprobation of his party.

Mr. CLAYTON.—General Cass, then, repudiates Mr. Yancey's sentiments?

Mr. FOOTE.—I do not know.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I supposed that the Senator thoroughly understood all the opinions of General Cass. The honorable gentleman has travelled with the candidate, and was said to be a part of his body guard.

Mr. FOOTE.—That particular point was not started.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Then here is another subject about which General Cass has no platform. Now all these doubts, and ambiguities, and irreconcilable inconsistences come from the party which daily assails General Taylor, because, as they say, "he does not speak out." "He has no platform." So they spoke of General Harrison, until he beat them 146,000 votes. They called him "General Mum," and now, as then, the complaint is made that those who nominated the whig candidate had made "no platform." Sir, they knew that Washington had no platform, and they had more respect for General Taylor and for the intelligence of the people, than to put their candidate in a straight-jacket, or seek, by manufacturing professions of political faith for him, to deceive the voters of the country. They intended that he should be free and untrammelled, as the President of the whole people. But who is there among us that has not long since felt, and, publicly or privately, expressed his contempt for these "platforms?" Look back to your democratic platforms of 1844. Then, the democratic convention passed a resolution to re-annex all Oregon, avowing that the title to it was "clear and unquestionable up to 54° 40'." At the sound of the party bugle the partisan editors of the democratic press throughout the country shouted "clear and unquestionable." A thousand democratic meetings echoed back the sound. "Oregon and 54° 40" were painted on party banners and party walls, and printed on party handbills. Mr. Polk's Inaugural Address also declared the title "clear and unquestionable." His message, in December, 1845, repeated the same folly, and threatened war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt, against the English claim above 49°, all the little, and nearly all the great politicians of the party, standing ready to make fight on this platform. The party leaders afterwards occupied the attention of Congress for six months with this Oregon question, disturbing and distracting the nation, embarrassing trade and commerce, alarming the business men with the apprehension of a war with the most powerful nation on the earth, with which we have more commercial relations than with all the world beside. The price of freight rose so high at one time that no shipping merchant could venture on any distant voyage. General Cass stood in the front of the whole riot. He declared war to be inevitable. His belligerent propensities, displayed on this as well as on all other subjects, covered the whole platform. I never believed that this cry for war was sincere on the part of the wire-workers behind the screen, though I never doubted that the worthy General was perfectly sincere, and was completely duped by them. I advised my friends here to vote for the amicable notice to England —to "pay out rope," and test their sincerity about this platform. The result precisely answered my expectations. When we refused to hold them, they refused to fight, and the result was, that the whole pretensions to fifty-four forty were abandoned by themselves, and they fell back to the British line of forty-nine, upon which a settlement could, at any moment, have been made without a word of all this unjust and insolent bravado. The platform was abandoned; those who had adhered to it most violently, among whom was General Cass, were prostrated in the dust.—The chairman of the Committee on Foreign relations, [Mr. ALLEN,] under a deep sense of this humiliation, instantly resigned, and the present chairman, [Mr. HANNEGAN.] declared in his place, that Mr. Polk had, by surrendering the platform and his own pledges to adhere to it, "sunk himself so low that the hand of resurrection could never reach him." When put to the test, Mr. Polk treated the whole platform of 54° 40' with contempt, and gave up the whole country above 49°.

Mr. FOOTE—(in his seat.)—He was wise, and acted by the advice of the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Oh, yes! he was wise. The folly was in having a platform! In this case, an irresponsible cabal, called a convention, like the last one at Baltimore, many of the members of which were appointed at a tavern or a cross-road meeting, assembled and assumed the duty of directing and controlling the whole legislation of Congress on questions of peace and war.—They did not devote ten minutes to the title of Oregon, which they decided, and not one out of fifty of them had ever read or known any thing about it. The platform thus formed deeply endangered the peace of fifty millions of human beings. We were at one time, by all the blundering and blustering of the administration, driven within an inch of a war with England.

There was another platform—that made by the famous Kane letter. In that precious document, your President, according to the construction of some, avowed himself to be in favor of the tariff, and according to that of others, opposed to it. Unquestionably the mass of the people in the northern States believed that in that letter he avowed himself to be a friend of the tariff. It is as true as scripture, that in the State of Pennsylvania and other States at the North, the flags were flying with the inscription, "Polk Dallas, and the tariff of '42," and when we assailed those who practised these impositions on the people, as we repeatedly did, and accused them of duplicity, the reply was, on all occasions, "we are the true champions of the tariff of '42," and in proof of the assertion we were referred to the democratic vote in the other House, without which the bill of 1842 could not have passed, and told that, therefore, the democrats were entitled to the whole merit of the measure. Now, again the politicians have published one life of General Cass to suit the North, and another to suit the South, in regard to the Wilmot proviso. Thus, by platforms they ever palter with us in a double sense—"keep the word of promise to the ear, but break it to the hope"—at one time deluding our honest people into a vote for Mr. Polk, which he never could have received had he then avowed himself to be what he has since proved to be, the champion of free trade; and at another, representing General Cass as a man of northern principles in the North, and a man of southern principles in the South.

There is another platform: It is that of an honest man, who says that he is a whig, but that if elected to the Presidency he will not be the tool of a party—that he will be the President of the people—that he has no enemies to punish, no friends to reward—that while he will do his duty in removing corrupt, incompetent, or unfaithful men from office, he will not be the supporter of that infamous system of proscription which distributes the public offices of the country as the spoils of a victory—that he will, on this and all other subjects, endeavor to restore the government of the country to the principles of the constitution. His platform is the constitution; all others are utterly unworthy of respect. The patriotism of mere politicians which explodes in deceptive party pledges, is understood to be, as Dr. Johnson defines it, "the last refuge of a scoundrel." There is little difficulty in finding mottoes and illustrations to suit the title page of the whole volume of political platforms. In the action of some of the Presidents of the United States we can find enough to remind us of the old saw—

> "The Devil was sick, the Devil a monk would be—
> The Devil got well, the Devil a monk was he."

The honorable gentleman also attacks General Taylor on the ground that he lacks qualifications. In justice, however, to his own noble heart, the Senator admits that General Taylor is a pure, honorable, high minded, and patriotic man. But he finds fault with General Taylor on account of what he supposes to evince a want of great learning. He reasons from General Taylor's confession that he was not a politician, that he is not competent for the Presidency. That is, I think, his chief objection. The gentleman certainly did also find much fault with one or two of General Taylor's letters. I shall not deny that his letters, like those of other great military commanders, written in the hurry of a camp, and on a barrel, a box, or a drum-head, have not the beauty of finish and the rotundity of period which the gentleman so well knows how to give his own letters. But for strong sense and appropriate language to convey it, no man can excel those letters of Taylor in which he found it important to attend to the manner as well as the matter of his composition. On every court-martial on which he has served for the last twenty years, the other members of the court, although often scholars of high character, have generally selected Taylor to draw up the sentence of the court, on account of his superior qualifications. We laugh at the story that he cannot write his letters. That from his enemies is a new tribute to their excellence! General Cass is, we admit, a knowing and a learned man; but General Taylor is a wise man. I agree with the poet, that > "Knowledge and wisdom far from being one,

> Have often times no connection. Knowledge dwells
> In heads replete with thoughts of other men—
> Wisdom in minds attentive to their own."

General Cass has great erudition, and has written books. But in the great essential qualities of wisdom, justice, integrity, humanity, and moral as well physical courage, Taylor approaches nearer to the character of Washington than any man who has occupied the Presidential chair since his day. And with regard to the champion of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] who has indulged himself in a sly fling at General Taylor, I will give my opinion with equal frankness. Mr. Van Buren is a cunning man, and it has often been observed, that no cunning man was ever yet a wise one. Exception is taken to Taylor's qualifications, because he has been compelled, in his country's service, to pay more attention to the cartridge than the ballot-box; and in his letters has modestly expressed his own diffidence of his ability to discharge the duties of President of the United States. But let me call the attention of the Senate to what Gen. Washington said of himself in his inaugural address. He says to Congress:

> "The magnitude and difficulty of the trust to which the voice of my country has called me, [Washington] being sensible of the weight and moment of the public duties I am about to undertake, feels the deepest anxiety and distrust in many circumstances, which, among other embarrassments, must precede, attend, and follow the present solemn occasion. I was summoned from my farm and from the walks of domestic life, without any preparation, and I am conscious that many defects will appear in my administration

Mr. President, a paper is put into my hands, which I am requested to read to the Senate. In 1840, General Harrison was charged by our opponents with the high crime of having signed a law, about fifty years ago, while Governor of the northwest territory, for selling poor white men into bondage. That, if I understood it was a law to punish crime. It is a fair reprisal on an enemy that could make such a charge to refer them now to a law signed by their present candidate while Governor of Michigan, of so late a date as the 27th of July, 1818. The law, which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FELCH] will acknowledge to be an authentic copy from the territorial statutes of Michigan, is in the following words:

AN ACT for the punishment of idle and disorderly persons.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Governor and Judges of the Territory of Michigan, That any justice of the peace, on conviction, may sentence any vagrant, lewd, idle, or disorderly persons, stubborn servants, common drunkards, common night walkers, pilferers, or any persons wanton or lascivious in speech, indecent behavior, common railers or brawlers, such as neglect their calling and employment, misspend what they earn, and do not provide for themselves and families, to be whipped, not exceeding ten stripes, or to be delivered over to any constable, to be employed in labor not exceeding three months, by such constable to be hired out for the best wages that can be procured; the proceeds of which to be applied to the use of the poor of the county.

Made, adopted, and published at Detroit the 27th day of July, 1818.

LEWIS CASS,
Governor of the Territory of Michigan.
A. B. WOODWARD,
Presiding Judge of the Territory of Michigan.
J. WITHERALL,
JOHN GRIFFIN,
Judges of the Territory of Michigan.

This act was passed by the authority originally given in the ordinance of 1787. It provides that "that the governor and judges shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary and best suited to the circumstances of the district, and report them to Congress, from time to time." In the year 1818, Governor Cass adopted and passed this act, as one of the legislators over the territory. By it a "common night-walker," or any "idle person," or any "stubborn servant," or any "person licentious in speech," or any "person of indecent behavior," or any person who should "misspend what he hard earned, and provide for himself or family" might, at the discretion of a justice of the peace, be whipped ten lashed, or delivered over to a constable, to be hired out for the best wages that could be procured! If the General should remain of that mind hereafter, what a prospect of whipping and hiring out does it present to all who may have a fancy for night-walking, for all idlers, such as may, in the judgment of a justice of the peace, be "stubborn servants," or "licentious in speech," or happen not to spend their money as the justice shall approve! There is nothing in the old sedition law, or in the blue laws of any of the old States, to exceed this precious specimen of the Governor's legislation in 1818. I commend it to the especial consideration of the modern democracy in their future progress.

Sir, I have done. Let me only say, in conclusion, that I hope that my friends on the other side now have enough of platforms; and that in future all genuine republicans may rally together under the standard of Taylor, which is wide enough and broad enough to protect and shelter every true friend of his country, whether a native or a naturalized citizen, no matter what may have been his party designation. Let all such men stand up boldly together in the battle for the rights of man, as secured to us by the great charter of American freedom, the constitution of our country, and the REPUBLICAN PARTY of the country may triumph over all opposition from the self-styled democracy, to the end of time.

Mr. FOOTE.—Mr. President: I have heard it said that it is an established rule among professed rhetoricians, both ancient and modern, that the peroration should always be the most brilliant and imposing part of a speech. It will be readily acknowledged by those who have listened to the honorable Senator from Delaware, that the conclusion of that very magnificent harangue which has riveted our attention for the last two hours or more, is not altogether a very striking exemplification of the rule alluded to. After discussing with great ability, and with much of the pomp and circumstance of the war oratorical, many of the loftiest and most enkindling topics which can claim the consideration of enlightened statesmen, or rouse the sensibilities of the patriot, he descends, with a bathetic impetus which has no parallel, to the examination and elaborate discussion of one of the most petty and trivial topics which ever found its way into a grave deliberative assembly; and thus is he content to close his speech!

Well, sir, since the Senator has resolved that we shall look into the act of the Territorial Legislature of Michigan, to which he says the sanction of our candidate for Presidential honors was actually given, let us examine it. It is as follows:

[The honorable Senator read the act as given above.]

Sir, this law is almost precisely correspondent with statutes to be found upon the statute-book of every State in this Union. I am informed that it is an exact copy of the statute of Vermont on this subject; and I know that there are but few States in the Union which have not at one time had a similar one. Whether General Cass introduced the bill in the Territorial Legislature, of which he was a component member, (for I understand that the whole legislative power was vested in the Governor and three judges of the territorial court;) whether he sanctioned it when proposed by another; or whether it became a law in opposition to his judgment and wishes, we are not informed, nor do I deem it at all material to ascertain. For my part, I am perfectly willing that all such miscreants as are described in the territorial law of Michigan may vote against us in the coming Presidential contest —being perfectly convinced that there will be a sufficient number of honest, industrious, orderly democratic voters to secure us the most signal triumph which has been achieved by the democratic party since the overthrow of the elder Adams.

And now, Mr. President, in closing this debate, I have only to repeat, what I have so often reiterated, that the leaders of the whig party in this body have been called upon to defend their principles, and they have undertaken to do so, but have totally failed even to make a single distinct issue with us. They have been called upon to explain the principles of their Presidential candidate, and they have all confessed their utter inability to do so.—They have been requested to affix some definite interpretation to the published letters of General Taylor, and they have confessed themselves incompetent to the task. The Senator from Delaware says that General Taylor's political creed is to be found in his Allison letter. I have asked him what the Allison letter means upon several important points, and he acknowledges that he is unable to inform me. I have invited the honorable Senator's attention specially to his own letter published in the autumn of 1846, in which he declares that all the old party issues of 1844 are to be decided by the Presidential contest of 1848. I have enquired of him whether he adheres to what he then published. He promised me an answer, but has closed his speech without compliance with his promise. From this time forward, let no man assert that the whigs, as a party, have any political principles; for certain it is, that if they have principles, they are such as they are ashamed to avow, and dare not attempt to vindicate by argument.

Mr. FELCH.—I desire to say a few words in reference to the law referred to in this debate. Neither the Senator from Delaware nor the Senator from Mississippi, appears to understand the territorial organization in Michigan when this law was adopted.

The power of legislation was committed to the governor, the presiding judge, and two associate judges of the territory. These four individuals acting together, possessed the only legislative authority which was exercised within the limits of the territory. They acted together as a board, each having his vote upon the adoption of proposed laws, and under an express provision that a majority should govern. General Cass, who was governor of the territory, had no veto over the action of the other members; he was on an equality only with them and had his simple vote. He may have been opposed to the law in question, and have given his vote against its adoption; yet by the votes of the other three it would become a law, and it would be his duty to certify it in the proper manner to give it effect. From the evidence here presented, it appears to have been adopted by a majority of the governor and judges, but having no record of the action of that tribunal upon it, we have no evidence to show whether General Cass was in favor of it, or against it. All that now appears is perfectly consistent with the truth, even if General Cass strenuously opposed and voted against the adoption of the law. But whether it met his approval or his opposition, is to my mind a matter of little importance.

The law-making powers of the governor and judges were peculiar. They had no general authority of legislating for the territory. Their power was limited to the adopting of such laws of the States, criminal and civil, as might be necessary and best suited to the circumstances of the district. They could adopt the laws of other States, but could originate none. Since the charge has been made in the public papers against General Cass, that he approved the law referred to by the Senator from Delaware, a friend of mine has examined the original in the office of the Secretary of State, and informed me that it is certified upon the manuscript, that the same is adopted from the laws of the State of Vermont. From this information, I assert with confidence that such is the fact. In regard to the character of the laws adopted under the organization abovementioned of the territories of the northwest, two things deserve consideration. The first is that the laws were uniformly adopted from the statutes of the oldest and most enlightened States in the Union; from those in which the subject of good government were most perfectly understood, and the principle of morality most fully established. Hence the State of Vermont, a State which is admitted to be inferior to none in these important respects, is one from which such laws were derived and transferred to the new country in the west. The Senator from Florida asserts that a law similar to that under consideration existed in Massachusetts. And the statute books of most of the old thirteen States, would, I believe, if examined, show similar provisions enacted and enforced at an early period. It is also to be remarked in the second place, that the laws adopted under the early organization in the different territories of the northwest are similar in their character. Many of them are identical in terms; and laws making penal the offences described in the enactment under consideration, and inflicting punishment of the same character, will be found among the early laws of most, if not all the territories, and in some portions of the west they were long continued under the State organizations. In the State of Indiana a law similar in its provisions to that under consideration, was for many years on the statute book and in force. This law at the time of its passage, received the official approval of General Harrison, then governor of the territory of Indiana, and since President of the United States. That law, however, was more severe in its penalties than the law adopted in Michigan. While the punishment in the latter was limited to ten stripes, and to a term of labor not exceeding three months, the Indiana law extended the penalty to forty stripes save one, and the term of service at hard labor to nine months. The law-making power of Indiana at this time resided in a council and House of Representatives. General Harrison, as governor of the territory, had under the ordinance of 1787 an absolute veto upon every bill. Without his approval no law could be valid; to the enactment abovementioned, he gave his approval in writing. General Cass as governor of Michigan, I have already shown, had no such controling power over the action of the board of which he was a member. The law of which the gentleman complains, was adopted in 1818, thirty years ago. Sir, do not all know that within that space of time, crimes and punishments therefor have been the subject of careful investigation, and that the result has been a great change in public opinion, and the laws in regard to them. Methods of punishment approved by all at that time are discarded now. Milder penalties and less ignominious inflictions are adopted by common consent. On this subject the efforts of philanthropists have ameliorated the punishments of offences, and caused a system of criminal laws to be adopted more consonant with the feelings of humanity.

To this advance of public sentiment, I am happy to know that no one gives a more hearty approval than General Cass. His writings on the subject of legal and judicial reform, which may be read by all, exhibit his deep interest in the matter. His efforts have had their share in producing the result, and no man more than he rejoices at such improvements.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, inquired of the Senator from Michigan, whether the law of 1818 was in force at the present time in that State.

Mr. FELCH.—No, sir. It was repealed long ago. The territorial organization under the governor and judges was superseded by what was denominated the second grade of territorial government. In this second form of government, the people were represented by a legislative council, who had, with the governor, the power of legislation. When this form of government was organized, the territory entered on a new course of legislation and new enactments were substituted for the former laws. The law in question was thus rescinded.

Mr. WESTCOTT stated that the law referred to was a part of the laws of Massachusetts and not of Vermont.

Mr. CLAYTON.—The Senator from Mississippi and myself have already occupied quite as much time on this subject as properly belongs to us. I shall be perfectly content to let the country judge between us on the questions we have discussed. The people will very easily decide how much foundation there is for the Senator's pretence, that I have not been sufficiently explicit; and they will have as little difficulty in deciding whether he has been able to answer the question addressed to him. The only thing I wish now to say is, that the territorial law adopted by General Cass in July, 1818, owes its authority to the laws of Congress, which will be found in 1st vol. laws, page 51, and 2d vol. laws, page 308. The one is the ordinance of '87; the other the act to divide the Indian territory into two separate governments.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I concur in the desire, which evidently prevails in the Senate, that the question of the adjournment should be decided to-day; and rise now for the purpose only of doing an act of justice to a distinguished citizen of North Carolina, [Gov. Morehead] whose name has been brought before the Senate in the course of this debate, by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. FOOTE.] In his inaugural address, on being installed President of the whig convention at Philadelphia, that citizen was represented by the Senator from Mississippi as having adopted the sentiment that "to the victors belong the spoils." I was not a member of that convention, but I recollected distinctly the report of the President's opening speech, which appeared in the Philadelphia "North American" on the following morning; and I therefore expressed to the honorable Senator my conviction that he must have been misinformed, and that the distinguished gentleman who presided over the deliberations of that convention, never made use of the language which had been attributed to him. I have since ascertained that the official reporter of the Senate was in attendance at the Philadelphia convention, and made notes of the address of the President. I shall now read the report of what Gov. Morehead really said; from which it will be seen that he utterly repudiated the degrading and detestable sentiment that "to the victors belong the spoils." I beg to state that the report was made by the official reporter of the Senate himself, and no one who knows Dr. Houston can have any doubt as to his entire accuracy:

"All we have to do is to select a standard bearer who will secure the hearty co-operation of all sections of our country in the common cause of our country's welfare. Let us have inscribed upon our banner, "the prosperity of our country."

"We have been told that "to the victor belong the spoils." Let us determine that we will be victors, and when victorious, if spoils we must have, I will be for those which will secure the redemption of our country from her present unhappy condition, which will replenish our lean, gaunt, and hungry Treasury, and restore our country to that flourishing and happy condition from which she has fallen."

Mr. FOOTE.—When this speech was delivered I saw the report, from which I quoted to the Senate the other day, and it represented the presiding officer as delivering the sentiment I charged upon him. I saw the same report in other papers. But under the impression produced by the statement of our reporter I have withdrawn the charge; and I think all parties must be very much indebted to me for bringing this matter under revision.

The VICE PRESIDENT then stated the question to be upon the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] to amend the resolution by striking out the "17th July," and inserting the "31st July."

Mr. DOWNS.—I think it very desirable that the consideration of this subject be postponed for a short time. I understand that the treaty has been received and will be communicated to the Senate shortly, and I think that it and the Oregon territorial bill before us, should be settled before we adjourn. The question is: Shall we be able to perform our business within the time mentioned and be ready to adjourn at that time? We have highly important business before us, and we should have ample time to perfect and conclude that business. In order that we may have a few days more to reflect upon the subject, and to proceed with the important bill before us, I move that the further consideration of this question be postponed until Monday week.

Mr. BERRIEN.—Whatever may be the decision of the Senate upon this resolution, I hope the motion of the Senator from Louisiana will not prevail. It will scarcely be courteous to the House of Representatives who have sent here a resolution proposing to adjourn on the 17th day of July, that we should postpone a consideration until the very day proposed. We shall hold them bound by their action up to the morning of the 17th to do as we shall see fit, while we in the mean time may do as we think proper.—I think we had better meet the question now. Let us have the opinions of Senators upon the different days proposed. In respect to what we can or cannot accomplish, we have heard that suggestion made before, and the answer has been that we will accomplish much more by fixing a day for adjournment, than we shall by leaving the matter undecided. If we fix a day I believe we shall work up to it. If this question is left open, we shall most probably be sitting here in the month of September.

Mr. BREESE.—As this is the day agreed upon for the final vote upon the Oregon territorial bill, I move that to-morrow week instead of Monday week be the day fixed for the consideration of this question.

Mr. DOWNS.—I withdraw my motion, and accept that of the Senator from Indiana as a substitute.

Mr. BERRIEN.—My proposition is not to take up and agree to this resolution, but determine whether we shall agree to or reject it, in order not to keep the House bound by that resolution, while we remain free to pass it or reject it.

Mr. DOWNS.—This subject is a very important one. It is known that when the time is once fixed for adjournment, that the proceedings of the Senate are no longer in the control of a majority of the body. If there be any objections to certain measures, it will be in the power of a minority to defeat their passage by talking against time. For one, I will not place Congress in this situation at the present time. I believe it is vastly important to the peace and quietude of the country that this question of the territorial bill should be settled, and that Congress ought never to adjourn until it is settled. Already we have notice of a sort of northern Congress to assemble at Buffalo on the 9th of August, and if Congress goes away without settling this great question, my word for it it will not be long before we will have a southern as well as a northern Congress. It is in the power of Congress now to settle this measure, and I trust that time will be allowed them to have it settled.

Mr. LEWIS.—There are certain questions before us, which, if not settled now, I do not think ever will be. I therefore move that the longest period proposed be the day fixed for considering the question of adjournment.

Mr. TURNEY.—I am opposed to fixing any day for adjournment. I think this question of the territorial bill must be settled at the present session, or it never will be settled. We are told that by fixing a day we can work up to it. Sir, though I have been a member of this body but a short time, I have witnessed the defeat of a highly important measure by speaking against time. The three million bill was lost in this chamber by it. There is an important and deeply agitating question now before us, superinduced by the presentation of the Oregon territorial bill. Are we desirous of placing it in the power of those who are desirous of shunning off this question to do so? For one, sir, I am not willing to place the time of adjournment beyond our control, until the Oregon territorial bill has first passed.

Mr. ALLEN.—I am of opinion that all we can do, and do well, may be done in a month. I shall, therefore, vote against the proposition, and in favor of fixing the last day of this month as the day for adjournment.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. DOWNS, that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until Monday week: and it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Calhoun, Clarke, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Dix, Dickinson, Dodge, Iowa, Fairfield, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hannegan, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Lewis, Mangum, Metcalf, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Sprague, Sturgeon, Underwood, and Upham—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Calhoun, Clarke, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Dix, Dickinson, Dodge, Iowa, Fairfield, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hannegan, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Lewis, Mangum, Metcalf, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Sprague, Sturgeon, Underwood, and Upham—32.

Mr. BREESE then moved that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow week; and upon this question the yeas and nays were ordered, and it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Benton, Borland, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Clayton, Dawson, Mississippi, Dodge, Downs, Foote, Hunter, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Cameron, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Johnson, of Maryland, Mangum, Metcalf, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Underwood and Upham—22.

The question recurring on agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. BRIGHT—

Mr. DOWNS moved that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was determined in the negative.

Mr. BRIGHT.—My reason for making the motion for adjournment on the 31st of July was, because I feel satisfied that by time we shall be ready to adjourn. The Senators from Louisiana and Tennessee would make it appear that there is a party in this Senate who are endeavoring to dodge an all-important question—a question which they further assert, if left unsettled by this Congress, may lead to the dissolution of this Union. Sir, I am well satisfied that speech-making in Congress cannot separate this Union. I desire much to see the Oregon territorial bill settled, and I think that by fixing the 31st of July, we may put an end to useless debate, and conclude all our business by that period. For one, sir, I am anxious to vote upon all the bills before us; and if we vote more, and speak less, we can soon despatch our business.

Mr. RUSK.—Mr. President, I desire to say but a very few words. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] has remarked that if we vote more and speak less, we shall be able to get through business by the 31st July. This may be true, sir. But will the fixing that day for adjournment stop the speaking? I doubt it. On the contrary, sir, I believe that if there is a disposition any where to avoid the responsibility of meeting the important questions presented by the territorial bills, the fixing a day for adjournment will increase the talking. Sir, it is the duty of this Congress to establish governments both in Oregon and California, and furnish ample means for the protection of the citizens of those territories. There is, at this moment, an Indian war going on in Oregon, and while we are engaged in the laudable business of President making, your citizens in Oregon, without regard to age or sex, are being butchered by savages. To the hardy enterprize of these people, in a great measure, you owe your present possession of that country. They are not represented here. They have been described in this hall, as intruders upon the public domain; and all power to make any laws for their government and safety, has been denied them. I look upon them, sir, as citizens, worthy citizens of this republic, and fully entitled to have the protecting arm of this government thrown around them. It may do for gentlemen here, who are in no danger, to theorize and make long speeches, intended to affect the question of the day or a future presidential election. But, sir, it is the bounden duty of this government, to afford prompt and speedy protection to the citizens of Oregon. They have been neglected too long already. They are as much entitled to our consideration, as the citizens of any of the States of this Union. Fix the day of adjournment, and you deny them protection in all probability, for the next four years.

The citizens of California equally demand your consideration, as a state of anarchy and confusion will prevail there. The population of that country are of discordant materials. They are discontented Mexicans; disappointed English capitalists, who have been baulked in their schemes of securing that important country.—They are surrounded by war-like tribes of Indians, who have been, and will be again, unless prevented, incited to acts of hostility. You owe it to them, sir, you owe it to your own character, as well as interest, to make prompt and efficient provision for their protection. Fix your day for adjournment now, and any bill upon that subject will be defeated. More than that, sir, if this question is not now settled, I fear it will not be in the next four years. It is too important a question for reckless and aspiring politicians to make capaital out for the campaign of '52. Now, in my opinion, is the most propitious time to settle it. I hope it will be done; but I confess, sir, I have my doubts that it will be settled. It is in my humble opinion, a question vastly more important to the quiet, not to say safety of this Union, than any contest for the Presidency can be.

Mr. BUTLER.—I ask the question solemnly, if this Congress should disperse this month, and return in December, whether it will then constitute a more temperate or impartial tribunal for the satisfactory decision of the grave issue upon which we have to pass at some time or other than it is at present? Sir, having the whole control of the matter in our hands, now cannot we dispose of it more satisfactorily than at any other time? If we disperse and go away without settling this question, the public mind will become more and more inflamed, and we shall meet here in December, nothing more nor less than a packed jury; for one section of the Union will be arrayed against the other section. Sir, it is our duty, having the control of this matter, to take the responsibility of deciding this question for ourselves. If we do not, gentlemen cannot tell the consequence that may result. If the business before us can all be disposed of by the 31st of July, I am perfectly willing to adjourn on that day. But if we are to go into the discussion of these important questions before us, let us have the longest period that may be convenient fixed for the day of adjournment.

Mr. BELL.—I voted against both propositions to postpone the further consideration of the resolution. If necessary, I shall do so again. I do not feel the alarm or apprehension expressed by some of the Senators, in relation to this subject, by any means. Nevertheless, there are considerations connected with it that are of great weight. I understand from the Senator from Louisiana that the treaty will soon be communicated to the Senate, which will of course bring with it the question of the true boundary of Texas for settlement. I should like, for one, to see also what disposition is to be made in relation to the government of the territory of California and New Mexico, as well as of Oregon, before I aid in placing the time of adjournment beyond our control. I think that we might fix a day, and then lay the resolution upon the table, thus having it in our power, at any day, to call it up and pass it if we find the business before us rapidly maturing. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question being taken upon the motion of Mr. BELL, that the resolution lie on the table, it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Bell, Benton, Borland, Butler, Calhoun, Clayton, Dawson, Mississippi, Dodge, Downs, Foote, Hunter, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalf, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Johnson, of Maryland, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Underwood and Upham—26.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The disposition of this subject which seems to me most proper would be, to adopt the amendment to the amendment which fixes the 31st day of July as the day of adjournment, and then it could afterwards be altered as the necessity of the case might require. Thus we would indicate to the House our disposition to adjourn by that time and then the resolution might be laid on the table. It seems to me that the time has not yet come when the Senate ought to give up the control over this subject, and that we are not prepared to say now whether we can possibly get through our business by that time. Still, by the adoption of an amendment we shall evince a disposition to adjourn by that time; and then, by laying the resolution on the table, we may accommodate ourselves.

Mr. BRADBURY.—The Senate will recollect that the other day when this subject was under consideration, by almost general consent, the 31st of July seemed to be regarded as the proper time for adjournment. Sir, how can we expect to get on with our business unless we do designate a day. Then it was apparent that the business might be all accomplished by the 31st of July. By leaving the question open, we have gone on to other subjects. The surest way is to designate the day, and then we shall be likely to have our debates confined to the subjects under consideration. We are most likely to get action upon the subjects before us by fixing a day, add, for one, I think that by the 31st of July we can accomplish all that is necessary to be desired.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia.—I have no disposition at this late hour of the day, to trespass upon the time of the Senate, but nevertheless I feel it my duty to present very briefly the reasons for the vote I am about to give. I am sorry to differ with my colleague as to the propriety of fixing at this time a day for the adjournment of Congress, as the interests we represent are identical. Sir, the question involved in the twelfth section of the bill for the organization of a territorial government in Oregon, is the great question of the session, and should be settled before we think of adjournment. It is an agitating question. The region of country from which I come is deeply excited; and indeed I may say the whole country is deeply excited. The eyes of the people North and South are turned with intense anxiety to the action of Congress upon the subject of slavery in the territories of the United States. It is due to them—they have a right to expect and demand at the hands of their representatives that this agitating question should be put to rest—removed from the arena of politics. In I could have the assurance that it is the fixed determination of Congress before its adjournment to decide these questions growing out of the territorial bills, I would vote for the earliest adjournment. But in opposition to the statements of experienced Senators, I must beg leave to entertain the opinion that it is unsafe and unwise to fix a day of adjournment until we have made such progress as will ensure definite action. The question of restricting slavery in the territories is one of such magnitude that it must and will lead to protracted debate. It is not wrong that it should—it ought to be thoroughly discussed, to the end that the opinions of the various sections of our country may be fairly understood—that those who represent the various shades of opinion may commune freely and candidly with each other. Fix a day of adjournment now, and you jeopard every thing; you place it in the power of those disposed to evade these absorbing issues, (if any there be,) at the last expiring moments of the session to defeat the bill by speaking against time. Is it right to do this thing? Is it not the part of wisdom and prudence, to hold this subject of adjournment under our control, so that we may be certain of transacting the business entrusted to us? If this question of slavery in the territories be left open, the country continues agitated—the public mind is kept in the most painful suspense. Sir, I am disposed to relieve the country from this state of agitation, which is calculated to sever the ties of fraternity which bind together the different sections of the confederacy, and weaken the bonds of this Union. Take this question from the arena of politics and you save us from the evils consequent upon its continuing to be use as capital in the scramble for party power. Is not this an object worthy of serious consideration?

Can it be possible that it is the consideration of a few dollars and cents which will be drawn from the Treasury, by protracting the session for a few days, which is producing upon the minds of Senators such haste for an adjournment? No, sir, it cannot be. Dollars and cents sink into utter insignificance, when compared with the momentous question now before the Senate.

Can it be expected that the business before Congress can be well done by the 31st of this month? Look at your calendar and see the accumulated matter yet to be disposed of. Remember that very little progress has yet been made in the appropriation bills, absolutely necessary for the administration of the government. The general appropriation bill has not yet passed the other house. In a day or two we shall receive a message from the President, communicating the ratification of the treaty with Mexico and recommending legislation of a most important character. The territories of New Mexico and California are to be legislated for—legislation in reference to the reduction of the army must be had. Can all this, which requires deliberation, wisdom and prudence be done, within the time designated? Sir, these are weighty considerations in my humble judgment, and admonish us not to be hasty in deciding upon a day of adjournment. No Senator can be more anxious to return home, to his private affairs than I am; but impressed with the views which I have expressed, I cannot resist the conviction that it is my duty to oppose an adjournment until these weighty matters are disposed of.

Sir, I will present one other view upon this subject. The democratic party are in the majority in this body. If we adjourn without disposing of the question of slavery in the territories, a disappointed country will hold that party responsible—responsible for all the excitement and agitation which will distract the public mind. I do not make this remark for the purpose of imparting a partisan character to this debate. All I desire to do is to remind this side of the chamber of the deep responsibility which rests upon them. On the other side of this chamber we see a unanimous vote for the adjournment on the 31st of this month. Why is this? I charge partizan motives to nobody; but I do say this, that on that side there is too much sagacity for them not to see that they have nothing to lose as a party, by the failure to adjust this question of slavery. Let there be such a failure, and it will be charged upon this side that we feared to meet this question, and that in certain quarters there were those who dreaded action upon it. Disavowing any intention to enter into partizan discussion, I throw out these hints to remind Senators on this side, of their responsibility. We have the power to settle these delicate questions; if we do not do it, we subject ourselves to blame. Then let us resolve to meet them, and meet them boldly; and for this purpose to entertain no idea of adjournment until the work is done, and well done.

The question recurring on the motion by Mr. DOWNS to amend the amendment by substituting the "14th August" for the "31st July"—

Mr. LEWIS moved that the resolution lie on the table; and, the yeas and nays being ordered, it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Bell, Benton, Borland, Butler, Calhoun, Clayton, Dawson, of Mississippi, Dodge, Downs, Foote, Hunter, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Metcalfe, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, Yulee—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Johnson, of Maryland, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Underwood, Upham—25.

Mr. RUSK moved that the Senate adjourn; and, the yeas and nays being ordered, it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Benton, Borland, Butler, Calhoun, Dodge, Downs, Foote, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, Yulee—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Bright, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Johnson, of Maryland, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Underwood, Upham—26.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. DOWNS to amend the amendment, by substituting the "14th August" for the "31st July;" and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Borland, Butler, Calhoun, Dickinson, Downs, Foote, Hunter, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Rusk, Sebastian—13

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Badger, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Mississippi, Dix, Dodge, Dixon, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Mangum, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Yulee—33.

The question recurring upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. BRIGHT—

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I wish to explain my vote upon this question. If we fix a day, as is proposed, those who are unwilling to meet the great question before us would have an inducement and an opportunity offered for idle and protracted discussion, in order to have the bill delayed, so as not to vote upon it finally at this session. I am desirous of an early adjournment; and am convinced that all legislation, not absolutely necessary, may be adjourned to the next session of Congress. The question involved in this territorial bill, however, should be settled at this session. I shall vote against fixing any day.

Mr. ALLEN.—I am quite willing and ready to vote at a moment's warning upon any question that is yet to come before us for final decision this session. I can do so without offering one word of argument; and if this question be not acted upon, it shall not be because of argument or speech from me.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment of Mr. BRIGHT, to strike out "the 17th day of July" and insert "the 31st day of July," and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Johnson, of Maryland, Mangum, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Borland, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Dodge, Downs, Foote, Hunter, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Rusk, Sebastian, Turney, Westcott, Yulee—19.

Mr. BRIGHT then moved that the resolution lie upon the table. He remarked that the Senate had done now all that he thought was necessary at the present time in regard to the resolution. They had, by fixing upon a day evidenced to the country that they were willing to adjourn at the earliest moment consistent with the public interests. They could now proceed with the important business before them, and as soon as it approximated to completion, they could call up the resolution, and finally dispose of it.

Mr. DICKINSON made a few remarks of a similar tenor, when—

Mr. BRIGHT renewed his motion that the resolution lie on the table; and, the yeas and nays being ordered, it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Bell, Benton, Borland, Breese, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dodge, Downs, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hunter, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, Yulee—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Berrien, Bradbury, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dix, Felch, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Johnson, of Maryland, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Underwood, Upham—22.

So it was Ordered, That the resolution lie on the table.

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr. MASON.—Mr. President: It seems that the people in Oregon, finding themselves without other law, when the title to the territory was ascertained and established in the United States, assembled in convention and enacted laws for their temporary security. Amongst these laws we have been duly informed is one by which slavery, or, as it is termed, "involuntary servitude except for crime," is forever prohibited.

Sir, whatever crude opinions may have been formed, when the subject now to be discussed was first under consideration in this body, or elsewhere, I apprehend there are none now who will say that the people of a territory belonging to the United States have a right, proprio jure, to pass laws in derogation of the authority of the United States. If there were such opinions, they have been exploded, and I assume that there is no Senator, and no jurist, who will maintain, that when the people who may be found within a territory belonging to the United States, undertaking for their own safety, or for any other reason, to legislate for that territory without the sanction of the government, that such laws have any validity whatever against the owners of the country—that is to say against the government of the United States.—Well, sir, the Committee on Territories in this body, by instruction from the Senate, have reported a bill providing a government for the Territory of Oregon—under the sanction of what? of the government of the United States, whose property it is. And by the 12th section of the bill, the laws now existing within the limits of Oregon, be they what they may, are adopted, and declared to be in full force for the government of the people of the territory. One of those laws then being, that involuntary servitude or slavery shall be forever thereafter excluded from the territory; and that law being adopted by the bill upon your table, if that bill be enacted into law, it follows of necessity, that involuntary servitude will be excluded from that territory by act of the Congress of the United States; and thus we are called upon to treat this bill, so far as regards the 12th section of it, precisely as if there was spread out on its face a prohibition in terms against slavery in that territory. Sir, it is right that it should be clearly understood, that it should be uncovered, that we should expose it, so that we may defeat it if we can.

Gentlemen have said upon this floor, that the southern States, (where alone this institution is found,) are here agitating this question—that the southern States have presented the question before the national councils—and that for all the consequences that result from its agitation, the South is responsible. Let, then, the truth be known; let the fact appear that a committee of this body have introduced a bill with this provision in it, and if there be offence in agitating the question, let the responsibility rest where it of right belongs. What we seek to do is simply to defeat it.—We ask no legislation on the subject whatever, but having stricken this clause from the bill, to leave it, as to that, tabula rasa.

Mr. President, in common with others who stand upon this floor, representatives of sovereign States of the South, parties to this confederation, I depend, not upon the compromises of the constitution, (as they are called,) but upon its guarantees. And I here announce, as I will undertake to show, that if this provision prevails, and it is the deliberate sense of this Senate, that slavery by act of Congress, is hereafter to be interdicted in the Territory of Oregon, it is done not only in derogation of the faith of the constitution, but it is done in violation of its letter. Sir, the guarantees of the constitution, I am free to admit, are founded in compromise, and although there may be no form of expression in the instrument, which would lead us to infer that compromises existed, yet they will be found in the character of the enactments, and in the contemporaneous history of the proceedings which led to those enactments. Sir, need I say to gentlemen around me here, legislators of the land, that in any government which is not founded in absolute force—in any government whose just power is derived from the consent of the governed, more especially if it consist of a confederation of States, each sovereign within its sphere, that such government can never be formed, without mutual and great concessions, made with mutual forbearance for the common good of all; and under how much greater necessity of concession and compromise must such government be, when made up of States, extending for thousands of miles through every variety of climate, and with all the jarring and conflicting interests, that are incident to variety of occupation and of product. These compromises of the constitution, or more properly the guarantees that resulted from them, are what the South now appeals to for the preservation of their federal righss—rights secured to them by compact, and for which ample consideration was paid on their part.

Having premised this much, I now approach this subject with the gravity that becomes the occasion. It has been well said that republics have their foundation in public virtue, and when this is absent, they soon degenerate and fall into decay. Equally true is it, that confederations must have their foundations laid in political integrity and good faith. Constitutional obligation is of little force, when all respect is lost for constitutional faith.

Mr. President, there has been but one former occasion when this formidable question was before the country in its present aspect; and Senators now present, who were then in the national councils, will bear me witness, that in its agitation then, the solid foundations of the Union were shaken. Upon the refusal to admit the State of Missouri into the Union without a clause in her constitution against the continuance of slavery within her limits, the whole South stood in hostile array against the North and East. The feeling it excited in the southern States was deep and intense.—There was no dissension or difference in that quarter. The attempt to degrade the people of Missouri below the level of equality with the other States, insulting as it was, was yet a small offence, compared with the magnitude of the principle it involved—a principle which assumed a right in the majority, under the sanction of the constitution, to forbid the extension of the slave population beyond the limits to which it was then confined. Sir, after a lapse of more than a quarter of a century, the same question is again presented, and we are now to discuss, calmly and temperately I hope, whether a numerical majority has the power, under constitutional sanction, to interfere with the institutions of the southern States, by forbidding their extension into territory, the common property of the Union, and thus to disparage and impair the political weight which has been assigned by the constitution to this portion of the confederacy.

Mr. President, when the constitution was adopted in 1788, the institution of slavery formed an important part of the social condition of all the southern, and of many of the northern States. Its existence and its influence upon the future destiny of the South, where, from climate and other causes, it was most likely to become permanent, was recognized and discussed with mature deliberation. The antagonist interest of the North and East, where it had then already dwindled and was soon to disappear, was brought out in full array; and after months of consideration and debate by the wise and patriotic men then assembled; after great and mutual concessions on all sides for the common good, a representative weight in the federal councils was assigned to the slave population, and secured to the States interested by perpetual guarantee of the constitution.

Sir, there are four provisions in this instrument, recognizing slavery and providing appropriate guarantees for the security of that institution.

First—In the 2d section of the 1st article, establishing a basis of representation on three-fifths of that population.

Second—In the 9th section of the same article, prohibiting the passage of any law by Congress prior to the year 1808, [a period of twenty years] to prevent the further importation of slaves by any of the States.

Third—In the 5th article, providing that no amendment to the constitution shall affect the prohibitions of the 9th section of the 1st article, prior to the year 1808. And,

Fourth—In the 2d clause, 2d section of the 4th article, providing for the surrender of fugitive slaves, on the claim of their owners, by the State where such fugitive may be found.

These, sir, are all full and distinct recognitions of a class held in bondage, and are guarantees provided by the constitutional compact—first, allowing their continued importation for twenty years; second, providing for the security of their tenure as property; and, third, and most important, admitting them in the scale of representation as an element of political power; and for each one of these guarantees, a full and ample equivalent was given to the northern and eastern States, in immunities and advantages secured to them. I will instance a very striking one, which has been rescued from oblivion by Mr. Jefferson and left under his hand as a memorial for history. It is taken from his unpublished manuscripts, and was communicated to me many years since by the Hon. Wm. C. Rives, of Virginia, my predecessor on this floor.

Mr. Jefferson was minister in France whilst the convention sat which formed the constitution, and Mr. Mason, at whose relation he recorded this scrap for history, was a member of that convention, and it is dated at the family seat of the relator some four years only after the event:

"Gunston Hall, September 20, 1792.

"[illegible] Mason. The constitution [illegible] the convention was [illegible] Rejection in the Senate. A navigation act [illegible] and especially on part of regulation. To these New England States were [illegible] which would lead us to infer that [illegible] that such government [illegible] and Delaware. northern and eastern States, to do what? To prevent the extension of what they call the "slave power." I put it to those Senators, what do they mean by the "slave power?"

Mr. DIX.—I did not make such a declaration.

Mr. MASON.—I so understood the Senator in his remarks, although I do not find the expression in his printed speech. It was used then by the Senator from Vermont. What is the "slave power?" In the discussion of a question like this, we have a right to expect that Senators should give us terms that are intelligible. What, then, is the slave power to which the Senator says an end must be put? Why, sir, it is the representative weight which is assigned by the constitution to this species of population or property. If there be any power lodged by the constitution, in which it is supposed the northern States do not share in common with their brethren in other States, it is referrible to the clause of the constitution which arranges and distributes the representation. And it is this power, for which an ample equivalent has been given, which we are told now by Senators is not further to be extended. Mr. President, this representative weight, assigned to the States of this Union by the constitution, must be preserved. If it is not preserved, I need not tell gentlemen here what the consequences will be. It is not only necessary for the security of their property, but it is indispensable to their political welfare. The question of abolition heretofore has been a mere brutum fulmen, but it comes now in a shape that is no longer to be despised. The institution was first assailed when a majority in the federal Congress attempted in 1820 to prevent the State of Missouri from coming into this Union, unless upon terms derogatory to her as a sovereign State, and directly in violation of the constitution. Sir, I know not how it was felt at the North—I know not how far northern statesmen or northern politicians may have believed that their ascendancy was involved in the curtailment of the slave representation, but I know this, that in the South it required but the application of the flesh to kindle the whole country. They looked upon it as not only vital to their safety, but they looked upon the attempt to assail it, as an insult, an indignity offered to them as sovereign members of this confederacy. Sir, Mr. Jefferson, lived in those days. No man, I suppose, will question his loyalty to the constitution, and none his sagacity as a statesman. A letter was read on this floor the other day by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN] in which Mr. Jefferson spoke his alarm at the portentous consequences threatened by this movement against the South. His mind was filled with the portents of the occasion, and his views freely expressed in letters to his friends, show that in this parricidal attack, he saw the days of the constitution numbered.

Mr. Jefferson's opinions on the occasion cited are entitled to great weight. A matured statesman and philosopher, profoundly versed as well in the science of government as in the shoals and depths of party, he saw through the vista of years this disturbing influence—ever on the alert, when once aroused, until its wicked work was ended in the overthrow of the constitution of his country.

In a letter, dated on the 13th April, 1820, to Mr. , a gentleman now living, he says:

"The old schism of federal and republican threatened nothing, because it existed in every State, and each State in every one of the two great parties; but the commonness of the principle, as applied to the different sections of the Union, now excited the [illegible] would not [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] preserving [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ritory in the West was the subject of much jealousy and dissension with those States whose boundaries were more circumscribed.

Virginia, whose chartered limits once extended to the Pacific, (then called the South sea,) had yet an immense territory unoccupied lying to the northwest of the Ohio river. New York claimed a part of the same territory in opposition to the title of Virginia. While the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut, in the East, and Georgia and the two Carolinas, in the South, each held large bodies of waste and unappropriated land.

It was said by the other States that it was unjust and inequitable that these vast territories, the enjoyment of which had been secured to their respective claimants by the blood and treasure of all, freely lavished in the revolutionary struggle, should be thus separately held. That Delaware, Maryland and New Jersey had equally contributed to rescue them from the dominion of the British crown, and it was oppressive and unjust to exclude them from the fruits of the conquest. This feeling, which grew as the Revolution progressed, manifested itself in a decided manner when the "articles of confederation and perpetual union," agreed to by Congress in 1777, were recommended to the several States for their ratification. The State of Maryland refused to ratify, and placed her refusal upon the express ground that she was excluded from participation in these unoccupied lands. I read an extract from the "instructions of the general assembly of Maryland to her delegates in Congress," presented by them on the 21st May, 1779:

"We are convinced policy and justice require that a country unsettled at the commencement of the war, claimed by the United empire and ceded by it to the treaty of Paris, if vacated from the common enemy by the blood and treasure of the thirteen States, should be considered as a common property, subject to be parceled out by Congress, into free, convenient and independent governments in such manner and at such times as the wisdom of that assembly shall hereafter direct.

"We have coolly and dispassionately considered the subject, we have weighed probable inconveniences and hardships against the sacrifices of yet unsettled rights, and do instruct you not to agree to the confederation unless an article or articles be added thereto in conformity with our declaration."

New Jersey did ratify, but under protest, "in the firm reliance that the candor and justice of the several States will, in due time, remove, as far as possible, the inequality which now subsists." The State of Delaware also came into that confederacy, but under like protest, from which I shall also ask leave to read an extract, as it exhibits the feeling which then actuated the States; all which they were willing to lay down for the common good:

"Extract from the resolutions of the State of Delaware, presented by her delegates in Congress, February 23, 1779:

"Resolved, That this State consider themselves justly entitled to a right, in common with the members of the Union, to that extensive tract of country which lies westward of the frontier of the United States, the property of which was not vested in or granted to individuals at the commencement of the present war; that the same hath been or may be gained from the King of Great Britain or the native Indians by the blood and treasure of all, and ought therefore to be a common estate, to be granted out on terms beneficial to the United States."

Sir, it is useful to go back, and contrast the spirit with which these States came originally together, in the days of the revolution, with that which animates some of them now. Such was the state of things when the territory was ceded, which is now brought up in judgment against Virginia, and other Southern States. And what was done? Why the State of New York set the example, and made the sacrifice required on the altar of the country, for the common good. Let me exhibit an extract from an act passed by New York.

"Whereas nothing under Divine Providence can more effectually contribute to the tranquility and safety of the United States of America, than a federal alliance on such principles as will give satisfaction to its respective members, and whereas the articles of confederation and perpetual union recommended by the honorable the Congress of the United States of America have not proved agreeable to all the States, it having been conceived that a portion of the waste and uncultivated territory within the limits, or claims of certain States ought to be appropriated as a common fund for the equal benefit of the whole: and the people of this State, from motives of equity, justice and magnanimity, disposed to make every proper sacrifice for the common interest and security, and more especially to accomplish so desirable an union, by removing as far as in their power lies, the before mentioned impediment to its final accomplishment. Be it therefore enacted."

And then followed a resolution of the old Congress accepting this territorial grant from the State of New York, and inviting the other States to do the like. Sir, the next State in order was Virginia. There had been a strong remonstrance presented by Virginia to this claim of New York to the lands which she considered embraced within her territory of the north-west, the whole of which was forgotten and laid aside, and that great State in the year 1783 gave authority to her Representatives in Congress, to convey to the United States in absolute perpetuity, a territory that is covered by ten parallels of latitude, and thirteen degress of longitude, out of which have been carved five of the States which are now in the Union, and enjoying its protection. And she did it for what? Why to meet in a spirit of conciliation the concessions of other States, to do every thing for the common good, and to accomplish which, she has truly given up her birthright. Contrast the language held by New York in the act of 1780, with the language held by her Senator on this floor now. Sir, who believes when it required a spirit of such mutual forbearance and concession, a spirit that was disposed to give up every thing for the common good, in order to prevail upon the States to bind themselves in articles of confederation, that you can keep those States under any federative government whatever, when that spirit is forgotten and disregarded. Who is there on this floor who believes that Virginia, the largest, most populous, and most wealthy of the Southern States, ever would have been a party to the constitution, if there had been a provision engrafted in it, forbidding an extension of any part of her population to any territory, that might hereafter become the property of the United States? No one. And if she would not then, and believes now that such extension is her constitutional right, who believes that she or any of her southern sister States can remain in the confederacy, when the barriers that had been erected for their protection, have been ruthlessly broken down and disregarded?

Every movement that is made affecting the rights and power of the southern States in reference to this population, is looked upon there, as in derogation of their exclusive authority. They are sensitive on this subject. It forms a part of their most valuable property. It is a great element of their political power, and its proper management is essential to their safety. Yet honorable Senators here, as I understand them, looking upon the powers of this government as unlimited, perfectly without control, approach this subject as they would approach an ordinary subject of legislation, and assert a right to control it, whether with or without the assent of the States where alone the institution is found. Is not all power that is not granted to the general government reserved to the States? And do you find anything in the constitution which authorizes any interference on the part of the general government with the domestic institutions, and the regulation of the internal affairs of the States? Sir, in this connexion I was very much struck with one view presented by the Senator from Vermont. The Senator from South Carolina attempted to show, and I think successfully, that let this power of legislation over the territories be derived whence it might, it was a trust to be administered by this government for the benefit of the States to whom the trust was created. I understood the Senator from Vermont to say, it was not a "trust, and that it was not because there was devolved upon Congress "legislative discretion."

Mr. PHELPS.—The Senator misapprehends me. My remark was that there was no analogy to be drawn between a legislative trust and a judicial trust; and that the important difference between the two was the ingredient of legislative discretion.

Mr. MASON.—A trust is a trust, whether it be created under the sanction of law, or result from a delegated authority to legislate. And although in its latter form, there may be what the Senator calls "legislative discretion," yet such discretion does not extinguish the trust. The Senator will not contend that it does; neither will a legislative discretion enlarge the powers of the trustee. They remain limited by the object of the trust, though the choice of means to execute it may be extended. Be it a public or a private trust, its obligations on the trustee are the same, that he shall not transcend his delegated authority. And if you want to determine whether the trust has been well or ill performed, you must look at the charter creating it.

Mr. President, I will not say there is a party, but there are statesmen in this country who look upon this government as a property to be enjoyed and parcelled out, rather than as a trust to be administered for the common good; and here is one great instance in which this principle is to be affirmed or denied. A territory is common property, the property of all; and I submit to any Senator who hears me, as I will also to the judgment of posterity—whether the trust is properly fulfilled when you exclude from such common property a large portion of the joint owners. The Senator from Vermont, however, has said, that when you forbid slavery within territory belonging to the United States, you do not destroy the equality between the citizens of the States, because all citizens are free to go there. Sir, if this is not keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope, I know not where an instance may be found. What would you have? Suppose a portion of that territory be valuable to the South, you extend full permission to the planters of the South to go there, provided, they will abandon the only property that would make it valuable to them after they get there. That is the equality which the Senator from Vermont would mete out to us. No, sir. I insist that the guarantees of the constitution to which I have referred, as recognizing this portion of our population, and assigning its stipulated representative weight, were never designed to exclude the States interested, from participating equally with the rest, in all future acquisitions of territory.

I put it to honorable Senators who hear me, what would be the condition of the South, if this pretension were submitted to? There are now three millions of slaves I presume, in the southern States, and such is their condition of ease and comfort, and abundance, that they increase faster than the white population; and you propose to circumscribe them, and declare that on no occasion shall they ever be extended into the territories of the United States. What then will be the condition of the South; with their lands worn out, and walls of circumvallation thrown around them, they will have no choice but to abandon their property and their homes. And the Senator from Vermont says this is all right, there is no objection to "penning them up," and if ever they emerge beyond those prescribed limits they must come out as freemen? I ask Senators where are they to go. What territory is there within the free States that will receive a class of free blacks, not one. And yet the honorable Senator with the calmness that becomes a philosopher, or a gentleman who is not implicated at all in this institution, tells us, it is all very well, there is no objection to "penning them up." We had an instance in Virginia not long ago of the fate that awaits emancipated negroes in the free States. A gentleman whose sagacity and intellect illustrated and adorned the counsels of the country, while he lived, and whose memory will be honored and venerated when others shall be forgotten, manumitted his slaves, by his last will to the number of some five hundred, and made ample provision for their location beyond the limits of the slave States. His executor—a man who knew what a trust was—went to the State of Ohio, and by invitation there, purchased a tract of country as a residence for the manumitted slaves, and when he took them there, they were driven off by force, by the people of the country where he had purchased. Sir, this matter of abolition is destitute of every savor of humanity, if the slave population are to be manumitted under the promise of a refuge in the free States of the Union. The Senator from New York has told us very truly, that the black population in a state of freedom dwindles and diminishes, and would soon become extinct. It is incident to their race. They do not multiply in a state of freedom on our continent. No, sir, contemplate the spectacle we have in these northen States now, see the rivalry, jealousy, and hatred that is engendered there between the white population and the free blacks; and see that race the subject of so much commiseration here, because they are in slavery, dying and rotting in nakedness and filth, in the cellars and dens of your northern cities. Sir, there was another idea thrown out by the Senator from Vermont. I understood him to assert distinctly, and thence draw an important legal deduction, that a slave was not property, but that the tenure was, what? A mere "incident to a domestic relation." Well, sir, that was certainly a felicitous term of expression. But the objection to it is, that it is utterly void of meaning—the civilians tells us, that slavery had its origin in the rights of conquest—the captor had the right to put his prisoner to death, and when he spared his life, it was done on the implied contract, that the captive should become his bonds man.

This is yet the law of the savage race in Africa; and the first negro slave that was landed on our shores brought this condition with him from the land of his birth.

Slavery, then, is an incident to a hostile relation, which is the very opposite to a domestic relation

But, be this as it may, the condition of slavery is fixed in the country whence the subject comes. It required no special law to create it here, as seems to have been supposed by an honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES.] The first slaves imported into Virginia were landed from a Dutch ship in 1620, and were purchased by the planters. The common law was then the law of the colony. By that law their condition as property was recognized, and under its pervading principle, that the issue follows the condition of the mother, partus sequitur ventrem, their descendants, as well as the descendants of every subsequent importation, have remained in bondage. There never was a statute in Virginia creating slavery, nor was there any need of one to establish that institution. The only statute of that character was one, passed at an early day, forbidding the planters from making slaves of the Indian children, who were sent in as hostages.

Laws have been passed from time to time regulating the condition of slavery as a recognized condition of part of the population; but for no other end. And by the policy of such legislation, slaves have been at one time treated as real estate, and at another as personal.

The condition of slavery, then, is nothing more than the right of the owner to the service of the bondsman during the life of the latter, and to which the jus disponendi is attached, as to any other species of property—the same right which the master at common law has to the service of the servant, or the master to the apprentice; the only difference being, so far as the quality of property is concerned, that the one is temporary and the other during life. Whence then does the honorable Senator from Vermont derive his opinion, that a slave is not property.

But the deduction drawn by that honorable Senator is equally untenable. Proceeding upon the assumption, that slavery is a mere "incident to a domestic relation," he argues that it can exist only where such "domestic relation" is recognized by law; and that in consequence, when a slave is taken to a State where there is no such relation, he becomes free.

Sir, I think I have established as a legal proposition the very opposite. When the condition of the subject is that of bondage, whether it be temporary or perpetual, it is recognized by law, and enforced as a legal right. And if it be the case of a slave, such slave becomes free when taken to a country or State only, where such servitude is forbidden or prohibited by express local law. It follows, then, that while no special law is required to create this species of bondage, it does require positive or special law to destroy it; and such laws have been passed in all the States where slavery has been prohibited.

Mr. WALKER.—Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MASON.—Certainly.

Mr. WALKER.—Does the Senator mean to say that slavery is the natural condition of man, and that manumission is a mere step in the progress of an artificial condition?

Mr. MASON.—I am unaware that the Senator from Wisconsin can draw that deduction from any thing said by me.

Mr. WALKER.—My deduction may not be the same that the Senator himself would draw. I merely ask, in order to get an explanation of the honorable Senator's views.

Mr. MASON.—The proposition I assert is this: that the African population brought to the shores of North America in bondage, and sold to the inhabitants as bondsmen, brought slavery as their condition from the shores of Africa, and the law recognized it here. That is all. What the natural condition of these people in Africa may have been, the Senator may determine for himself; but where the condition of bondage is once fixed, that condition is recognized by law, unless there be a statute to the contrary. It is said, that in Africa this relict of barbarism, which places the captive at the absolute disposal of the captor, remains, and the larger portion of slaves sent over to this country before the prohibition of the trade were those taken in battle or seized by the strong arm of power. The proposition I assert is, that let their condition result from what it might, they brought it with them from Africa. It was given to them, fixed upon them there; and all that was done in this country was to recognize it. There never was a law in Virginia creating slavery; and I doubt if there has been such a law in any of the southern States. There is no necessity for such a law.

Suffer me now, sir, to sum up the argument I have advanced. This institution existed when the constitution was formed. It was recognized, it was legislated upon, it was made the subject of concession on one side, and equivalent on the other. There was assigned to it, a representative weight, as an element of political power in the southern States. It was guaranteed to those States by the constitution and it can never be tolerated, that a power in Congress to legislate for the territories—a power deduced from necessity only, and temporary in its exercise, (for it ceases when the territory becomes a State,) should be wrested from its legitimate ends, and made to unsettle the balances of the constitution, and to destroy its guarantees. To give it such direction, would be in outrage of all just legal construction, and of every sense of political right in the States interested.

The Senator from New York has said that there is a line of unbroken precedents, from the first enactments for territories under the constitution, down to this day, establishing the right in Congress, which is now contended for by him

Sir, I have examined with care the laws which he has advanced as precedents, and I utterly deny that they touch the right in question—save in the single instance, of the act of 1820, for the admission into the Union of the State of Missouri, known as an exception, by the name of the "Missouri compromise."

The first law cited by the Senator as a precedent, is the act of August 7th. 1789, entitled "an act to provide for the government of the territory north-west of the Ohio river."

This act does nothing more than make provision, for adapting the obligations, &c., of the ordinance of '87 "to the present constitution of the United States," in order that it may "continue to have full effect." It was necessary to do this, in order to continue in force within that territory, the compact contained in that ordinance, as made by the Continental Congress—and the act was passed in obedience to the sixth article of the constitution, which is in these words

"All debts, contracts and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution, as under the confederation."

The ordinance of '87 was one of these "engagements"—and the act of 1789 did nothing more than to continue it in force, under the new government of the United States.

I have already spoken at large in respect to this ordinance of '87—it was made, and ordained, as the law governing the north-west territory, before the present constitution was formed—its sanction was derived from the Congress of the "confederation"—and that sanction was recognized by the sixth article of the constitution, and thus became a mandate to the new government. When Congress then in 1789, and subsequently, legislated for the government of the territories, or any of them, to the north-west of the Ohio river; it legislated in subordination to the ordinance of '87—and it follows as that ordinance prohibited slavery, such prohibition was paramount to the authority of Congress. The States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, were carved out of this north-west territory, and no precedent of constitutional power affecting the question of slavery, can be drawn from any act of Congress, for the organization or governments of the territories, out of which either of these States was formed.

The act of March 1804, erecting the territorial governments of Louisiana and Orleans, is next cited by the Senator from New York. It is true, sir, that this act regulated the admission of slaves into those territories, but it expressly authorized, what the South now contends for, viz: the importation of slaves by a "citizen of the United States, removing into said territory for actual settlement, and being at the time of such removal bona-fide owner of such slaves." The prohibitions were, only to the importation of slaves from beyond the limits of the United States, in other words a prohibition of the foreign slave trade, and of slaves which had been imported into the United States since the 1st of May, 1798. The cause of this last restriction I have not been able to trace, but I have been told that it was referable to some treaty stipulations between France and Spain, from which latter, the province had been derived.

The laws for the government of the territory of Mississippi, which was ceded by South Carolina, of Alabama, which was ceded in part by South Carolina, and in part by Georgia; and of Arkansas, which was part of Louisiana, contain no prohibition against citizens of any of the States removing into those territories for settlement with their slaves.

In the instance of Iowa, which was erected into a separate territory by act of June, 1838, the law scrupulously refrained from this prohibition of slavery, although it was formed of territory subject to the restriction of the Missouri compromise act, being part of the Missouri territory lying north of the parallel of 36° 30'. By the act of April 20, 1836, establishing a territorial government for Wisconsin, (which was part of the northwest territory, and thus subject to the ordinance of '87,) the inhabitants were declared

"——entitled to all the rights, privileges, and advantages granted and secured to the ordinance of '87, and subject to all the conditions, restrictions, and prohibitions in said articles imposed."

Whereas, by the act for the government of Iowa, the "rights, privileges, and immunities granted and secured to the inhabitants of Wisconsin," are extended to the people of Iowa, but without the "conditions, restrictions, and prohibitions" of the same ordinance——

Thus, sir, after reviewing all the acts cited by the honorable Senator from New York, and to which he relies as "a current of authority uninterrupted and almost unopposed through more than half a century down to the present day," we find not one extending the prohibition now contended for, save that for the admission of Missouri in 1820, and which stands as a marked exception.

Sir, I will not go over the history of this act of 1820. It presents the only instance since the foundation of this government in 1788, when by law, slaves accompanied by their owners, were excluded from any territory belonging to the United States. And although it was passed in violation of the third article of the treaty with France of 1803, by which the territory was ceded to the United States—which treaty was the "supreme law of the land;" and further, as I conceive in derogation of the constitutional rights of the citizens of the southern States, yet, as it was agreed to as a compromise by the South for the sake of the Union, I would be the last to disturb it.

Power, Mr. President, is never appeased by concession; and we are now reaping the bitter fruits of the concessions then made by the South. How strikingly is illustrated by this renewed struggle, the predictions of Mr. Jefferson in his letter of April, 1820, in which, speaking of the Missouri question, he says:

"The coincidence of a marked principle, moral and political, with a geographical line once conceived, I feared would never more be obliterated from the mind; that it would be recurring on every occasion, and renewing irritations, until it would kindle such mutual and mortal hatred, as to render separation preferable to such a final disaster."

Sir, the prophecy is fulfilled. There is a party organized, or in course of organization at the North, lifting itself erect on the pending canvass for the Presidency, on whose banner is inscribed, as the sole rallying cry, "destruction to the slave power." We have seen the preliminary chart of that party in the manifesto of its convention recently held at Utica, in New York, in which all parties are invited at the North, to abandon all subjects of former dissension, and to unite in a common crusade to break down the institutions of the South. Sir, the Senator from New York, [Mr. DIX,] stands the exponent of that party in this Senate-house—a party whose mission is to divide the North and South on this question of the so-called "slave power." Already we have had three remarkable documents, shadowing forth their plan of campaign.

The first, is a letter from Martin Van Buren, addressed in reply to the "delegates of the city and county of New York" to the Utica convention, sketching in advance the principles and policy of the party in embryo.

Next comes the speech of the honorable Senator from New York, following step by step the landmarks there laid down, and denouncing any extension of slavery into territories where it is not now found, as of "evil tendency, wrong in itself, and repugnant to the humanity and the civilization of the age."

And last, the manifesto of the Utica convention.

I trust, sir, that Senators on all sides have read this paper with attention, because it develops, in extenso, the principles and purposes of this new northern party avows its objects to be to get possession of the government of the Union for the purpose of destroying the political weight of "slave representation," and assigns their appropriate duties to its recognized leaders. And more than all, it denounces the old and healthy issues which have heretofore divided parties as no longer worthy of consideration, and calls upon former friends and former foes to unite alike in a great concerted effort to break down the barriers of the constitution.

To prove this, sir, I may be pardoned for making a single extract from the document, where it will be found under the head of "Duty of the free States," and is in these words:

"If, from these, or any other causes, the people of the free States have suffered in the estimation of the South, or of the world, the time has now come when they owe it to themselves, and to the nation, to redeem their character from the reproach. Both the late political parties have the opportunity to do, and they are called upon to do this: they must unite in the effort, without any abandonment of their distinctive principles. The old issues, which for the last twenty years have divided them, are now settled or set aside; a new issue has been presented in which all true Democrats, and in which differences that under circumstances would be important, are merged and swallowed up.

It is important, too, that this effort should now be made, and that, if possible, it should be made to succeed. Resort the be gathering in the mature of public and free than moral science. Thus the first time since the formation of the government that the slave power, while retaining its distinct political associations with the two great national parties, has been able to secure the exemptions of each. If the people of the free States understand and perform their duty, such an occasion will never again be witnessed."

Mr. President, these are words of fearful omen. We are already aware that ten States of this confederacy have, through their legislative assemblies, called upon their representatives in Congress to maintain this interdict against the extension of southern institutions to the new territories. And here we have a proclamation by a party said to be of formidable numbers, in the great State of New York, separating themselves from all former political alliance, arrayed under leaders of known distinction, burying all former topics of political dissension, and proclaiming as the great bond of future union exterminating war to "slave power." And for what objects is a party to be thus marshalled? For the public weal—the common good? Sir, let not words so dear to republicans be profaned by such unholy perversion. To advance the cause of freedom and free government? No, no! When was freedom born of tyranny—whether it be the tyranny of one, or of many.

The evil day long looked for and dreaded by the sages and patriots of the land dawns darkly through this proclamation: when a line shall be drawn between the North and South, and a party resting on geographical division alone shall march up to it as the line of power. This is the party which the Utica manifesto seeks to rally.

Mr. President, I appeal to the States of New England. Will they lend themselves to minister to the lust of dominion, which alone actuates this northern schism? To Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island. To Vermont, which sprung from the loins of New York, midst the throes of the Revolution, from the fabled goddess from the head of Jupiter, fully armed for the combat.

Sir, if the appeal be vain, and the conquest be achieved by their aid, it needs no Cassandra gift to foretell what their doom shall be when the battle is fought and the guarantees of the constitution are broken down and destroyed. They will share the late of all besides troduced into the naval appropriation bill, they were stricken out. There was also a clause appropriating for the completion of marine hospitals at Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and Louisville, ten thousand dollars for each, after these works had been already commenced, and there was no doubt of an appropriation to complete them. With reference to the other proposed expenditures in the marine hospitals, considering all the conditions of the marine hospital fund, it was thought injudicious to authorize these expenditures in this or any other bill at the present time. There were eight marine hospitals proposed here on the western waters; the number on the Atlantic coast was seven. In regard to the special fund he would say that it was well known that the marine hospital fund had to be supplied by yearly appropriations at the rate of some years past of about twenty thousand dollars a year. There was allotted for the fund yearly from seventy-five to one hundred thousand dollars. It was the opinion of those who were best versed in these matters, that the erection of these hospitals on these new sites, at the present time, would increase the expense of taking care of the sick and disabled seamen who were entitled to the relief of this fund, instead of diminishing it.

At St. Louis provisions were made for expending money for the relief of sick seamen on very favorable terms—far less than could be done if a hospital was provided. There was a contract by which the seamen were taken care of at the rate of three dollars per man weekly, which was a smaller amount than the expense incurred at hospitals in charge of the United States. Was it expedient, he would ask, at the present time, to run the risk of dissipating this beneficent fund in the manner in which he thought it would be if all these hospitals were to be immediately completed at the expense of the United States. In regard to the three hospitals already commenced at Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and Louisville, he thought there was very little doubt provisions should be made for their completion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, hoped that the appropriation for the completion of the hospital at New Orleans would not be stricken out. This appropriation was recommended by the department, and was necessary to finish the building. The honorable Senator admitted that the appropriation was necessary and important, but desired it to be thrown out of the bill simply because it was not in its appropriate and befitting place. He trusted that appropriation would be allowed to remain.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, remarked that the chairman of the Committee on Finance had made a report, or thought it necessary to make a motion now to reject these appropriations simply on the ground of the impropriety of inserting them in the naval appropriation bill, instead of the naval and diplomatic bill. It seemed to him that he had presented a very small obstacle in the way of a great object. If the chairman of the Committee on Finance had said, that his object in rejecting these appropriations was to keep down the disbursements of the Navy Department, he could have admitted the reasonableness of the suggestion very readily, though he would have replied to him that they had gained much more from this fund in former times than they could loose now. If this item in the appropriation was stricken out, it would be impossible to obtain an appropriation at the present session of Congress. There was a hospital then waiting for an appropriation to have it completed at Natchez, which was greatly needed for the use of sick seamen, many of whom were now thrown upon the charity of the town, by whom large expenditures were made. He did hope that the Senator would not insist upon his motion, as it was merely a matter of form. The fact was the marine hospital was more intimately connected with the Navy Department of the United States, than with the civil and diplomatic department. It was under the charge of the Treasury it was true, but it belonged to the commerce of the United States, the great marine of the country, the source from which the navy derived its supplies, in time of war and in time of peace.

Mr. PHELPS had occasion to regret the disposition which sometimes manifested itself of loading down the ordinary appropriation bills with matters that did not properly belong to them. If he understood the character of the bill, it was intended for the exclusive benefit of commercial seamen. He thought that an appropriation bill should not be made up of bills of a dissimiliar character. If the sense of the Senate was in favor of the appropriation, it could only be made in its more appropriate and proper form. The House, if in favor of the appropriation would undoubtedly pass it.

Mr. BREESE.—It appears from the argument of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] that the objections which they entertain to these appropriations are wholly technical. They have not attacked the objects; they have not said they were not important; but, conceding that point, they insist that they are out of place; that they should not be in the naval appropriation bill, as the marine hospitals were under the charge of the Secretary of the Treasury. That was true. They are under the charge of the Treasury, but that did not furnish a valid objection to the place in which the appropriation is now found. These hospitals had all, save one, been estimated for as far back as 1837. Some of them are in a course of being erected, and the sites of others purchased by the government. The site at Chicago is owned by the government, and although no estimates are made for that, the reason of the omission is found in the fact, that in 1837, Lake Michigan had no commerce. Now, many thousand seamen are employed upon it, exposed to sickness, and requiring shelter, medicine, and care.

He did not see the propriety of striking them out of this bill; and he warned the Senators who were interested in them, if they are stricken out, no appropriation will be made for them this session. And if they are in the wrong place, he said, it was better, in his opinion, that they should be in a wrong place rather than in no place at all, and hoped the Senate would retain the appropriations where they are found, coming as they do from the House, holding the purse-strings of the nation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD recollected perfectly well the bill they had in the other end of the capitol, when appropriations were originally made for purchasing sites and locating those marine hospitals upon the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. The condition of the western boatmen on the western waters, was brought to the notice of Congress, and regarded as presenting an absolute necessity for such appropriations. He had seen men die in log huts on the banks of these rivers for the want of the necessary attention they required; and was of course convinced they need ample and comfortable accommodations furnished for their relief. In view of this state of things, Congress ten years ago was induced to put on foot a state of things which could give to these boatmen the relief they needed. But the subject has been neglected from that day to this. Now, when they were making further advances to remedy the evil, they were told, this was not the proper place for them. When and in what form could that appropriate opportunity be afforded for making this necessary appropriations? Appropriations were, as he understood the matter, to be made in fulfilment of existing laws. There were entire new objects in the bill before them, for which appropriations were asked, appropriations not heretofore authorized by existing laws, as for instance, the purchase of land at Brooklyn. These objects for appropriation in the bill then, although not according with the rule to make no appropriations where no existing law permitted them to be made; and the appropriation for the marine hospital was struck out, although there was an existing law authorizing it, because it was not in its proper place. Unless gentlemen intend to abandon the system adopted some ten years ago, he hoped they would go on and vote the appropriation.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, stated that there were two classes of hospitals, one for naval the other for civil service. Those for naval service were called naval hospitals; those for seamen or civil service were called marine hospitals. The first class was supported by appropriations from the government, for the benefit of the seamen employed in the service of the government; the second was supported by a tax levied on seamen of a certain class; another class being exempt from the payment. But all classes of seamen in any foreign service, except those engaged in fishery, were required to pay out of their wages—and the ships was made responsible for it—twenty cents a month to support these marine hospitals. Sometimes these funds were inadequate to meet the wants of seamen, especially in a sickly climate. The only inconvenience he supposed in this matter would be the transferring of the accounts from the charge of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of the Navy, when, of course, a new set of books would have to be opened in the latter department. He was desirous of seeing the sick seamen in all parts of the country comfortably provided for; and he would go for disbursing money for hospitals wherever the exigencies of cases might require it.

Mr. BENTON urged that the former policy of the government in relation to this subject be adhered to. Some years ago Congress had considered the question in all its aspects and bearings as a system. According to this system, all boatmen upon the western waters, river-faring as well as sea-faring men—whether in a boat or upon a raft, or hanging to a flat, or on board ships, they were together in the law which took twenty cents a month out of their pockets, and which entitled them to benefit of hospitals, and attendance when sick. In reference to the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, that they were having sick seamen taken care of in St. Louis at a cheaper rate by contract, than could be done by furnishing a hospital, he would say that the contract was entered into by the Sisters of Charity, who, in the absence of any United States institution, had kindly undertaken to take care of them at a mere modicum or fraction, in proportion to what the labor and attention given was worth. Now, when the Sisters of Charity had been so kind as to help the government along in this matter, it was urged we should do nothing more because these sisters were doing so much.

Mr. DOWNS rose to express his astonishment at the position which had been so suddenly taken in relation to this bill. Gentlemen admitted the appropriation was right, but say they, it is not in its proper place. Was there any law, he would inquire, for making appropriations under particular names? If money was appropriated for certain purposes, he did not think it very material whether the appropriations were made in one particular bill or another. But the Senator from New Hampshire seemed to have some other objection to the appropriation than that of its being in an improper place. He seemed to think that the object of providing for the sick could be attained cheaper without hospitals. He also appeared to consider that they are being multiplied too fast at the West. He could say that in New Orleans a private hospital had been taken at very great expense during the time that this hospital was being built. In the absence of the proper appropriations for furnishing it, the officers of the army had taken charge of it. What he desired was, that the appropriation made for furnishing it should be allowed, and not suffer the building to stand and rot.

Mr. SEBASTIAN desired before the question was taken to make one or two remarks. It really appeared to him tat the discussion which had arisen on the subject, was worthy of the importance of the appropriation contained in the bill. This appropriation had been placed in the bill, in pursuance of the original and what might now be considered the fixed policy of this government—a policy settled upon after elaborate argument and debate. It was unsafe, he thought, to allow a mere matter of form to unsettle a fixed policy of the government. The question raised was as to the propriety of passing the appropriation asked for in the naval appropriation bill. He was not sufficiently well acquainted with the character of the division of matter between the several committees, but it struck him very firmly that the present appropriation had a more direct reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs than it had to any other committee. He could not see the propriety of inserting the appropriation in the civil and diplomatic bill; it appeared to him entirely foreign in its character to the general items composing this bill. Whether the power of making this appropriation was vested in the power of maintaining a navy or to neglect commerce between States, he thought in either case it had a more direct reference to the bill before the Senate. He regarded the objection as one of form, intended to defeat a matter of substance. He thought it impossible to have it attached to any other bill at this session. Although the honorable chairman proposed to attach this appropriation to a different bill, yet he did not propose to embrace all the items for supplies contained in this appropriation only these which he thought most important, leaving out some three or four measures which he did not consider important. In the House, objections had been made to the furnishing of these supplies, but they had finally agreed to return them in the bill; it would therefore be dangerous to divorce this appropriation from the bill.

Mr. WESTCOTT should vote for this appropriation, and vote for it with peculiar pleasure in this bill. The fund produced by the twenty cents per month, exacted by law from sailors in the marine and merchant service of the United States, in his humble opinion had been hitherto grossly misappropriated. One means by which that misappropriation had been occasioned was by its division, first into a naval and then a marine hospital fund creating a distinction between the sailors of the commercial marine and these of the naval service. The consequence had been that two sets of hospitals had been erected. He was in favor of consolidating these two branches of expenditure. He had been informed that this division in the hospital fund, and these two classes of hospitals was the fault of the navy. He wanted to correct that fault and consolidate the two classes; and he should vote for that appropriation because in its passage he saw some hopes of consolidation.

Mr. BORLAND was not desirous of prolonging the debate, though he could not forbear at least entering his protest against the motion to strike out. The ground of opposition urged against the appropriation was that it was not in its appropriate place. The silence of gentleman proved an acquiescence in the force of the argument that this appropriation was proper. For a great number of years the tax of twenty cents alluded to had been paid by their citizens, and the amount of money thus collected had been increasing with the extension of commerce on the western waters, and yet not one dollar of those contributions had been appropriated for their benefit. On the other hand, the hospitals on the Atlantic coast had been in a great degree supported by these collections in the West. The appropriation heretofore had been made for marine hospitals on the Atlantic coast, and none made for hospitals in the Mississippi valley. Therefore they of the West felt that they had a perfect right to come forward and say that their due proportion of this fund, the result in part of their contributions for so many years should be withheld no longer. The call was more pressing in the West for the aid of sick and disabled navigators, for the loss of navigation was far greater than upon the Atlantic coast, and indeed, a larger class subject to disease on account of the climate. In regard to one of the appropriation funds a marine hospital in the time of Napoleon, he would say that heretofore appropriations had not been withheld because the title to the sight of the hospital had not been secured. The title, however, was now complete, and the work ready to go on.

Mr. STURGEON stated that several of these hospitals had been waiting for appropriations for their completion for several years. He thought the propriety of hospitals particularly on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers could not be questioned. He hoped the appropriation would be allowed.

Mr. PHELPS thought that this appropriation belonged in the civil and diplomatic bill, and if so, it should be inserted in it. Who was authorized to say that the appropriation would be lost if not inserted in this bill? It had been the habit of the gentleman from the first to make the necessary appropriations for various paupers entirely distinct from themselves, for the reason that the expenditures of each department were subject to the control of the law of that department. Did any one suppose that we could embrace all our appropriations in one bill indiscriminately. Was not such restrictions necessary in order to the regular action of the Executive department? We gave to each department certain duties, and made them strictly responsible for their performance. Any intermixture of accounts as would occur by the passage of the appropriation in this bill would tend to embarrassment and confusion in the departments. This appropriation was connected with the commerce of the country, and had no sort of connection with the naval power. Proper arrangements of appropriations should be made and observed. The result in this case would be, that the keeping of these accounts would seem to be tranferred to the charge of the Secretary of the Navy. All these forms were indispensable in order to a correct transaction of the business of the several departments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD wished to say a word in reply to his friend from Vermont. He did not see, if they kept either appropriation for the marine hospitals in the present bill, how it would embarrass the officer of the treasury in keeping his accounts at all. How would it embarrass them any more in keeping them in the Treasury Department than if you were to withdraw it from this bill and put it in the civil and diplomatic bill? When this bill was passed would not each particular bureau select every item of appropriation which properly belonged to it? If they were to pass all the different appropriations in one bill would not the different parts of these bills be selected at the various departments and distributed?

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, it was

Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress copies of a treaty of peace, friendship, limits, and settlement between the United States and the Mexican republic, the ratifications of which were duly exchanged at the city of Queretaro, in Mexico, on the 30th day of May, 1848.

The war which our country was reluctantly involved in the necessary vindication of the national rights and honor has been thus terminated, and I congratulate Congress and our common constituents upon the restoration of an honorable peace.

The extensive and valuable territories ceded by Mexico to the United States constitute indemnity for the past, and the brilliant achievements and signal successes of our arms will be a guaranty of security for the future, by convincing all nations that our rights must be respected. The results of the war with Mexico have given to the United States a national character above that which our country never before enjoyed. Our power and our resources have become known and now respected throughout the world, and we shall probably be saved from the necessity of engaging in another foreign war for a long series of years.

It is a subject of congratulation that we have passed through a war of more than two years' duration, with the business of the country uninterrupted, unexhausted with our resources and the public credit unimpaired.

I communicate for the information of Congress, the accompanying documents and correspondence, relating to the negotiation and ratification of the treaty.

Before the treaty can be fully executed on the part of the United States, legislation will be required. It will be proper to make the necessary appropriations for the payment of the $12,000,000, stipulated in the 12th article, to be paid to Mexico in four equal annual instalments. Three millions of dollars were appropriated by the act of March 3, 1847, and that sum was paid to the Mexican government after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty.

The 5th article of the treaty provides that "in order to designate the boundaries line, with due precision, upon authoritative maps, and to establish upon the ground landmarks which shall show the limits of both republics, as described in the present article the two governments shall each appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, who before the expiration of one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty shall meet at the port of San Diego, and proceed, to run, and mark the said boundary in its whole course to the mouth of the Rio Bravo del Norte." It will be necessary that provision should be made by law for the appointment of a commissioner and a surveyor on the part of the United States to act in conjunction with a commissioner and surveyor appointed by Mexico, in executing the stipulation of this article.

It will be proper also to provide by law for the appointment of a board of commissioners, to adjudicate and decide upon all claims of our citizens, against the Mexican government, which by the treaty have been assumed by the United States.

New Mexico and Upper California have been ceded by Mexico to the United States and now constitute a part of our country. Embracing nearly ten degrees of latitude, lying adjacent to the Oregon territory, and extending from the Pacific ocean to the Rio Grande—a mean distance of nearly 1,000 miles, it would be difficult to estimate the value of these possessions to the United States. They constitute of themselves a country large enough for a great empire, and their acquisition is second only in importance to that of Louisiana in 1803. Rich in mineral and agricultural resources, with a climate of great salubrity, they embrace the most important ports on the whole Pacific coast of the continent of North America. The possession of the ports of San Diego, Monterey, and the bay of San Francisco will enable the United States to command the already valuable and rapidly increasing commerce of the Pacific. The number of our whale-ships alone, now employed in that sea, exceeds 700, requiring more than 30,000 seamen to navigate them, while the capital invested in this particular branch of commerce is estimated at not less than $40,000,000.

The excellent harbors of Upper California will, under our flag, afford security and repose to our commercial marine, and American mechanics will soon furnish ready means of ship building and repair, which are now so much wanted in that distant sea.

By the acquisition of these possessions we are brought into immediate proximity with the west coast of America, from Cape Horn to the Russian possessions north of Oregon, and the islands of the Pacific ocean; and by a direct voyage in steamers we will be in less than thirty days of Canton and other parts of China.

In this vast region, whose rich resources are soon to be developed by American energy and enterprise, the result must be the augmentation of our commerce, and with it new and profitable demands for mechanic labor in all its branches, and new and valuable markets for our manufactures and agricultural products.

While the war has been conducted with great humanity and forbearance, and with complete success on our part, the peace has been concluded on terms the most liberal and magnanimous to Mexico.

In her limits the territories now ceded had remained, and it is believed would have, continued to remain, almost unoccupied, and of little value to her or to any other nation; while as a part of our Union they will be productive of vast benefits to the United States, to the commercial world, and to the general interests of mankind.

The immediate establishment of territorial government, and the extension of our laws over these valuable possessions, are deemed to be not only important, but indispensable to preserve order and the due administration of justice within their limits, to afford protection to the inhabitants, and to facilitate the development of the vast resources and wealth which their acquisition has added to our country.

The war with Mexico having terminated, the power of the Executive to establish or to continue temporary civil governments over these territories, which existed under the laws of nations while they were regarded as conquered provinces in our military occupation, has ceased. By their cession to the United States Mexico has no longer any power over them; and, until Congress shall act, the inhabitants will be without any organized government. Should they be left in this condition, confusion and anarchy will be likely to prevail.

Foreign commerce to a considerable amount is now carried on in the ports of Upper California, which will require to be regulated by our laws. As soon as our system shall be extended over this commerce, a revenue of considerable amount will be at once collected, and it is not doubted that it will be annually increased. For the second time I recommend to your favorable consideration the policy of opening our ports to foreign commerce on the subject at the present session.

In organizing governments over these territories, fraught with such vast advantages to the nation of the Union, I invoke that spirit of compromise, conciliation and concession in our deliberations, in which the constitution was framed, in which it should be administered, and which is so indispensable to preserve and perpetuate the Union and harmony of the States. We should never forget that the Union of confederated States was established and cemented by kindred blood, and by the common toil, sufferings, dangers, and triumphs of all its parts, and has been the ever-augmenting source of our national greatness and of our blessings.

There has, perhaps, been no period since the warning so impressively given to his countrymen by Washington to guard against geographical division, and sectional parties, which appeals with greater force than the present to the patriotic, philosophic, and reflecting of all parties and of all sections of our country. Who can calculate the value of our glorious Union? It is a model and example of free government to all the world, and a sure shield of hope and haven of rest to the oppressed of all nations. By its association we have been rapidly advanced as a nation to a height of strength, power, and happiness without a parallel in the history of the world. As we extend its blessings over new regions shall we be so unwise as to endanger its existence by geographical divisions and dissensions?

With a view to encourage the early settlement of these distant possessions, I recommend that liberal grants of the public lands be awarded to all our citizens who have settled, or may in a limited period settle, within their limits.

In connection with the provisions of the treaty, orders have been issued to our military and naval forces to evacuate, without delay, the Mexican territories, including towns and fortified places in our military occupation, and which are not embraced in the territories ceded to the United States. The army, as already on its way to the United States. That portion of it, as will be required as volunteers, to be engaged to serve during the war with Mexico, will be discharged as soon as they can be transported or marched to convenient points in the vicinity of their homes. A part of the regular army will be employed in New Mexico and Upper California, to afford protection to the inhabitants, and to guard our interests in those territories.

The old army, as created before the commencement of the war with Mexico, especially in authority, be given to fill up the rank and file of all vacancies existing to the maximum number authorized during the war—it is believed, will be a sufficient force to be retained in service during a period of peace. A few additional officers in the line and staff of the army have been authorized; and these, in the best judgment of necessary in the peace establishment, and should be retained in the service. The number of the general officers may be reduced, as vacancies occur by the casualties of the service, to what it was before the war.

While the people of other countries, who live under forms of government less free than our own, have been for ages oppressed by taxation to support large standing armies in periods of peace, our experience has proved that such establishments are unnecessary in a republic. Our standing army is to be found in the bosom of society. It is composed of freemen, who are ever ready to take up arms in the service of their country whenever an emergency requires it. Our experience in the past would confirm the opinion that such an army may be raised upon a few weeks' notice, and that our citizen soldiers are equal to any troops in the world. No reason, therefore, is perceived why we should enlarge our land forces, and thereby subject the Treasury to an annual increased charge.

Sound policy requires that we should avoid the creation of a large standing army in a period of peace. No public agency is more liable to abuses—are not only expensive and unnecessary, but may become dangerous to liberty.

Besides making the necessary legislative provisions for the execution of the treaty, and the establishment of territorial governments in the ceded country, the first step upon the restoration of peace, other important duties to perform. Among these, I regard none as more important than the adoption of proper measures to the speedy extinguishment of the national debt. It is against usual policy and the principles of our institutions that a public debt should be permitted to exist a day longer than the means of the Treasury will enable the government to pay it off.

We should adhere to the wise policy laid down by President Washington, of "avoiding the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden we ourselves ought to bear."

At the commencement of the present administration the public debt amounted to $17,093,590 62. In consequence of the war with Mexico, it has been necessarily increased, and now amounts to $56,778,490 41, including the stock and Treasury notes which may yet be issued under the act of January 28, 1847, and the sixteen million loan recently negotiated under the act of March 31, 1848.

In addition to the amount of the debt, the treaty stipulates that twelve millions of dollars shall be paid to Mexico in four equal instalments of three millions each; the first of which will fall due on the 30th of May, 1848. The treaty also stipulates that the United States shall "assume and pay" to our citizens "the claims already liquidated and decided against the Mexican republic," and "all claims not here before decided against the Mexican government to an amount not exceeding three and a quarter millions of dollars." The "liquidated" claims of citizens of the United States against Mexico, as decided by the joint board of commissioners under the convention between the United States and Mexico, of the 11th of April, 1839, amounted to $2,026,139 68. This sum was payable in twenty annual instalments. Three of them have been paid to the claimants by the Mexican government, and two by the United States—leaving to be paid of the principal of the liquidated amount, assumed by the United States, the sum of $1,519,604 76, together with the interest thereon. These several amounts of "liquidated" and unliquidated claims assumed by the United States, it is believed, may be paid as they fall due out of the accruing revenue, without the issue of stock or the creation of any additional public debt.

I cannot too strongly recommend to Congress the importance of husbanding all our national resources, of limiting the public expenditures to necessary objects, and of applying all the surplus at any time in the Treasury to the redemption of the debt. I recommend that authority be vested in the Executive by law to anticipate the period of reimbursement of such portion of the debt as may not be now redeemable, and to purchase at par, or at the premium which it may command in the market, in all cases in which that authority has not already been granted. A premium had been obtained by the government on much the larger portion of the loans; and if, when the government becomes a purchaser of its own stock, it shall command a premium in the market, it will be sound policy to pay it rather than to pay the semi-annual interest upon it. The interest upon the debt if the outstanding Treasury notes shall be funded, from the end of the last fiscal year until it shall fall due and be redeemable, will be very nearly equal to the principal, which must itself be ultimately paid.

Without changing or modifying the present tariff of duties, so great has been the increase of our commerce under its benign operation, that the revenue derived from that source and from the sales of the public lands will, it is confidently believed, enable the government to discharge annually several millions of the debt, and at the same time possess the means of meeting necessary appropriations for all the proper objects. Unless Congress shall authorize largely increased expenditures for objects not of absolute necessity, the whole public debt existing before the Mexican war, and that created during its continuance, may be paid off, without any increase of taxation on the people, long before it will fall due.

Upon the restoration of peace we should adopt a policy suited to a state of peace. In doing this, the earliest practicable payment of the public debt should be a cardinal principle of action. Profiting by the experience of the past, we should avoid the error into which the country was betrayed shortly after the close of the war with Great Britain in 1815. In a few years after that period a loose and latitudinous construction of the powers of the Federal Government unfortunately received but too much countenance. Though the country was burdened with a heavy public debt large and in many instances unnecessary and extravagant expenditures were authorized by Congress. The consequence was, that the payment of the debt was postponed for more than twenty years; and even then, it was only accomplished by the stern will and unbending policy of President Jackson, who made it a primary leading measure of his administration. He resisted the attempts which were made to divert the public money from that great object and apply it in wasteful and extravagant expenditures for internal objects, some of them of more than doubtful constitutional authority and expediency.

If the government of the United States shall observe a proper economy in its expenditures, and be confined in its action to the conduct of our foreign relations and to the few general objects of its care, enumerated in the constitution, leaving all matters local and local legislation to the States, our greatness as a nation in moral and physical power and in the arts and sciences cannot be calculated.

By pursuing this policy, expensive measures operating unequally and unjustly upon sections and classes will be avoided; and the people, having no cause of complaint, will patriotically support the government, under the blessings of equal laws and the protection of a just and paternal government.

By obtaining from the exercise of all powers not clearly conferred, the consent of our common Union, now numbering thirty States, will be strengthened as we grow in age and increase in population, and our future destiny will be without a parallel or example in the history of nations.

JAMES K. POLK.

Washington, July 6, 1848

The message having been read—

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the Territorial Government of Oregon.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia.—Mr. President: The Parliament of Great Britain is said to be omnipotent; and yet, in that empire, the humblest subject is protected in the absolute enjoyment of the rights of private property. So paramount is this principle regarded, that the whole strength of the government, if need be, is exerted for its maintenance, in behalf of the meanest subject, in the most distant corner of the world. How strange, therefore, that in the American Congress, whose powers are defined and limited by a written constitution, we are gravely debating, whether fifteen of the sovereign States of this confederacy shall be permitted to enjoy their equal interests in the territory of the United States, which is the common property of all! Yet, sir, stripped of all that is calculated to cheat and deceive, this is the naked question presented in the twelfth section of the bill upon your table. That section, among other provisions, proposes to approve and continue in force all the laws and ordinances which may have been passed by the provisional government of Oregon. Among the organic laws of that provisional government, is an ordinance which prohibits slavery or involuntary servitude within the limits of said territory. This attempt to ratify and confirm such an act, involves the assumption, that Congress has the right to exclude slavery from the territory of the United States; or, in other words, to deny to the slaveholding citizens of the Union, the privilege of removing into said territory with their slaves, and enjoying them as property. Where is the authority for such legislation by Congress?

This confederacy consists of thirty sovereign States: fifteen of these are slaveholding; the other fifteen are called free States, because slavery does not exist in them. The proposition in this bill is, that, at the suggestion of the fifteen free States, the fifteen slave States shall be prohibited by an act of Congress from the unrestricted enjoyment of the property which they hold in the territory of Oregon. Is this reasonable and just? I apprehend there can be no doubt of the truth of this proposition: that if Congress have the right to prohibit, they have an equal right to establish, slavery. For the very moment you concede jurisdiction to Congress over the subject, the same reason obtains in favor of the right to establish, that exists in favor of the right to prohibit. Suppose, then, the fifteen slave States were to present themselves here by their representatives, and demand that Congress should establish slavery in any of the territories belonging to the United States: we should hear but one voice from the North, and that voice would be, that Congress has no right to do it; that it is a power not conferred by the constitution. Aye, sir, more than this. Suppose these fifteen slaves States should demand, that in organizing a territorial government for Oregon, a provision should be incorporated into the bill, that no citizen shall emigrate to and settle in said territory unless he shall carry with him slave property: what would be the response of the free States to such a proposition? They would reply, that the territory is the common property of all the States, procured by common treasure and common blood, and that each citizen has the incontestable right to remove to it, and carry with him, or leave behind, what property he may deem he might consider most compatible with his interest. Now, sir, the reverse of this state of things is true. The slave States are asking nothing at the hands of Congress; but the free States are demanding that citizens of the former shall not be permitted to settle upon the territory of the United States, and carry or leave what property soever they consider most consistent with their interest. This is the naked question which is now before the deliberation of the Senate. Its very statement exposes its absurdity and injustice. I would earnestly recommend to our northern friends the adoption of the golden rule, to do as they would be done by. If they would consider it unconstitutional and unjust for Congress, at the instance of the southern States, to exclude them from territory because they would be unwilling to be compelled to carry slaves with them, they certainly should not ask that we be shut out, because we desire to carry out slaves with us.

This demand of our northern brethren, however, is pressed with an urgency which seems to set at defiance all appeal to their forbearance, or magnanimity, or sense of justice. Conscious of their numerical strength in the federal council, they march forward with a steadiness of purpose, far less characteristic of patriotism, than of utter recklessness to consequences. If this contest of mere numerical strength between the North and the South shall be persisted in, irrespective of the constitution; if the slaveholding States are to be trodden under foot, treated as unequals and inferiors, denied the enjoyment of their interest in the territory which is the common property of all, it needs no prophetic eye to foresee the fate of this glorious fabric of freedom, reared by our fathers, and whose foundations were laid in the blood of patriotism. In such a struggle, our only hope is in the constitution. We can appeal to its guarantees. We invite a fair and rigid scrutiny of its provisions. If it justify the proposed action of Congress, we must submit to our fate. But if the authority be not found there, we ask our brethren of the free States, by all that is valuable in our institutions, and by all that is hallowed in the associations connected with their origin, to withhold their hands, and relieve the country from an agitation which threatens to dissever all the ties of affiliation, which unite the two great sections of this confederacy. Let us come to that sacred instrument with religious reverence and patriotic docility, resolved to surrender all preconceived opinions, and to bow to its teachings, however they may come in conflict with certain sentiments of a miserable, morbid, misguided philanthropy.

But before we proceed to the consideration of the particular clause of the constitution in relation to the power of Congress over the territories of the United States, it is important to bear in mind the character of our government and the rule of strict construction, by which all sound republicans are guided in the interpretation of that instrument. This government is a confederated republic. The States composing it are each sovereign, possessing all the powers of independent governments, except so far as they have voluntarily surrended a portion of these powers, and consented that the general government shall exercise them, as the common agent of all, for the benefit of all. The constitution is but the written articles of agreement between the parties to the confederation, specifying the powers which each State has surrendered, and the extent and general purposes for which they may be exerted by the federal government. As each of the States were equals before the formation of the confederacy—each possessing the same attributes of sovereignty and independence—and as each has made a like surrender of powers to the general government, they are still equals. This is as self-evident as the axiom in mathematics, "that if equals be taken from equals the remainders are equals." Hence, each State ought to share alike the burdens and enjoy alike the benefits of the compact; and any discrimination made in favor of one, to the prejudice of others, in the administration of its powers by the general government, is violative of the spirit of the compact, and subversive of the great ends for which it was formed. A strict construction of the constitution, therefore, is indispensable; it is the only rule by which the general government can be restrained within the limited scope of its delegated powers. In an able official paper on the constitutionality of a national bank, Mr. Jefferson thus defines the true rule of constitutional interpretation:

"I can alter the foundation of the constitution as laid on this ground, that 'all the powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people.' To take a single step beyond the boundaries thus specially drawn around the powers of Congress, is to take possession of a boundless field of power, no longer susceptible of any definition."

In view, then, of this limited fiduciary character of our government, and this rule of strict construction laid down by Mr. Jefferson, and which has been adopted and acquiesced in by all sound republicans from that day to the present, let us examine the authority on which the power is claimed, on the part of Congress, to restrict slavery in the territory of the United States. It is claimed under the third section of the fourth article of the constitution, which declares that—

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful and regulations, respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States."

Let us analyze this provision. It is obvious, from its phraseology, that the great object which was intended to be accomplished by this grant of power, was to enable Congress to "dispose of" the territory of the United States. When the constitution was adopted, all the territory belonging to the United States was provided for, as to all the purposes of government, by the celebrated ordinance of 1787. To "dispose of" it, therefore, was all that was necessary to be done; and to that extent only, does this provision of the constitution authorize Congress to go. To enable them to execute this leading object of the trust, they are further empowered "to make all needful rules and regulations." That such was the intention of the framers of the constitution, is apparent, if we observe further the import of the term "territory." It is related to the words "other property" by the disjunctive "or," showing that it is synonomous with the word "property," and was intended to designate one species of the property of the United States. It is equivalent to the word "land." I am sustained in this definition by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the United States vs. Gratiot et al., in 14 Peters' Reports. In delivering their opinion in that case, the court said:

"The term 'territory,' as here used, is merely descriptive of one kind of property, and is equivalent to the word 'lands.'"

Observe, further, in whom is the ownership of "territory," or "lands." It is not in "the Congress," which is authorized to "dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting" it; but it is "territory," or "lands," "belonging to the United States." It is the common property of all the States. They hold it by a "unity of interest, title, time, and possession;" and by this clause of the constitution they have constituted Congress their trustee, to "dispose of" it for the benefit of all. In view, then, of this plain analysis of this provision, can any reasonable mind come to the conclusion, that the framers of the constitution intended to confer on Congress any jurisdiction whatever over the subject of slavery in the territory of the United States. There certainly is not a single word or idea contained in it, which would, even in the most remote manner, countenance such an interpretation.

There is another clause of the constitution (article I, section 8) which declares that Congress shall have power—

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof."

Let us inquire, then, whether the power to prohibit slavery in "the territory" of the United States is "necessary and proper," in order to enable Congress to execute efficiently the trust confided to them? That the implied powers "necessary and proper" to be exercised by Congress in "disposing of" "the territory," is very evident. Congress must have power to survey the public lands, to declare by law, the mode of that survey, the dimension of the sections, the time, place, and manner of sale Congress must have the power—it is an incumbent duty—to protect the territory from invasion, and from trespass, such as cutting its timbers and robbing its mines. For the efficient exercise of this power, it would be necessary and proper" to pass laws defining offences against the public lands, and the extent of punishment, and to organize tribunals within the limits of the "territory" to try offenders and administer those laws. Those and such other powers only, as are "necessary and proper" to enable Congress to administer the public lands according to the spirit and intention of the trust consided, are all that is authorized, either by express grant or implication, to exercise. Is the power to prohibit slavery in the territories to be found among them? Is it possible to imagine an emergency in which the exercise of such a power is "necessary and proper" to the performance of the trust?

If the framers of the constitution had intended to confer larger powers—the powers of exclusive legislation over the territories—they would have employed language adequate for that purpose, as they did in reference to the District of Columbia, and "all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." In relation to this, the constitution clothes Congress with the right of "exclusive legislation ;" and, therefore the absence of such a grant, in reference to the "territory" of the United States, is conclusive evidence that the framers of the constitution did not intend to confer it The question, then, recurs recurs with redoubled force, if such be the limited power of "the Congress" over "the territory, where is to be found the authority for prohibiting slavery therein? It does not exist. The attempt to exercise it is wanton usurpation, oppressive to the slave States, and, if persisted in, will be fatal to the confederacy.

When driven from this provision of the constitution which I have been considering, the advocates of the restriction of slavery take refuge under the power to establish temporary governments in the territories. Whence may be the source of this power, whether it is incident to the acquisition of territory under the treaty-making power, or whether it is implied from that clause of the constitution which authorizes Congress "to make all needful rules and regulations" respecting the territories, it is conceded by the ablest expounders of the constitution that it exists. Congress has exercised this power from the origin of the government down to the present time, without the right to do so having ever been seriously questioned. In the case of McCulloch vs. the State of Maryland, in 4th Wheaton's reports, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"All admit the constitutionality of a territorial government."

In the case, also, of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter, in 1st Peters' reports Chief Justice Marshal said:

"Whichever may be the source whence the power is derived, the possession of it is unquestioned."

Though doubts have been entertained and expressed, whether the right to establish territorial governments necessarily included the right to legislate for the territory, yet it must be confessed, that the opinions of the ablest expounders of the constitution seem to be harmonious and conclusive in favor of its existence.— The minor is included in the major proposition. If Congress can exercise the higher power of framing an organic law, it may certainly exercise the inferior power of legislating for the territory. I need not refer to the authorities by which this position is sustained; because, for the purposes of this argument, I am willing to concede, in its broadest sense, that in virtue of the right to acquire by treaty, Congress possesses the power to govern and legislate for territory so acquired. But does it therefore follow that that they have the right to prohibit slavery in such territory? By no means. The legislation of Congress must be controlled by obvious limitations.

It must look, in its action, to its fiduciary character as a common trustee of the States, and, like all other trustees, must not go beyond the scope and intention of the trust. The title to the territory, as I have before shown, is not in the Congress, but in the States of the confederacy. It is acquired by the government in behalf of the States, and is paid for by the common resource and common blood. As, therefore, it is the property of the States as joint tenants, and as the right to free and unlimited enjoyment is the very essence of property, it follows inevitably, that Congress, as the trustee of the States, cannot pass any law which will exclude any of the States or its citizens from the full enjoyment of their interest in the territory belonging to the United States. A very simple illustration cannot fail to enforce the correctness of this view of the subject. There is a portion of this Senate who hold that Congress has the constitutional right to distribute the proceeds of the sale of the public lands among the States. Let it be admitted. It follows, then, as a necessary inference, that we have the right to distribute the territory itself. Suppose this operation performed by this government: that New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Georgia, and all the States, had assigned to them respectively their proportionate shares of the public domain; would it be competent for Congress to prescribe to each State what species of property she might carry upon her own territory? Could they say to Virginia, or Georgia, that her citizens removing upon her own territory, should not take their slaves with them? Such a proposition would be scouted from the halls of Congress as utterly absurb. But would such a distribution by Congress confer upon the several States any higher title to the public lands than they now possess? No, sir, the title of each State is as perfect and complete, as if such distribution had really trken place. Each State has an undivided property in the whole. The States hold the territory per my et per tout; and each has the right to enjoy the whole. It is as absolutely absurd for Congress to undertake to prescribe to the citizens of the States what species of property they shall carry with them into the territory, as if such a distribution had taken place.

Again: Suppose A, being about to leave the United States for foreign climes, constitutes B his agent to attend to his business during his temporary absence. Divers persons are indebted to A, and among other duties, B is charged with the collection and arrangement of his debts and contracts. He proceeds to the performance of his agency, and finding C unable to pay his liability to A, in money, agrees to receive in satisfaction a tract of land. Upon his return home, A calls upon B, his agent, for an account of his transactions. The agent informs him what he has done, and among other things, that he has received a tract of land from C, in payment of his indebtedness, he being unable to meet it with money. The principal, A, expresses himself satisfied with the arrangement, and he intimates an intention to commence the business of improving upon the land thus acquired. Here B interposes an objection, and threatens absolute prohibition. In astonishment, A demands his reasons for such conduct? Is there any such arrangement in the deed of transfer? No. Is there any such authority in the power of attorney? No. Is not the title to the land in me? Yes. Was not the consideration paid out of my funds? Yes. Why, then, this effort to restrict me in the unqualified exercise of what is my own? B very coolly replies, because it is not your interest to engage in that business. Would such admonitation by an agent to his principal be tolerated in any court of justice in Christendom? But this is precisely what is sought by this bill. The territory is the property of the States as joint tenants—each having an undivided interest in the whole—acquired by their common and joint fund; the Congress is the trustee to whom the administration of these lands is confided, and now it is sought to prohibit each State from carrying whatsoever kind of property its citizens may desire into said lands. The agent sets himself up above his principal—the servant dictates to his master.

The government, in the exercise of its powers of legislation, should also look to the ultimate object for which it acquires and holds the territory; and as its power of legislation is implied, it should the more rigidly confine its exercise to such action only as is "necessary and proper" for the accomplishment of such object. For what object, then, is territory acquired and held? Evidently with the view of forming out of it new States to be admitted into the Union. What is the only constitutional condition precedent to their admission? Simply that they should have a republican form of government. The presumption is, that the inhabitants of territory are ignorant of the principles of our government; and whilst in a territorial State, they occupy a dependent relation—a relation of pupilage preparatory to their being received into our great republican family of States. Now, if the institution of slavery were incompatible with a republican form of government, then Congress might forbid its existence in territory thus under its guardianship and instruction. But no such incompatibility exists, because slavery is recognized in the constitution itself, and new States, since its adoption, have been admitted into the Union with slavery.— Hence the prohibition of slavery is not "necessary and proper," in order to enable Congress, in the exercise of its legislative functions, to prepare the territory for its ultimate destination, and consequently the power to impose such prohibition does not exist.

In the outset of my remarks, I showed that the States of this confederacy are politically coequals; and, therefore, must share alike the burdens and blessings of the government. There are several provisions in the constitution based upon this equality. Each State is entitled to two Senators in this chamber. "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." When the election of President and Vice President fails before the people and devolves upon the House of Representatives, there each State is entitled to but one vote. "Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State." "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." All these constitutional provisions, I say, look to the absolute political equality of all the States, and show that Congress, in the exercise of its powers, are as solemnly bound to treat them as equals, as if the injunction in so many words were contained in the instrument. It is an obligation growing out of the spirit of the compact: that spirit which gave birth to all its magnanimous compromises and equitable guarantees, and without which it never would have been formed. It is true that none of these provisions apply in terms to the territories; but they point out the path of justice too plain to be mistaken. If the States be political coequals—so regarded by the constitution—and hold joint property, purchased by a common fund, then they are entitled to be treated as equals in the disposition of that joint property. Any discrimination made by Congress, as their common trustee, is at war with this great fundamental principle of equality, on which the fabric of the confederation rests. Is not the prohibition of slavery proposed by this bill such a discrimination? Is it not saying to the slaveholding States, that they have among them an institution of property unworthy of transplantation into new territory; and that the citizens of these States removing there, with that description of property, are unworthy to be the neighbors and fellow-citizens of the New England emigrant? Aye, is it not tantamount to conferring upon the free States the entire monopoly of the territory acquired by the common treasury and common arms of all? If this be the equality of the constitution, our patriotic forefathers labored in vain.

But the advocates of the prohibition of slavery in the territory of the United States refer to the past legislation of Congress, in order to show by precedent, that the power exists. For this purpose, the celabrated ordinance of 1787 is relied on. A succinct glance at the history of that transaction will show how unavailing must be the effort, to sustain their cause by resting it upon such a foundation.

On the 1st of March, 1784, a committee, composed of Messrs. Jefferson, of Virginia, Chase, of Maryland, and Howell, of Rhode Island, reported to Congress a plan for the temporary government of the western territory, which contained a provision "that after the year 1800 of the Christian era, there should be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of the States" formed out of said territory. This report was recommitted to the same committee on the 17th, and on the 22d of March they submitted a new plan, substantially the same in its provisions as the first. On the 19th of April it was taken up for consideration, and the clause containing the slavery restriction was stricken out; and after some unimportant amendments, it was agreed to.

About a year afterwards Mr. King submitted again to Congress the clause prohibiting slavery, but omitting the words "after the year 1800 of the Christian era." The motion was committed to the Committee of the Whole House, but it was not again called up, nor referred to by any of the committees who subsequently reported plans for the government of the western territory. The subject, however, was kept before Congress, and from time to time taken up. But no definite action was had until the 26th of April, 1787. On that day a committee, consisting of Messrs. Johnson, Pinckney, Smith, Dane, and Henry, reported "an ordinance for the government of the western territory," but it did not contain the clause restricting slavery, which Mr. King had previously moved. It was ordered to a third reading, but on the 9th of July, 1787, it was again referred to a committee, consisting of Messrs. Carrington, of Virginia, Dane, of Massachusetts, R. H. Lee, of Virginia, Kean, of South Carolina, and Smith, of New York. On the 11th of July this committee reported a plan, still without any clause restricting slavery. On the 12th of July Mr. Dane offered the following amendment, which was adopted as the sixth article of the compact:

"Article the sixth. There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted: Provided, always, That any person escaping into the same, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any one of the original States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor, as aforesaid."

This amendment was carried, and the celebrated ordinance adopted by the unanimous vote of the eight States then present.

From this succinct history of the sixth article of the ordinance of 1787, the following observations are apparent:

1. That Mr. Dane, of Massachusetts, and not Mr. Jefferson, was its author. He was not in Congress at that date. Those, therefore, who claim the authorship for him, not only do him injustice, but appropriate to their cause the weight of a name to which they are not entitled.

2. That the naked proposition to prohibit slavery, without the proviso for the reclamation of fugitives, never received any countenance or favor from Congress. It was always rejected when submitted; and most strenuously opposed by the southern States.

3. That this proviso for the recovery of fugitives was the test question, without which the sixth article of the ordinance never could have passed, or received the support of the South; and that therefore, it must have been finally adopted as a compromise between conflicting and otherwise irreconcilable opinions.

We have no sketch of the debates in Congress at that day; but these inferences are as clearly deducible from the Journal as if we had access to the opinions expressed in discussion. If, then, the ordinance of 1787 was the result of a compromise, it proves nothing in favor of the power of Congress to pass it. It is the essence of a compromise, that the parties to it still stand upon their legal rights. Not being able to agree upon principle, they consent to meet on middle ground, for the sake of peace. How, then, can this ordinance be plead as a legislative precedent?

But the ordinance was void and carries upon its face the evidence of its nullity. One of its provisions is—"That the articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent."

Now, contrast this with the condition upon which Virginia, in 1784, ceded the territory northwest of the Ohio, to which the ordinance applied. That condition was—

"That the territory so ceded shall be laid out and formed into States, containing a suitable extent of territory, not less than one hundred or more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit; and that the States so formed shall be distinct republican States, and admitted members of the Federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as the other States."

I ask, sir, whether the provision of the ordinance declaring that the articles of compact "shall remain forever unalterable," is not in violation of that part of the condition of cession which declares—

"That States so formed, &c., shall be admitted members of the Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as the other States."

The other States of the Union have the right to adopt or abolish slavery, at their pleasure. But, if this ordinance be valid, then Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and the other States formed from the western territory have not this right; they are forever prohibited by these unalterable "articles of compact." Virginia was a slaveholding State at the time of the cession, and of course felt a deep interest in the subject. Can it be supposed, that she would have made so extensive a grant of territory if she had known at the time that the whole of it would, by ordinance of Congress, have been monopolized by the free States? Such an idea is absurd. In view, then, of the absence of any grant of power to Congress, under the articles of confederation, to pass the ordinance, and in view of the express condition of the cession by Virginia, it is not strange that Mr. Madison declared it to be "without the color of constitutional authority." If void, then how unfair to plead it as a legislative precedent!

Moreover, the ordinance was enacted by the Congress of the confederation before the adoption of the present constitution. It cannot, therefore, with any plausibility, be relied on as a precedent to throw light upon the powers of Congress under the present constitution.

But there are several acts of Congress passed since the adoption of the present constitution, which have been referred to as legislative precedents. The first is the act of 1789, "to provide for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio;" and it appears from its preamble, that it was specially designed to carry into effect the ordinance of 1787. Strong reliance is placed in this act, because the Congress of 1789 was composed, in part, of the members who adopted the constitution, and who were familiar with all the circumstances attending the passage of the ordinance; and it is asked with plausibility, whether these men, thus fresh from the deliberations of the convention, and acquainted with the history of the ordinance, would, within less than two years, have passed an act of Congress to carry into effect this very ordinance, if they did not believe it constitutional? Is it not evidence of contemporaneous construction? It is a sufficient reply to this, that the ordinance of 1787, as I have shown, was the result of compromise; that it was regarded as a compact entered into "between the original States and the people and States of the said territory," which, under the 6th article of the constitution, was declared to be as "valid against the United States under this constitution as under the confederation." The act of 1789, therefore, cannot be considered as the exercise of an original power of legislation. It is the execution, in good faith, of a compact formed under the articles of confederation. The same is true in relation to the several acts of Congress organizing temporary governments in the territories of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin. In all these territories the ordinance of 1787 prohibiting slavery was applied. But Congress did not thereby assert or claim any right, by virtue of our present constitution, to exercise original legislative jurisdiction over the subject of slavery. These are the States which have been formed out of the western territory, for which the ordinance of 1787 expressly provided. So far, therefore, from these acts constituting legislative precedents, they are but evidences of the fidelity of the South in carrying out every engagement into which she has entered.

The next class of acts relied on, as legislative precedents, are those in reference to the suppression of the slave trade. The act of 1794 was designed to prohibit the exportation of slaves from any part of the United States to any foreign place or country; and the act of 1800, in addition thereto, only further defines the penalty for such exportation. No candid man will contend that these were designed to strike at the institution of slavery as it exists in the United States. They were purely commercial in their character, and referable to that article of the constitution which confers on Congress the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations."

The ninth section of the first article of the constitution, by clear implication at least, authorizes Congress to prevent the importation of slaves into the United States, after the year 1808. It is in the following words:

"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation not exceeding ten dollars for each person."

At the time of the adoption of the constitution, the importation of slaves, as an article of commerce, was extensively carried on by nearly all the States; and it was regarded as a matter of so much importance, that its continuance was thus guarantied for the space of twenty years. It was not until near the expiration of that time, that we find any legislation on the subject. In 1807, Congress passed a law "to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States from and after the 1st of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight." In the year 1818, Congress passed an additional act, authorizing the President to employ armed vessels on the coasts of Africa and the United States, and to seize vessels unlawfully engaged in the trade. In 1820, an act was passed to continue in force "an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy," and also to make further provisions for punishing the crime of piracy. The fourth section of this act declares the seizing a negro or mulatto not held to service, with the intent to make them slaves, to be piracy. In 1828 and 1830, respectively, laws were passed appropriating money for the suppression of the slave trade. The act of 1804 divided Louisiana into two territories, and declared those of 1794 and 1803, concerning the slave trade, to which I have referred, to be of force therein. In 1822, the territorial government of Florida was organized, and the acts of 1794, 1800, 1807, 1818, and 1819, in relation to the slave trade, are declared to be of force in said territory. These, I repeat, are all commercial regulations, and dependent upon the constitutional provision vesting Congress with the power to make such regulations. They are directed to the suppression of a traffic which all parties in this Union, and indeed the civilized world, regard as immoral and at war with the benign spirit of the age. None of them look to the prohibition of the extension of the institution of slavery, and therefore, they fail to aid those who rely upon them, as legislative precedents, to justify the action which this bill proposes.

The act of 1820, which prescribed the terms, on which the State of Missouri was admitted into the Union, and the resolutions, by which Texas was annexed, have also been quoted as instances in which Congress exercised legislative jurisdiction over the subject of slavery. These fixed the parallel of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes of north latitude as the northern limit of slavery. It is true, that upon the face of these enactments, it does appear, that Congress did legislate on the subject of slavery, and prohibited its existence within certain limits. Unexplained, they might very properly be regarded as legislative precedents for the exercise of the power now claimed. But who does not know that both of these were compromises? But as compromises, they cannot justly be considered as favoring the construction of the constitution now claimed. So far from this, they prove that such construction was not yielded by the South, nor peremptorily insisted on by the North. But, being unable to agree upon the right, both parties consented to stand on middle ground, for the sake of the Union. There is, therefore, not a single act of Congress, which can be relied on, as a legislative precedent, to justify the exercise of power now proposed.

Time would fail me, to review critically the judicial decisions which have been quoted to sustain the proposition, that Congress has the right to prohibit slavery in the territories. I have examined those decisions carefully, and have arrived at precisely the same conclusions which my colleague, [Mr. BERRIEN,] so lucidly presented to the Senate. I content myself by simply stating these conclusions as I pass along.

The case of McCulloch vs. the State of Maryland, in 4th Wheaton's Reports, decides the constitutionality of a national bank. That was the question before the court; and in delivering his opinion, one of the justices said, incidentally, that the article of the constitution now under consideration did apply to territorial governments, and that all admit their constitutionality.

The question in the case of the Cherokee Indians vs. the State of Georgia, in 5th Peters's Reports, was, whether those Indians were a foreign nation, in the sense to entitle them to be heard before the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the case of Gratiot vs. the United States, in 14 Peters's Reports, it was simply decided, that under the words "to dispose of," the President had the right to lease the public lands.

The case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter, in 1 Peters's Reports, decided the validity of the judgment of a court of admiralty in the territory of Florida. It also decided the right of Congress to erect territorial governments.

I conclude, therefore, that Congress has no right to prohibit slavery in the territories of the United States. There is no grant of such power to be found in the constitution. It is incompatible with its fiduciary character and the scope and intention of its trust. It is violative of the right of property which each State has in the whole territory. It is subversive of the political equality and dignity of the States. It is not sanctioned by any legislative precedents or judicial decisions.

Sir, if I understand the position of the political party with which I act, this is the doctrine which they proclaim: that Congress has no right to interfere with the subject of slavery either in the States or the territories. My colleague, [Mr. BERRIEN,] in his remarks the other day, referred to the seventh resolution adopted by the late Baltimore convention; and giving, what seemed to be a fair and reasonable construction to that resolution, he made a strong appeal to the democratic portion of the Senate, to stand by the public declarations of their party. Sir, I accord with him in that interpretation, and cheerfully unite with him in that appeal. If that resolution means anything, it is, that the democratic party of the United States are thoroughly and publicly committed to the doctrine of non-interference by Congress with the subject of slavery in any form or for any purpose. Let us examine its phraseology. It is as follows:

"7. Resolved, That Congress has no power under the constitution to interfere with or control the domestic institutions of the several States, and that such States are the sole and proper judges of everything appertaining to their own affairs not prohibited by the constitution; that all efforts of the abolitionists and others, made to induce Congress to interfere with questions of slavery, or to take incipient steps in relation thereto, are calculated to lead to the most dangerous and alarming consequences; and that all such efforts have an inevitable tendency to diminish the happiness of the people, and endanger the stability and permanency of the Union, and ought not to be countenanced by any friend of our political institutions."

What language can be stronger or broader? It denounces "all efforts by the abolitionists or others," (meaning, of course, Wilmot proviso men,) "made to induce Congress to interfere with questions of slavery, or to take incipient steps in relation thereto." I refer to this resolution to refresh the rec llection, if such be necessary, of Senators upon this side of the chamber, and appeal to them to stand by the doctrine which it promulgates. The resolution was unanimously adopted by the convention; and there are four Senators on this floor who were members of that body, and whose votes either way may decide the fate of the section of this bill now under consideration. I allude to the two Senators from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT and Mr HANNEGAN,] one of the Senators from New York, [Mr. DICKINSON,] and one of the Senators from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] They all voted for this resolution.

Mr. HAMLIN.—Not with that construction.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] says, not with the construction which I place upon it. They did, to all legal and moral intents and purposes; and I will prove it. I will refer to the proceedings of the convention, to show the sense in which it was understood at the time of its passage. One of the delegates from Georgia [Mr. Forman] offered two resolutions, one of which was as follows:

"And be it further resolved, That this convention repudiates the Wilmot proviso."

He was requested by gentlemen on all hands to withdraw the resolutions. He did so, with the distinct announcement to the convention, that unless the platform resolutions should go far enough to effect the desired object, he would again offer his resolution. He did not present it again, and therefore the inference is clear that he at least, as one southern delegate, construed the seventh platform resolution to cover the entire ground of non-interference; or, in other words, to repudiate the Wilmot proviso.

Subsequently, a delegate from Alabama, [Mr. Yancey,] as one of the minority of the committee appointed to report resolutions for the convention, submitted the following:

"Resolved, That the doctrine of non interference with the rights of property of any portion of the people of the confederation, be it in the States or in the territories thereof, by any other than the parties interested in them, is the true republican doctrine, recognized by this convention."

I make no comments upon the merits of this resolution, or the adequacy of its language to express the avowed meaning of its author. It certainly, however, did express the doctrine of non interference by Congress. I refer to it merely to show the action of the convention upon it, as an index to the sense in which the seventh platform resolution was adopted. It was voted down by a large majority. But why? Was it because the convention did not intend to avow the doctrine of non-interference by Congress? No; but because it was considered that the seventh resolution presented by a majority fully embraced the doctrine.

Speaking of that resolution, a delegate from Alabama, [Mr. Moore,] said:

"The resolutions just adopted present a platform upon which we can all stand. If they have not gone the full length that some of us would have had them, they go claim doctrines dear to democrats. They deny the right of Congress to interfere in any shape or form with the peculiar institution of the South; they breathe, in reference to them, the spirit of the constitution. The doctrine of non-interference to which we cling is boldly asserted and proclaimed."

In declaring the vote of North Carolina on Mr. Yancey's resolution, the delegate [Mr. Strange] designated by his colleagues for that purpose, said:

"He was instructed by the North Carolina delegation to say, that they believed the resolutions of the committee cover the entire ground of non interference with the rights of slaveholders on the part of Congress, either in the States or territories, and that, therefore, they voted eleven ays."

These, Mr. President, were the declarations made by southern men, in the presence and hearing of their northern brethren in convention, of the interpretation which they gave to the seventh resolution. They remained silent, and raised no objection to our construction of the resolution. That silence confirmed the interpretation, and it became morally and honorably binding upon every member of that convention, in the sense in which it was understood at its adoption. Than this there is no principle in ethics better settled. If any member of the convention dissented from the meaning attached to the resolution by the South, then was his time to speak; but by standing mute, he acquiesced in that construction, and became bound by it.

I will not close the evidence on this point here. That convention nominated Lewis Cass, of Michigan, as the democratic candidate for the Presidency. They did so with a full knowledge of his expressed opinions against the Wilmot proviso—his avowed opposition to the constitutional right of Congress to entertain jurisdiction over the subject of slavery in the territory of the United States. In his Nicholson letter, of the 29th of December last, he says:

"Briefly, then, I am opposed to the exercise of any jurisdiction by Congress in this matter; and am in favor of leaving to the people of any territory which may be hereafter acquired the right to regulate it for themselves, under the general principles of the constitution, because,

"1. I do not see in the constitution any grant of the requisite power to Congress, and I am not disposed to extend a doubtful power beyond its express—some established—of territorial governments when needed—leaving to the inhabitants all the rights compatible with the relations they bear to the confederation.

"2. Because I believe this measure, if adopted, would weaken, if not impair the union of the States, as I would sow the seed of future discord, which would grow up, and upon ripening, an abundant harvest of calamity."

With this public declaration of the doctrine of non-interference, that convention took him as their candidate. Does not this show that they intended to adopt that as a party doctrine, and that the seventh resolution was designed to announce it to the world? That General Cass so understood it, there can be no question. In his letter of acceptance, of the 30th of May last, he says:

"I have carefully read the resolutions of the democratic national convention laying down the platform of our political faith, and I adhere to them as firmly as I approve them cordially."

Why does he "approve them cordially?" It must be, because they express his sentiment on the constitutional power of Congress in relation to the subject of slavery; and that sentiment is, non-interference by Congress with the subject of slavery, either in the States or the territories. The South so understood the resolution, and our northern brethren knew that they so understood it. It was upon the faith of that resolution, that she acquiesced cordially to the action of that convention, and now unites warmly in the support of its gallant nominee.

I do not make these remarks, Mr. President, to express, or even intimate, a want of confidence in my political associates upon this floor or elsewhere. I have entire confidence in the patriotism of the great democratic party North and South; and I believe that upon the harmony, integrity, and triumph of that party depend the security and permanence of this glorious republic. But, sir, I will say, that the eyes of the southern democracy are turned with intense interest to the action of their brethren of the free States upon this bill. They consider them pledged to the doctrine of non-interference; they look with anxious solicitude to the redemption of that pledge, feeling that it will at once strengthen the bond of their union, and inspire the hope that it may be future.

In reflecting upon this subject, there occurs to my mind a fact which is full of instruction and warning. Who can close his eyes to the indication, that in the Empire State and in all New England there is an obvious tendency to the formation of parties upon geographical lines? We see an enthusiastic and untiring party, rallied upon what they term the "free soil" policy; and it is humiliating to know, that it has received its recent impulse from professed democrats. Who is the leader of this sectional crusade against the interest and peace of the South? It is that arch traitor to all the professions of his public life and the principles of the party that has cherished him—who has received the highest honors in the gift of his country, and for whom, in 1840, the southern democracy sacrificed themselves. He turns now and scorns the hand that wreathed his brow; and unfortunately there are those who are willing to be his minions. Is it not natural, that such a movement in such a quarter should produce some misgivings in the breast of the South? Sir, in proportion to the magnitude and importance which this "free soil" faction shall assume, will be the degree of distrust excited at the South. If the northern democracy desire to retain the confidence of their southern brethren, and secure the vote which we are anxious to cast for our gallant standard-bearer, let them stand by the seventh resolution of the Baltimore platform, as we understood it, and as it was known that we understood it, when it was adopted.

Mr. FOOTE.—Do I understand the Senator from Georgia to say, that the vote of the South for General Cass depends upon the action of our northern friends upon this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not know to what extent, but that it will have some influence upon the vote of the South, I have no doubt. If democratic Senators do not stand by the resolution of the Baltimore convention on this floor, it will awaken distrust in the South, which, to the degree of that distrust, will diminish the party's strength.

Mr. President, I have now discussed the main question presented by the twelfth section of this bill. I have shown the great doctrine proclaimed by the democratic party to be true, that Congress has no right under the constitution, either expressed or implied, to prohibit slavery in the territory belonging to the United States.

It remains now to consider the question involved in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS.] That question is, whether it is the duty of Congress to guarantee to the slaveholder, who shall remove with his slaves into the territory of the United States, the undisturbed enjoyment of his property in them, so long as it continues to be a territory. Or, in other words, whether the inhabitants of a territory, during their territorial condition, have the right to prohibit slavery therein. For the purposes of this question, it matters not where the power of legislating for the territory resides—whether exclusively in Congress, or jointly in Congress and the inhabitants, or exclusively in the inhabitants of the territory: the power is precisely the same—no greater in the hands of one than the other. In no event can the slaveholder of the South be excluded from settling in such territory with his property of every description. If the right of exclusive legislation for the territories belongs to Congress, then I have shown that they have no constitutional power, either expressed or implied, to prohibit slavery there. But suppose that Congress have the right to establish a territorial government only, and that then, all further governmental control ceases: can the territorial legislature pass an act prohibiting slavery? Surely not. For the moment you admit the right to organize a territorial government to exist in Congress, you admit necessarily the subordination of the people of the territory—their dependence on this government for an organic law to give them political existence. Hence, all their legislation must be in conformity with that organic law; they can pass no act in violation of it—none but such as it permits. Since, therefore, Congress has no power, as I have shown, to prohibit slavery, they cannot delegate such a power to the inhabitants of the territory; they cannot authorize the territorial legislature to do that which they have no power to do. The stream cannot rise higher than its source. This is as true in government as in physics. It is idle, however, to discuss this question in this form. For if Congress possess the power to organize temporary governments, it must then possess the power to legislate for the territories. If they may perform the greater, they may the less; the major includes the minor proposition. Hence, Congress has, in all cases since the foundation of our government, reserved a veto upon the legislation of the territorial governments: it is absolutely necessary, in order to restrain them from violations of the constitution, and infringements of the rights of the States, as the joint owners of the public lands. If, therefore, an act of the territorial legislature, prohibiting slavery, should be sent up to Congress for approval, they would be bound to withhold it, upon the ground of its being an act which Congress themselves could not pass.

But suppose the right of legislation for the territories be in its inhabitants, can they prohibit slavery? Surely not; and for reasons similar to those which show that Congress cannot.

The territories are not independent of, but subordinate to the United States; and, therefore, their legislation must be subordinate. Let us look at some of the limitations which this condition imposes. Under the constitution, "no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States:" Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" no religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States;" "every State in this Union a republican form of government." Could, then, the inhabitants of a territory establish a monarchy? Certainly not. Why? The ultimate object for which territories are held points out the reason. It is to admit them as States into this Union. Hence the importance and necessity of requiring them to adopt a republic form, that they may be suitable associates in our great confederacy. They must, therefore, be considered as under the purpose of the federal government.

Sovereignty follows the ownership of the domain, and therefore the sovereignty over the territories is in the States in their confederated capacity: hence, the reason that the legislation of Congress, as the agent of the States, respecting the territories, must be limited by the object of the trust, the situation and nature of the property to be administered, and the respective rights of the proprietors. Now, if the sovereignty over the territories is in the States, and the right of legislation rest in Congress, but in the inhabitants of the territories, it is evident that they can have no higher rights of legislation than Congress could have. They must be bound by limitations just mentioned; and if the prohibition of slavery in the territories by Congress be inconsistent with these limitations, its prohibition by the territorial legislature would be so likewise.

If, possessing the right of legislation, the inhabitants of the territories are bound by the limitations to which I have alluded, it may be asked, who holds the check upon their action? I reply, that it is indispensable for Congress to exercise the veto upon their legislation. Who else can restrain them from "entering into a treaty, or alliance, or confederation," with foreign powers? "from granting letters of marque and reprisal, coining money, emitting bills of credit?" Who else shall prevent them from creating orders of nobility, establishing a church, or suspending the operation of the writ of habeas corpus? Who else shall guide them in the republican path which shall lead them to preparation for final admission into the Union? Who else shall prevent their passing laws in violation of the equal rights of the States in the territory which is the common property of all? Without the retention of a veto upon the legislation of the territorial governments, it would make the inhabitants of the territory independent of Congress; aye, it would establish the proposition, that the moment you conquer a people, they rise superior to the government that conquers. New Mexico and California are ours by treaty, but for all the purposes of this argument, we have acquired them by conquest. To assert, therefore, that they have the right to legislate over all subjects—to prohibit slavery—despite the consent of the United States, is to say, that by our conquest of them, they become invested with rights superior to those of Congress. The institution of slavery is guarantied by the constitution of the United States, and it has the same protection thrown around it, which guards our citizens against the granting of titles of nobility, or the establishment of religion; therefore Congress would be as much bound to veto an act of territorial legislation prohibiting it, as an act violating these rights of every citizen of the Republic. It is in this view that I support the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. MANGUM.—Does not General Cass take the position, that the people of these territories shall have the entire control of this question, and that Congress has no jurisdiction over this subject?

Mr. JOHNSON.—General Cass asserts that Congress has no jurisdiction over the subject. He does not say that the people of these territories have the original right to admit or exclude slavery.

He is in favor of leaving it to them to "regulate it for themselves, under the general principles of the constitution."

Mr. MANGUM.—As I wish to come to as clear an understanding of General Cass's opinions as I can, let me suppose a case. Emigrants go into these territories; the territorial legislature pass an act abolishing slavery; the act comes here for the concurrence of Congress, as it must, and Congress approves it: would General Cass veto or sign the act? Or suppose the reverse. The territorial legislature establishes slavery; the act comes here and is approved: what would General Cass do?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I can only reply that General Cass nowhere asserts the abstract right of the people of the territories to establish or prohibit slavery—he does not use these terms. He, in two instances, uses the word to "regulate," and in one instance, to "adjust," both of which imply something very different from "establishing" or "excluding."

Mr. MANGUM.—This is free territory I am now speaking about. Suppose a North Carolinian emigrates to New Mexico with his slaves; they must either be recognized as property or not; who has the right to determine that question?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I think that question has already been determined by the late treaty. I think, by proceeding regularly with my argument, that the Senator from North Carolina will have as good an answer to his question as I am capable of giving. The Senator says that New Mexico and California are now free territories.

Mr. MANGUM.—So I understand them to be.

Mr. JOHNSON.—He desires to know, if a North Carolinian were to remove to New Mexico with his slaves, what would be the effect of his passing the Rio Grande? would the act emancipate his slaves, or would he still be entitled to their use and enjoyment? I have no doubt I can answer the question fully and satisfactorily to the mind of any legal gentleman such as I know the Senator to be.

Mr. MANGUM.—What would be the opinion of General Cass upon the subject, according to his views as expressed in his letter?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have given to the Senator my interpretation of General Cass's letter. He is willing to leave the "regulation" of slavery to the people of the territories—speaking as though, in contemplation of law, it is an institution already in existence there, which I shall show is true. The gentleman is as capable of understanding General Cass as I am. We ask in vain for the opinions of General Taylor upon this identical question. The oracles give to all our inquiries the most doubtful responses. All I can do, after giving him my construction of it, is to imitate that Senator. When asked for General Taylor's opinions, he refers us to his letters; so I refer him to General Cass's.

In the constitution of Mexico, adopted in 1824, there was no provision upon the subject of slavery, either tolerating or prohibiting it. But, in the amended constitution of 1834, slavery was forbidden in that republic. The provision, I understand, was adopted in obedience to the dictation of Great Britain, for the purpose of enabling Mexico to form an advantageous treaty with that power. Its prohibition, therefore, was a political regulation. I understand there is no municipal enactment on the subject either in New Mexico or California. The federal constitution rendered it unnecessary.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—There is none.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The Senator from Mississippi, who is better informed, assures me there is none. If I understand the law of nations, it is this, as expressed in the following language of a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, in 1 Peters's Reports, 511:

"On a transfer of territory, it has never been held that the relations of the inhabitants with each other undergo any change. Their relations with the former sovereign are dissolved, and new relations are created between them and the government which has acquired their territory. The same act which transfers their country, transfers the allegiance of those who remain in it, and the law which may be denominated political, is necessarily changed; although that which regulates the intercourse and general conduct of individuals remains in force until altered by the newly-created power of the State."

It is upon this principle of international law, that, upon the cession of the territories of New Mexico and California, the Catholic religion ceased to be a State establishment. Under the constitution of Mexico, it is a political institution, and, therefore, ceased as such, and the principle of free toleration, which is equally a political regulation of this government, supervened; and any citizen of the United States removing into those territories, has the right to enjoy his own peculiar religious sentiments. So the prohibition of slavery by the constitution of Mexico, "may be denominated political," and was, therefore, "necessarily changed" upon the execution of the treaty of cession. In New Mexico and California, therefore, there is no law, either political or municipal, forbidding the existence of slavery. It is equally well settled, that the political law of territory the acquired, ceasing, the political laws of the country acquiring, supervene. Now, is not slavery in the United States a political as well as a municipal institution? It is municipal, in that its entire control and continuance belong to the State in which it exists; and it is political, because it is recognized by the organic law of the confederacy, and cannot be changed or altered by Congress, without an amendment of the constitution; and because it is a fundamental law, that three-fifths of the slaves are represented in the national legislature. Being political, upon the execution of the treaty of cession with Mexico, it extended to instanti, over the territories of New Mexico and California. Then, I say, if a fellow citizen of the Senator from North Caolina [Mr. MANGUM] were to remove with his slaves into New Mexico, his right to their use and service is guaranteed by the constitution of the United States, and no power on earth can deprive him of them.

This view fully meets the objections to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. DAVIS.] It is urged that slavery does not exist in New Mexico and California; that they are free territories; and although we deny to Congress any jurisdiction over the subject, yet we ask Congress by this amendment to establish slavery therein. We ask of Congress no such thing. Upon the execution of the treaty, all political regulations of the United States were extended over these territories, and the institution of slavery being political in its character, it now exists, in legal intendment, as absolutely in New Mexico and California, as it does in Virginia or Georgia. It is a misapplication of terms, to speak of prohibiting slavery in the territory of the United States. It already exists, in contemplation of law, and the legislation proposed amounts to abolition. Against this only, does the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi seek to protect the citizens of the South. Have they not a right to claim that protection?

In denying the power of the territorial legislatures to exclude citizens of the slaveholding States to settle in the territories with their slaves, I say nothing in violation of the right of self-government. The right of self-government does not necessarily imply the right to do any and every thing which they may think proper to do. The States of this Union possess, in the most absolute degree, the right of self-government; and yet they must legislate in subordination to the constitution. They are limited in their action to the terms of the compact into which they have voluntarily entered. They must respect the relation they sustain to the confederation. But it, then, any hardship—any abbreviation of their rights—to require the territorial governments to be subordinate also to the constitution, and to regulate their action according to the regulations which they sustain to the United States?

If you assert the broad proposition that the inhabitants of the territory, by virtue of the right of self-government, have the right to exclude slavery therein, the question arises, how many inhabitants shall there be to enable them to do this? Shall it be five hundred, or ten or twenty thousand? Shall a few thousand people in Oregon—a vast territory out of which five or six large States may be carved—determine that question for all future generations, and fix their destiny for all time to come? Shall a few thousand half-civilized Mexicans, inhabiting the territories of California and New Mexico, decide what institutions shall exist there? The idea is ridiculous and absurd. The States of this Union are too deep an interest in these vast dominions to permit them to be surrendered to such a control and such a destiny.

When, then, shall they be permitted to settle this question? Just at that point of time when they shall form their political organization. Then definite boundaries will be fixed which shall constitute a State; then the people of the States will consent to part with their sovereignty over the territory, and transfer it to the people within those limits; then they will have arrived at that point, in the progress of republican pupilage, at which, according to the usages of our government, they may be admitted as a State, and participate in the councils of the confederation: then they may decide for themselves whether or not they will tolerate slavery as a part of their social system. Until then, like General Cass, viewing the institution of slavery as existing in legal intendment, "I am in favor of leaving to the people of any territory * * * the right to regulate it for themselves, under the general principles of the constitution."

But suppose, Mr. President, you have the right to prohibit slavery in the territories of the United States, what high political consideration requires you to exercise it? All must see, that it cannot be effected without producing a popular convulsion which will probably dissolve this Union. It is admitted by all, that as soon as the territories are formed into States, and they shall be received into the confederacy, they have the right to adopt slavery. Will they not do it, if the soil and climate should demonstrate that kind of labor to be most profitable? Then, why hazard all that is valuable in this glorious confederation, for the small purpose of suppressing an imaginary evil, for so short a period of time? Is the good to be accomplished worth the fearful experiment?

It is said that the growth of the "slave power" in this government must be stopped; that the three-fifths of slaves, who are represented in Congress, give an undue weight to the southern States. Sir, what harm has the "slave power" ever done to this republic? Have not the southern States always been true to the constitution? Have they not strictly abided all its compromises and guarantees? Have they not been loyal to the interests of the republic? Have they ever been slow or reluctant to contribute their share, aye, and more, of men and money to defend its honor, or repel the invasion of a foreign foe? Then, why tell us, with a sneer, that the "slave power" must be arrested, as if it were a foul blot upon our national escutcheon?

But by prohibiting slavery in the territories, do you diminish its representative strength in Congress? Surely not; their number remains the same. By permitting it to extend into the territories, do you increase it? By no means. Their number still remains the same. You do not make a slave of a single other human being. Their increase in this country depends entirely upon the law of population; and wherever they may be, they will be represented in Congress according to the stipulation of the constitution. In proportion as they recede from one State to another, it will diminish the representative strength of the State which they leave, and increase that to which they emigrate. It is idle, then, to talk of diminishing the slave power in the government by the process proposed.

Is there any great interest of philanthropy which requires the interference with the question of slavery which this bill proposes? We should look well to this, to see whether humanity will not suffer by the very means sought to be used for its amelioration. A half century is but a span in the history of governments; it soon rolls away. Our black population is rapidly increasing. What, then, must be the consequence of confining them within their present limits? In the progress of years, (and that very soon,) you will have the slave States crowded with a population so dense, that the products of the soil will not yield a competent subsistence. Their comforts diminish, and they endure the ills of want. What relief can then be given them? Will it be found in emancipation? Emancipation! To what end? Would you turn them loose within their present limits, in juxtaposition with the white man, and vastly his superior in numbers? Sir, the very idea makes the blood curdle in one's veins. It would be the signal for extermination and indiscriminate slaughter. Emancipation! To what end? Would our northern brethren receive them into their embraces? Their doors would be closed against them forever; or if they received them, it would be to aggravate their miseries. For whilst they descant eloquently about the hardships of involuntary servitude, it is undeniably true, that the free blacks of the North are more degraded than the slaves of the South. You tantalize them with the name of freedom, but deny them all its social and civil blessings. Emancipation! To what end? Would you send them abroad? Sir, the entire annual revenues of this government would fall infinitely short of accomplishing such an undertaking. Besides, you have no right thus to appropriate them. It behooves statesmen to look far down the vista of the future and scan well the consequences of their legislation. It is infinitely better to let the whole subject alone; leave the institution to work out its own destiny under Providence, and according to immutable laws of labor, climate, and soil. If you confine it within its present limits, you mitigate none of its imaginary evils, but you multiply them with the increase of population and the lapse of years, and inevitably force them to a late, at the contemplation of which, the benevolent heart becomes sick and sad. I would implore gentlemen to ponder upon these reflections and decide upon these great interests, as in the presence of God, and with direct reference to the retributions of hereafter.

But the restriction proposed by this bill is said to be of no practical importance whatever. We are told that Oregon is not adapted to slave labor; tha', in the character of its soil and climate, nature has erected impassable barriers against the ingress of slavery. The South are therefore taunted with being fomenters of discord, schismatics, and impracticables, because we resist this exercise of legislative power. Sir, the argument is as strong for us, as for those who use it. If it be not a practical question for us, it cannot be for them. If nature has erected these insurmountable obstacles, why are they not content to trust to them? Why seek to prohibit slavery from going where, by their own showing, it never will go? Is there any constitutional obligation resting upon gentlemen to press this prohibition? Then why persevere? It is, and can be nothing else, than a wanton exercise of power.

But to the South it is a practical question—a question of momentous, vital import. It asserts the constitutional right of Congress to entertain legislative jurisdiction over the subject of slavery. What is done here to-day will be plead as a precedent to-morrow. We war against the principle; and if you were to propose to prohibit slavery in the moon, I would stand here and battle against it, as long as I could raise my voice or move a muscle. You have no right to touch the subject; and it is insulting and humiliating to the South, merely because you have the numerical power, to attempt to prohibit slavery, where you yourselves say, that it never can go. Let those who move it bear the odium of the consequences.

Sir, in 1820, when the Missouri compromise was adopted, we fondly hoped this agitating question was put to rest, never again to be called forth from it slumbers, with its hideous train of spirits of discord, agitation, and strife. Nor has it been by the South. She has faithfully abided that compromise, although it was forced upon her. Nor does she now ask any thing at the hands of Congress. She is for peace, for standing by the constitution, in all the length and breadth of its compromises and guarantees. But can this be said of our northern brethren? No, sir; from that day to this, we have been called "men-stealers," "traffickers in human flesh," and our feelings outraged in every form which fanaticism could suggest. Abolition societies have been formed throughout the northern States, for the purpose of organized and systematic interference with our rights and domestic tranquility. The country has been inundated with incendiary publications. Congress has been literally besieged with abolition petitions. In many of the free States, the provision in the constitution providing for the recovery of fugitive slaves, and the act of 1793, intended to carry it into effect, have been wholly disregarded, and, in some instances, the owner inhumanly butchered, in the attempt to reclaim his property. The following extract from the report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate shows to what extent the legislatures of free States have gone, to defeat the southern slave-owner in efforts to recapture his fugitive slaves:

"Several of the non-slaveholding States, those in the East and North especially, have shaped their legislation in such a manner as to repeal all State laws in favor of a master in pursuit of his fugitive slave, leading such laws as unconstitutional, and as a dead letter on the statute book. And these States, or many of them, have gone much further, and have passed laws making it a penal to the highest and most criminal offence to interfere or give aid in the apprehension and delivery of a fugitive slave to his owner. Inaction of legislation has been rather the constitution to afford active aid in the delivery they have devised a system of hostile legislation to deprive him of aid. Instead of being allies to discharge an obligation imposed on them they have become hostile opponents to defeat it.

"Let these laws speak for themselves. The following are the laws of Massachusetts and Rhode Island. Having an identity of design, they use the same language:

"'SECTION 1. No judge of any court of record in this State, and no justice of the peace, shall hereafter take cognizance of or grant a certificate in cases that may arise under the third section of the act of Congress, passed February 12, 1793, and entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their master,' to any person who claims any other person as a fugitive slave within the jurisdiction of the State.

"'SEC. 2. No sheriff, deputy sheriff, coroner, constable, jailor, or other officer of this State, shall hereafter arrest or detain, or aid in the arrest or detention or imprisonment, in any jail or other building belonging to this State, or to any county, city, or town thereof, of any person on the reason that he is claimed as a fugitive slave.

"'SEC. 3. Any person of the above sheriff, deputy sheriff, coroner constable, or jailor, who shall offend against the provisions of this law in any way, directly or indirectly, under the power conferred by the third section of the act of Congress aforesaid, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars for every such offence, to the use of the State, or subject to imprisonment, not exceeding six months, in the county jail.'

"Laws of the same effect are now in force in all the northern and eastern States, and in some of the north western not slaveholding States.

"This subject was very much discussed during the last session of the legislature of New York; and, as an evidence of public opinion in that State, it may be stated that one of the leading objects of that legislature was to frame a bill to prohibit the State officers from interfering to assist a master, imposing high penalties on such as should give active aid to the owner in his efforts to apprehend his fugitive slave. It seems that this bill did not pass, upon the ground that State officers had no authority under State laws, they being a dead letter; and that therefore, there was an implied prohibition on State officers from interfering in such cases."

Sir, these things would seem to warn the South that the day is not distant, when she will be forced to stand firmly upon her constitutional rights.

Nor does this interference with the rights and tranquility of the South stop here. Look at recent proceedings in the federal legislature. In the last Congress, the three million bill being under consideration, Mr. Wilmot moved as an amendment:

"That, as an express and fundamental condition to the acquisition of any territory from the republic of Mexico by the United States, by virtue of any treaty which may be negotiated between them, and to the use by the Executive of the moneys herein appropriated, neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall ever exist in any part of said territory, except for crime, whereof the party shall first be convicted."

Mr. Wick, of Indiana, moved to amend the amendment, by inserting therein, after the word "territory," the words "north of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude." It was voted down by yeas 54 to nays 98; and the Wilmot proviso was adopted by yeas 83 to nays 64.

Again, during the last session of Congress, the Oregon bill being under consideration, Mr. Burt, of South Carolina, submitted the following amendment:

"Insert in the twelfth section, after the word 'and,' and before the words 'shall be subject,' the words 'considered as the slave of the said territory [or north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, known as the line of the Missouri compromise."

Here, again, the olive branch was tendered by the South, and rejected by a vote of yeas 82 to nays 114; and the bill, with the Wilmot proviso, adopted by yeas 154 to nays 35.

The whole history of public feeling and opinion in the free States, whether we look at the action of popular assemblies or proceedings of their legislatures, or to the course of their representatives in Congress, mournfully warns the South, that she must stand upon her constitutional rights. I trust, sir, when the crisis comes, she is prepared to do it.

Mr. FOOTE.—My friend from Georgia has spoken very emphatically of the action of Congress; and has very strenuously enforced this view of the subject—that in this body, and so far as he has taken a review of the other House, the North has been uniformly arrayed against the South on the question of slavery. The action of the present Congress has been pretermitted by the Senator. I know he does not intend to do injustice to the North, and, therefore, it is due to himself and to the truth of history, to say, that a portion of our northern brethren at the last session stood with us; and that, during the present session, we have been greatly indebted to their prompt action upon the Wilmot proviso.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not intend to do injustice to that portion of our northern friends who have stood by our rights. I speak in general terms. I am well aware that many of our northern friends, and especially the democratic portion of them, have manifested a noble willingness to sustain us. The resolution of the Baltimore convention, upon which I have commented, is proof of the fact. For all this I award to them the gratitude to which they are entitled. But, I repeat, the inference from all the visible indications around us evidently is, that the time has perhaps arrived, when the South has no other alternative but to stand upon her constitutional rights.

Mr. HALE.—I hope the Senator from Georgia will allow me to ask him a single question. Do I understand him to say that Congress has no right to legislate upon slavery in new territory, or any where else?

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is my doctrine.

Mr. HALE.—Of course my question includes legislation in the District of Columbia. The Senator, therefore, by his doctrine, makes it the first duty of Congress to undo what they have already done in the District. They have legislated upon the subject of slavery in the District heretofore, but if the Senator's argument is correct, they have done so unlawfully. Consequently, I would ask the honorable Senator if, in accordance with his own argument, Congress should not undo their former legislation upon this subject in the District?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have no idea of entering into a discussion of that subject at present. We have very tangible evidence that the abolition interests of the District are in very good hands when represented on this floor by the Senator from New Hampshire. If, as I was remarking when interrupted by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, the South has no other alternative but to stand upon her constitutional rights—if this be so—if the spirit of just conciliation is gone, and we are to be overpowered by numbers against right—I use no words of threatening, but I admonish those who force the extremity, to look dispassionately at the consequences of their conduct.

Mr. HALE.—I would have been exceedingly happy if the Senator from Georgia had condescended to answer the question I put to him. As it is, however, he has thought a sneer better than an answer. Permit me to say, for one, that I agree entirely with the Senator in one thing, and that is, that Congress has nothing to do with this matter. This is a local municipal regulation with which it has nothing to do; if it has had heretofore, it has nothing to do with it in this case. And the first and most obvious inference to be drawn from this proposition is, that Congress ought forthwith to repeal constitutionally that which they have unconstitutionally created upon this subject, as I stated before, in the District of Columbia. The Senator also goes so far as to say that if Congress were to undertake to legislate in the moon, he would sit here—I do not know how long—to resist such an attempt, because he avers the constitution confers no power upon Congress to legislate at all upon it. I do hope then, sir, that the Senator will take ground on one side or other of this question, that Congress either has or has not jurisdiction over it. If they have such jurisdiction then I hope their legislation will be wise; if they have no such jurisdiction at all then the first thing to be done is, to off hands from the subject entirely, because if they have no right guarantied by the constitution to legislate upon the subject in territories, they have none to legislate in the District of Columbia. I desire, sir, if no other gentleman intends to do it, to meet the assumption which has been laid down, that it is a constitutional doctrine that slavery goes with the United States wherever its area is extended. I wish to see for one what kind of slavery the United States may take with them. There is a peculiar form of slavery, looking to its total and speedy extinguishment, in New Jersey. There is another kind in Delaware, and another in Maryland, and perhaps another in the more Southern of the slave States. Which of these kinds may the United States carry into new territory? It seems to me, sir, that this is one of the most monstrous propositions I have ever heard advocated either here or elsewhere. It goes beyond the doctrine of a natural right and claims an inherent inextinguishable right to spread slavery as the Union is extended. It is a part of us, and a part of the life and element of our being. Wherever we spread ourselves, we carry with us and extend over new regions the black pall of human slavery. The attempted distinction which the Senator has endeavored to draw between slavery as a municipal, and as a political institution, I desire also to give an examination. If no one else, therefore, shall review the positions of the honorable Senator, I give notice to the Senate that I will undertake the task at as early a period as may be convenient. Before taking my seat, I would say that I do not appear here as the representative of the interests of abolitionists of the District of Columbia, as the honorable Senator from Georgia seems to intimate. I stand here—it may perhaps have been in bad taste in the Legislature of New Hampshire to have made me such—but nevertheless I stand here as a representative of the State of New Hampshire. It is a small State; but with truth it may be said of it, that no slave breathes its air, no enemy has ever impressed his footsteps on its soil.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

BATTLE OF PLATTSBURG.

The bill for the payment of the fourth regiment in the second brigade of the Vermont militia for services, at the battle of Plattsburgh, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

INCREASE IN THE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. BUTLER moved to proceed to the consideration of the motion made by him yesterday that two members, to be appointed by the Vice President, be added to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HALE hoped, as the motion was a very important one, that its consideration would be postponed until to-morrow morning, when the Senate would be full.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, did not wish the consideration of the territorial government referred to the Committee on Territories at all. That committee was a Committee on Territories, and not upon the formation of government, or the revision of plans of government. He hoped that so much of the message as related to the government of the territories, would be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BREESE remarked that it was never intended when the Senator from Alabama offered the motion for raising the Committee on Territories, that it should have charge of the business of providing governments for territories. He desired its reference to the Judiciary Committee, and if its present number was not sufficient, was in favor of an addition of two or three more members.

Mr. ATCHISON opposed the proposed reference to the Judiciary Committee, contending that the Committee on Territories was perfectly adequate to the accomplishment of any business affecting the territories of the United States, that might be brought before it.

After some conversation on a point of order—

Mr. WESTCOTT opposed the motion on the ground that a select committee ought to be chosen. He begged to call the attention of the Senators from Texas to the fact, that if one topic embraced in the President's message were taken up, the right of the State of Texas to the country which had been ceded to the United States would be brought up.

Mr. RUSK observed, that Texas claimed that country by her own law, which had been recognized by both Mexico and the United States.

Mr. WESTCOTT said, he was aware of that. He knew that the President had also recognized it; but he had already been denounced in Congress for that recognition. This afforded an additional reason for the appointment of a select committee. He had moved the reference to a select committee with an announcement at the time that he would decline serving on it. Although he would not shrink from responsibility, yet he thought it would be well to place these grave questions in the hands of the oldest and most experienced members of the body.

Mr. FOOTE rose to order. He desired to know whether the Senator from Florida could discuss the merits of the proposition on the question to take it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER overruled the point of order.

Mr. WESTCOTT said, that the Senator from Mississippi might have saved himself the trouble of interrupting him, as he had only one additional remark to make. He thought that it was obviously proper that the subject of the organization of the newly acquired territories should be referred to the Judiciary Committee rather than to the Territorial, inasmuch as purely legal questions were involved. But he was opposed to the reference to either of these committees, and desired a select committee.

Mr. FOOTE was perfectly willing to leave the subject with the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BUTLER remarked that his friend from Mississippi seemed to think that there was but one way of organizing territorial governments, just as the lawyer thought there was but one way of drawing marriage settlements. But, he would ask, had it never occurred to him that the system adopted for the Anglo Saxon race might not be altogether applicable to the people of New Mexico and California.

Mr. RUSK trusted that no such question would be presented as that apprehended by the Senator from Florida, with respect to the rights of Texas. But even without taking that into consideration, it seemed to him that it would be disrespectful to the standing committees to raise a select committee.

Mr. DAYTON expressed the hope that the suggestion made early in the debate would be acquiesced in, and that the subject would be passed over until to-morrow. It was a very unusual hour to bring up a resolution about which there was a difference of opinion, and several members had retired from the chamber under the impression that no business could now be brought up which belonged appropriately to the morning hour.

Mr. BUTLER replied, that he had given notice in the morning that he would call up the resolution.

Mr. DAYTON had not heard the notice given. He did not deny that the Senator was in the exercise of his legal rights, but his notice was a notice that he would call up a matter out of order, and he did not know that Senators were bound by such a notice. But aside from that, the question indirectly involved a subject of great interest. The Territorial and Judiciary Committees were constituted very much in the same way.

Mr. BUTLER.—Not at all.

Mr. DAYTON.—I mean very much in the same way in relation to that question.

Mr. BUTLER.—Oh!

Mr. DAYTON.—Gentlemen antagonistic to the Wilmot proviso, as it was ordinarily called, had a majority on both the committees. At the last session, he himself, unfortunately, stood alone on the Judiciary Committee. The Territorial Committee was organized in the same way. But he did not wish to discuss the resolution, and moved that it be passed over till to-morrow.

Mr. FOOTE observed, that the leading motive with him in opposing the resolution arose from a desire that the olive branch might be extended by the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BRIGHT said that although the question was not properly before the Senate, yet he felt called upon to make a few remarks in connection with it. There was certainly a necessity to add two members to the territorial committee. The chairm n had been absent for four or five weeks, and was not expected to return during the present session. Besides, the committee was rather unfortunately organized. The extreme views of his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS,]—whom he named for the purpose of showing the discordant materials of which the committee was composed, on this great question—were not likely to be reconciled. Whether the reference should be to that committee or to the Judiciary Committee he would not undertake to decide. Senators who were older and more conversant with the parliamentary rules of the body could settle that point. But if it were meant to convey the impression that the Committee on Territories was not competent to the duty of taking charge of these bills, he hoped the gentleman would say so. He did not, of course, mean to say that any such thing had even been insinuated in the course of the debate. There was a necessity for an increase of the territorial committee, and he hoped that the motion of the Senator from South Carolina would prevail. He would be very glad to avoid the labor and responsibility of participating in taking charge of these measures, but he insisted that the reference should be made to the committee to which they legitimately belonged.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1848.

PETITION.

Mr. DIX presented the memorial of Samuel Colman, proposing to compile a general index to the public documents printed by the order of both Houses of Congress, and asking a subscription for the same on the part of the United States.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on the Library.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a joint resolution authorizing the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, to make a just and fair settlement of the claims of the Cherokee nation of Indians according to the principles established by the treaty of August, 1846; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The said resolution was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and

On motion, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. BUTLER on the 6th instant, that two members, to be appointed by the VICE PRESIDENT, be added to the Committee on Territories.

After some conversation—

The question was taken upon agreeing to the motion to add two members to the Committee on Territories; and it was determined in the negative by yeas and nays, as follows:

So the motion was disagreed to.

FEES TO U. S. MARSHALS, CLERKS, ETC.

Mr. FOOTE submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report to the Senate the necessity of requiring marshals, clerks, and district attorneys, in all criminal cases, to make reports to the Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of instructions given him, in like manner as in civil cases; and also as to the property or moneys retained, on the settlement of their fees, by the marshals with the Treasury, to have been fees, costs, and charges allowed and paid to them.

PENSIONS TO THE ORDNANCE CORPS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill to extend the provisions of existing pension laws to enlisted men of the ordnance corps of the United States army; and it was

Resolved, That they concur therein.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS IN ENTRIES OF LAND.

The bill from the House of Representatives to amend an act, approved the 24th of May, 1824, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, approved on the 3d day of March, 1819, entitled 'An act providing for the correction of errors in making entries of land at the land offices,'" was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SUSPENDED PRE-EMPTION CLAIMS.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, the prior orders were postponed, and the bill to extend an act entitled "An act providing for the adjustment of all suspended pre-emption land claims in the several States and territories," approved 3d August, 1846, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

And no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—The question now under consideration is one, the discussion of which has been greatly deprecated in this body. But it now seems to be the pleasure of those who have hitherto opposed discussions of this kind, that the subject should be subjected to examination, and that it should be determined before the adjournment of this Congress. In this desire I fully concur; and, indeed, for my own part, I never felt any inclination to shun an examination of this subject. While gentlemen on the other side discuss it with frankness and with freedom, I trust that they will not complain of us who belong to the free States, and who are supposed, in some respects, to represent a different sentiment, if we express our views with the same degree of frankness. Several questions of considerable importance have arisen in this matter, and amongst others one of constitutional power. I am, therefore, constrained to notice that branch of the argument, which I would otherwise have passed over, and confined myself to points which I deem of higher interest.

It has been contended by various Senators upon this floor—by all the gentlemen I believe who represent slave States that have entered into this discussion—that the constitution gives to the United States no power over slavery—that it is a subject intangible by virtue of any authority contained in that instrument; in other words, that Congress has no power to create slavery in a territory, or to extinguish it if it already there exists. I will read the clause of the constitution bearing upon this subject, which will be found at the twenty-eth page of Hickey's edition. The language of the constitution is this:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting territory or other property belonging to the United States."

This is all the power conferred by the constitution over territory. It has been argued that it gives only a power over property—that it gives no sovereignty over the territory—that it confers no authority upon Congress to control, rule, or govern territory by constitutional power. In aid of this argument it is urged with some degree of force, I confess, that when the framers of the constitution made provision for the territory in which the government should be located, to wit, the District of Columbia, they there used quite a different phraseology, giving to Congress the exclusive jurisdiction over such territory. It is said that if it had been intended to give to Congress alike power and authority over other territory, it would have been so expressed, and the inference is drawn from that consideration as well as from the peculiar phraseology of the constitution, that there was no purpose on the part of the framers of that instrument, to give to Congress any power of government over the territories of the United States. I admit that the language of the constitution favors this construction; and I believe that the Supreme Court itself has decided that the language which I have read has a more direct application to property than to sovereignty. It seems, then, that some persons suppose that there is a casus omissus in the constitution—that the framers of that instrument made no provision for the government of territory. I apprehend that this is a total misapprehension of the subject; and if we recur to the facts connected with the history of the constitution, we shall find that is so. At the time of the formation of the constitution the United States possessed territory. Let us see what state of things existed then. Cotemporaneously with the formation of the constitution, or a little antecedent to it, this territorial question arose; and what was done by the old confederation? They passed the celebrated ordinance of 1787. And what was that? It was substantially a form of government containing within itself all the essential elements of a bill of right—with provisions for the exercise of legislative and judicial power—every thing, in fact, necessary to the complete government of the territory. This ordinance from its nature and character is as much an organic law—as much a fundamental regulation, as the constitution itself. Such was the state of things when the convention assembled to frame the constitution. What did they find upon the face of the ordinance? What I have already stated—an authority to establish a government, the specific form and character of which were prescribed in the ordinance. They found, moreover, that the whole subject had been discussed in the Congress of the confederation, including the great question touching slavery. They found that not only the then existing state of things was considered, but that the future had been penetrated, and that it had been determined—by what steps it is not necessary for me now to detail—that slavery should be excluded from all the territory embraced within the limits of the treaty of '83, lying north and west of the Ohio river. Nay, they went further. They decided in that ordinance that when that country should be filled with population, not less than three, nor more than five States should be carved out of it, to be eventually introduced as members of this Union. All that was settled harmoniously. Not only all right was given up by the several States who claimed an interest in this territory, but this concession of the perpetual exclusion of slavery was also made. It was an act of great deliberation. The question was examined in all its aspects, and throughout was duly considered. The convention which framed the constitution had the ordinance fresh before them. It embraced all the territory within the limits of the treaty of 1783, not within the limits of the States, to which the United States then had an unquestioned title. They established afterwards, I know, a territory on the Mississippi, but that was over conflicting claims of Georgia, and it was established subject, by agreement, to these claims. This was all the territory that the United States at that time possessed. It is very plain, then, that ample provision was made for the government, and that it is not a casus omissus, but it was provided for in the ordinance. The convention not only regarded that ordinance, which they left untouched, but they looked into the whole matter. These men had a vision which reached into the future. They foresaw the condition in which this country would probably be at this very day, provided it remained within the limits of the treaty of 1783. The discussion proceeded upon that view. The idea of obtaining new territory had not then entered into the mind of any man. The thought of conquering or purchasing sovereignties was not dreamed of at that day. It is not remarkable, then, that no provision is made for such an occurrence. They made a constitution to cover the territory which they owned, and nothing else, and that territory was circumscribed by the limits of the treaty of 1783.

When the framers of the constitution were providing for a just apportionment of the political power among all the States, what did they see? They saw that in time—and probably the time came much sooner than they apprehended—there would be five States upon this northwestern territory; and, also, that in all human probability, the district of Maine, then belonging to Massachusetts, would be separated from it, and form another member of this Union. It is in vain to say that no question then arose between free and slave States. It is in vain to say that that question was not gravely considered by that body. They saw not only that there were six States to come in from what might be denominated the free territory, but that there were a number to come in eventually from the slave territory. Kentucky was to come in by a division of Virginia; North Carolina was to be divided and Tennessee introduced.

This happened very soon, as was foreseen. It was also foreseen that Mississippi and Alabama were at no remote day to enter the Union as sovereignties. When they should come, and the other portions of the country be filled with population, the relative power, as adjusted by the framers of the constitution, would be ten slave to fourteen free States. This was the chart by which the convention were guided. The compromises of the constitution were made with that state of things standing out unmistakeably before every man—perfectly comprehensible and perfectly well understood.

Now, I contend, and I think with great justice, that the concessions which were made at that time by the free States, and above all, the great concession of political power which was made in the permission to have the slave population represented, were made upon this state and condition of things—made in the belief and understanding that the ratio which then existed should continue and should not be violated. I know that it is not so nominated in the bond. I know it is not so expressly covenanted in the instrument; but, nevertheless, it is perfectly plain from the whole history of that convention, and from the tenor of the constitution itself, that no addition of territory was anticipated to interfere with the adjustment which was then made. Now, how does it happen that quite a different state of things exists at this time? The story is soon told. An emergency not anticipated sprung up. A foreign country had the rightful possession to the mouth of the Mississippi—a river which was destined to be the common highway of a large number of great States, competent to sustain many millions of people. Difficulties very soon occurred in regulating the navigation of this stream, and it very soon became apparent that the interests of the United States demanded that they should have possession and control of this highway. Without much inquiry, as far as I know, into the motives beyond those which I have stated, which govern in this matter, it is sufficient to say, that an opportunity offered to purchase this territory. Negotiations were entered into which proved successful, and for a consideration in money the the territory was ceded to the United States. Not only the soil, but the sovereignty were thus obtained. Now, in my opinion, the last idea that entered into the minds of the framers of the constitution was that of trading in sovereignties, either by sale or purchase; but in this case the necessity existed. Thus was acquired in a peaceable way that territory, and without considering much the future difficulties which sprung up, or the effect of the transaction upon the various interests of the country or the adjustment of the constitution, the cession was taken. The country was purchased, and having got possession of the sovereignty and the vacant land, gentlemen turned round and began to examine the constitution, and inquire whether there was any authority there to govern the territory. I am very much of the opinion of all the gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, that it was a vain and fruitless search. They found no express or direct authority to acquire, and none to govern. The provision in the constitution in relation to governing territory evidently relate to property more than to government. Thus a case sprung up not anticipated. Possession had been taken of a thing which they had no right to take according to their view of the case. What was to be done? I believe I am correct in saying that the leading statesmen of that day were of opinion, that there was no constitutional power to acquire territory, or to govern it if acquired. I think that has been very often stated here, and I think it it be necessary proof can be readily produced in support of that view. The plan of Mr. Jefferson was to amend the constitution, and in that way to legalize the act and clothe the government with jurisdiction over the territory. It is certain that a very serious difficulty arose upon this point. They could not retrace their steps. The transaction had been completed, and could not be annulled. Suppose the question of amendment had been submitted according to the forms of the constitution, and failed; what then? The country would have been left in possession of the sovereignty and the soil of this territory, without the power to govern it. The government was obliged ex necessitate rei to retain it, and then the discovery was made which seems now to be well enough understood, that the acquisition of territory necessarily brought with it the power to govern—that the one is the incident of the other.

I say, then, to all gentlemen, that every man who on this floor or elsewhere advocates the right of acquisition, concedes the right to govern, and whether sustained by the constitution or not, he admits that right on the part of the United States. Without dwelling longer, however on this subject, for I have said enough I believe, to make myself understood, and that is all I desire, I say in answer to the main argument urged here, that the right of sovereignty implies the right to regulate property; that the conclusion is undeniable, and that sovereignty without the right to regulate property, is a thing wholly unheard of in the history of political society. It is one of the very attributes of sovereignty to regulate, determine, and settle by suitable rules and provisions the title of property of all sorts, and to manage it as the public good and the existing exigencies of the country shall demand, both as respects the public morals and the private rights of citizens. It is on this basis that we have governed Louisiana, Florida, and Missouri, and all the territories which are obtained by these two purchases. When we became the purchasers of these territories, we pushed ourselves out to sea beyond the soundings of the constitution—beyond its bounds and limits. We must; that we then went to other sources of power and authority unknown to the consti ution. It proves to be an easy thing to acquire because money brings the acquisition. But when we come to the division of the spoils—when we come to great questions of political power and to the compromises of the constitution which are liable to be affected by these acquisitions—questions of greater difficulty, more abstruse in their character and more complicated present themselves. Great minds have been turned to this subject. An inquiry has been made in the course of this debate by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] and other gentlemen as to the measure of this power. The gentlemen turn over the leaves of the constitution and find no warrant for this proceeding there, and according to some opinions which I have seen in the newspapers, they reach the conclusion that Congress has no power over the subject because it is not written down in the constitution. But it is quite as easy in the day for men who have advocated acquisition, to turn round and say that the constitution confers no power of government over acquired territories; and the distinguished Senator from South Carolina felt the pressure of this difficulty. He took the ground—assumed I believe by the supreme court—that the power to govern was a necessary incident of the power to acquire. But the Senator says that it is not an absolute power. I concede that in certain aspects of this question. If, for instance, he means by it that the United States have no power to establish a despotism there, I concede that he is substantially right in principle, for we ought to exercise the power in conformity with the fundamental principles of the constitution. But will the Senator inform me where the boundaries of that power are laid down, or by what authority he asserts that we have no right to touch the question of slavery? Does he find any warrant in the constitution for that assertion? Does he find any foundation for it in principle? It is just as easy for the Senator from South Carolina to prove that there is no right, power or authority in the legislature of a territory or in Congress which is the same thing—for the territorial legislature derives its power from the latter—he can just as easily prove that neither possess any authority to regulate any kind of property. What is it that the slaveholder considers valuable? This right of property and nothing else. It is this right to the service which is characterized, I believe in all the slave States, as a right of property. That is the thing which he appreciates—which he esteems of value and importance. On what authority, then, can any gentleman deny the right to regulate this property any more than he can deny the right to regulate other property? You might just as well undertake to prove that the territorial legislature has no power to suppress the sale of lottery tickets or to suppress gambling, or to prevent the sale of obscene books and prints, or any other thing in the nature of property which is held to be offensive to good morals. I hold that property in slavery—if it be property, and I am willing to concede that it is, for the purposes of the argument in order to meet it fully—is no way distinguishable from any other property. Now, I go further. I maintain that Congress has regulated and controlled this property at all times. This is a fact, neither obscure nor doubtful in the history of the country. Slavery existed in Louisiana and Florida when the United States became the purchaser of these provinces. When the United States obtained possession of the sovereignty of those territories, the property in vacant lands was a very subordinate consideration. The great object was to obtain the right to govern the country. Now I undertake to say that the United States have so used that sovereignty by legislation of their own, or that of the governments established by them in the territories, that slavery has been maintained there by the power and will of this government alone; unless slavery can exist independently of law, and without authority and countenance from the existing government, which is absurd. It is wholly unnecessary for me to go into the history of this legislation. Every gentleman understands, I think, this position.

But I go still farther. I hold that while these territories have been brought in without any grant or provision in the constitution authorizing it, Congress has imposed upon them, by its own legislation, the laws inhibiting slave trade with places out of the United States. The United States, therefore, have exercised this control over slavery in every way; and if they have the power to suppress and maintain it—which I contend they have exercised just as effectually in the territories as they have in the District of Columbia—who can, with this fact staring him in the face, rise up and say that Congress has no power over slavery in the territories? Slavery, in the States, is quite a different thing. I have often said here—and now repeat it, that I may not be misunderstood—that Congress has no power to interfere with the institution in the States. Now, slavery is not the natural condition of man. No man becomes a slave, except contrary to his will, by and under some authority, which is called law, or by force of physical power. Slavery, unless it can make a law, and support and sustain itself, exists and has existed, and been sustained in these territories by the United States. If, then, they can create or sustain it, they can abolish it, unless prohibited by the constitution. The one power implies the other. I do not contend that it should be exercised without a suitable and proper limitation. Here, as every where else, I would observe the provisions of the constitution, and if private property be taken, make a suitable indemnity. Without pursuing this matter farther, I may remark that a vague idea has been thrown out that slaveholders may enter with their slaves any free territory. It has been said that they carry with them the right to maintain and enjoy their property. It is somewhat difficult for me to comprehend how this could be brought about—how a slave-holder, removing from the State of Virginia into the territory of Oregon, comes clothed with power and authority in his own person, to maintain the same right to that property in the territory of Oregon, which he enjoyed in the State of Virginia. If I rightly understand the argument—and if I do not I hope I may be corrected—it has been contended that he carries the laws of the State with him, by virtue of the co-equality which exists among the States of this Union. That is the principle on which the agreement is said to stand. Now, has it not been already sufficiently answered, when it is said that if you have thirty emigrants from the thirty different States of this Union, each carrying upon his own back the law which regulates property, every man would not only be his own lawyer, but an independent administrator of the law of the State from which he emigrated? Is not this preposterous? The very suggestion of it is a sufficient argument against the proposition. But if there be any such principle in the constitution as a co-equality of this character, I should like to be informed on what page it is to be found. I should be happy to see what is the tenor and phraseology of that clause of the constitution which embraces that idea. The argument proves too much. If it be a constitutional provision, it is binding through all time. upon every body; and if co-equality enables a man to take the privileges of property with him from one portion of the country to another, the argument proves more than those who use it intend. It would enable a slaveholder to go from Virginia to New York and maintain his right to slave property in defiance of the laws of that State. But it has been said that although there may not be any positive, absolute right on the part of slaveholders, derived from this source, yet considering the nature and character of our government, and the fundamental equality of our institutions, that there is a trust reposed in the United States, in execution of which they are bound to admit citizens migrating to a territory to the enjoyment of all the privileges of property which they possessed in the States from which they came. In my judgment, a more erroneous view of a legal trust could not be imagined. It has no analogy, whatever, to a trust in law. In the first place, this government is not the trustee of anybody. It is the agent of the people. The government is sent here—if I may be permitted to compare great things with small—to execute a power of attorney given to it by the people under the forms of the constitution. Government is here employed in executing the work of its principal. It can claim no right to hold anything here by virtue of its own authority. It exercises its power by virtue of the constitution solely as the agent of the people. All analogy fails, then, in every point of view. What right has any individual citizen of the United States to the public lands? What right has he to the income derivable from that source of revenue? Has he the slightest pecuniary interest in the matter? Not a particle. No more than he has in the buildings of this capitol. The public lands are public property, standing upon the same footing as this building, or a courthouse within any of the States. It is perfectly plain that no man can maintain a suit at law for any individual right, in property of this description. It is not, then, a question of property, but a question of sovereignty, and it is in no just sense of the term any more a trust than the ordinary power of legislation which we hold here to execute the business of the United States. It stands upon the same footing, and we sustain no other relation to these territories than that which we sustain to any of the property which comes under our control.

Now the owner and holder of slave property thinks himself entitled to extraordinary privileges. He says he has a right of property rising above the rights of other citizens. If he has anything peculiar which entitles him to consideration over others, I call upon those who maintain that opinion to adduce their authority. It is incumbent upon them to show from whence their right is derived. If they claim extraordinary privileges they should certainly show on what they are founded. They do not grow up of themselves. They do not exist without some authority, and it is surely, quite reasonable that these gentlemen should show us where that authority is to be found.

Without dwelling longer upon this branch of the subject, I think, I may say that the propositions upon which I have been commenting, as advanced upon the opposite side are wholly untenable. The reasoning upon which they are founded, to my mind, seems unsound and inconclusive; and the tendency of the whole argument is, if possible, to recall our minds to a very wide departure from the original basis upon which the constitution was placed. It seems to me that the ordinance of '87 was a very material portion of the case then taken into consideration—that in fact it constituted, it may so say, the corner stone of the basis upon which these compromises were made. How came it then, at this time of day that it is an insult to any portion of the country to propose the application of that principle to other territories of the United States. What is there to offend the judgment or delicacy of any man in a proposition of that character? We can perhaps estimate more correctly the force of this consideration if we turn our attention to the history of the period when the constitution was adopted. As I have said, at the time of the adoption of this ordinance, and the adoption of the constitution, there were six States in which slavery existed, and eight that were called free States. The ordinance provided for the admission of five new States to be carved out of the territory to which it applied. If we add Maine, it will make six new States that were to be admitted, making fourteen free States in all; and if we add to the slave making fourteen free States in all; and if we add to the slave States, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, making in all ten, that would complete the system anticipated by the framers of the constitution. Now let us pursue this subject a little further, and see how it would have stood in other particulars, if we had limited ourselves to the territory described in the treaty of 1783. The free States would have had in the House of Representatives one hundred and twenty-eight members and in the Senate twenty-eight members. The slave States would have had in the other House seventy-eight members—and in the other body, twenty. That is what the condition of things would have been if the compromises of the constitution in their application to the original territories of the United States had been carried out, and no new territory been added. How stands it now? Nothing appeals to us with more force, than facts, and in this case the facts are notorious. The free States have now one hundred and thirty members in the House of Representatives—a gain of two. The slave States have in that body ninety-one members—a gain with a much smaller capital at the start of thirteen. The free States will have, when Iowa is represented in the Senate, thirty members—a gain of two; the slave States have an equal number. Of representatives in this body—a gain of ten. Now, this has all grown out of disturbing the compromises of the constitution—of departing from the platform upon which the convention which framed the constitution stood. These are the circumstances and this the condition of the system under which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] exhorts us to stand still. Let us, says he, we want nothing—we ask nothing. Ah! and do you, indeed, want nothing, and ask nothing? Why! Do you not ask us to employ the treasure of this country in immense amounts; do you not ask us to pour out the blood of the country for the acquisition of territory? The whole resources of the republic have been devoted to this purpose. And when the acquisitions are made and the sovereignty acquired, gentlemen turn round and say, "stand still"—"be quiet"—"let the constitution make its own way"—knowing perfectly well that there is not a word said in the constitution upon the subject, in other words, the exhortation is, "let us work the matter in our own way—we understand the things—let us be a law to ourselves—let us regulate and maintain slavery as we think most expedient—and we will manage it to suit our own interests." This is a shrewd, politic course, and will no doubt find advocates.

This policy—dignified by a supposed connection with the great name of the constitution as a constitutional policy—has been most unequal. I speak of the stand-still policy—the let-alone policy. Suppose we continue it—where will it lead us? Nothing can demonstrate more conclusively than the facts which I have presented to the Senate, that if the territory be left open, it will be dotted all over with slaves. Gentlemen on the opposite side exclaim continually that Oregon is a region in which slavery cannot exist; and yet they contend for the privilege of carrying their slaves there. If left open to the introduction of slavery, what will be the probable result? When the territory becomes a State, the burden of slavery will become irrevocably fixed upon it, and in vain will it or any new State attempt to shake it off, however sincerely they may desire to free themselves from it. That will be the inevitable result of this stand-still policy—leaving the constitution to work its own way, when the constitution is silent upon the subject.

Now, I think that such an unequal distribution of political power as that which exists, was never anticipated by the framers of the constitution; and yet the free States are charged with bad faith. It is alleged, with the utmost gravity of countenance in the face of these facts, that the slave States alone have manifested fidelity to the compromises of the constitution. The free States charged with bad faith! Why, sir, have they not stood still and permitted millions upon millions of the public money to be applied to the purchase of territory that is now slave territory?

Mr. CALHOUN.—I am very unwilling to interrupt the Senator, whom I have heard with a great deal of pleasure, however much I disagree with several of his sentiments. I rise now only for the purpose of correcting one of his statements, in order that it may not go uncontradicted. The Senator has said, that after the formation of the constitution the free States and the slaveholding stood eight to six. But the Senator will recollect that Vermont came in after the formation of the constitution, and that Delaware, being regarded as a doubtful State—which, I am sure, every one will acknowledge—the free and slaveholding States then stood exactly in the same proportion. The Senate will also recollect that there was three times as much territory north of the Missouri line as there was south of it.

Mr. DAVIS.—I shall not trouble the Senate by going into any history of the annexation of Vermont. No doubt the Senator is correct. The argument which I have presented is not at all impaired; for Vermont then was an independent State, and no doubt could be entertained of her joining the confederacy.

I was remarking, when I was interrupted by the Senator, that the free States had seen the treasure of the country expended in a war for the acquisition of territory—they had seen millions of the public money thus expended—they had seen acquisitions made, including that of Texas, the whole benefit of which, so far as political power is concerned, accrued to the slave States; and yet they are accused of bad faith and with making war upon the rights and interests of the South.

The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] adverted to the Missouri compromise, and, according to my recollection, said that even the concession of a single new free State caused him to hang his head in shame. He seemed to regret that the policy had not been pushed so far as to exclude the free States from any participation whatever in the acquisition of new territory. What do we now see? Notwithstanding the compromise which was made on the admission of the State of Missouri, and which the honorable Senator from Virginia said he supposed had forever settled this whole matter, so that slavery was to be excluded above latitude 36° 30'; yet we are charged with bad faith when we resist its introduction above latitude 49°. All Oregon is far north of the compromise line, and a region in which it is admitted that slavery is not desirable, nay gentlemen say it cannot exist there, and yet the application of the ordinance of 1787 to it is most strenously resisted, as if it were a grievous wrong, worthy of agitating the public mind and disturbing the public tranquillity. Who is chargeable with bad faith in forcing slavery into this region if the compromise be applicable to it? But does the compromise of 36 30 apply to a country which we did not then possess—over which we had then no sovereignty? If it do, then the bad faith is not on our part.

I remember an occurrence in this chamber some years ago—and I dare say there are others within the range of my voice who recollect it also. There was a proposition to organize the territory of Iowa, now one of the members of this Union. It was opposed, and a resolution, which will no doubt be found on your Journal, was introduced by a gentleman representing the State of Alabama, proposing to make a perpetual grant of the whole territory north of Missouri to the Indian tribes, and to stop the progress of emigration west, at the bank of the Mississippi, and turn it southward, into the slave instead of the free territory. It must be in the recollection of many, that in the House of Representatives we have fought battle after battle upon this question in disposing of the Indians who were removed to the West. I bring no reproach against any body. I only state what is notorious, that there have been individuals of influence and high standing who have advocated the proposition to stop the current of emigration at the banks of the Mississippi, and to secure to the Indian tribes of this country the territory beyond; but measures of that sort have been unfortunly frustrated.

I am unwilling to go into this matter at greater length. The facts which I have stated speak for themselves; they tell the whole story; they explain what has been gained by the free States and what by the slave States; they make disclosures which will enable the public to form its own opinion. It is well that there should be a free discussion upon this subject—that opinions should be interchanged. Some gentlemen, indeed, deprecate this discussion; and I do not deny that some unpleasant agitation may attend it. It is well known that there are discontents. Gentlemen advert to them in some severity of language. They hear the distant murmuring of the thunder, and they seem to understand its meaning. They say, let it come—so I say, if they are unwise enough to make such an issue, and to place upon it the continuance of the union of the States. Yet there is nothing I should more deprecate than the dissolution of this Union. There is nothing that would grieve me more than to see any case occur which should be thought to justify so fatal a step. But if we cannot speak the truth, if we cannot discuss this subject fully without endangering the Union, then the Uniod is only a rope of sand. Let me say, if the constitution is made only for a part, and not for the whole country, or if it is to be administered so as to benefit one part alone, then, in my humble judgement, it is not worth preserving.

Let us pursue these results a little farther. The Senator from South Carolina says that there is a large vacant territory north of Missouri and west of Iowa. How large it may be I have not exactly ascertained; but I have never heard it spoken of as a territory of any considerable value or importance. Portions of it may be of some value, and may be capable at some day of being organized into a State or States. But unless I have been misinformed in regard to it, it is one of the last sections of the country that would be thought desirable for settlement. It is a broken region, destitute of wood and water, and generally unproductive soil.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Senator has been misinformed. The greater part of that territory is well watered. It is very far from being an arid region. It abounds with streams and innumerable lakes, and, if my information be correct, a very large portion of the country has a soil exceedingly fertile. If the Senator will look at the map he will find that there is a beautiful valley of upwards of two hundred miles in length, containing some of the best land in all those regions. But the decisive fact is the large Indian population which has found sustenance there.

Mr. DAVIS.—I do not profess to have very exact information, but I believe the general statement which I have made will be found to be correct. It is in the line of emigration and in a healthy climate, and yet is not sought by settlers. However it is not very material to the matter in hand. I will take the positive rather than the speculative—what is known rather than what is unknown. It is not difficult to imagine that a large country lying in that region may at some future day be peopled, and that States may possibly grow up there. But let us see what provision has been made to secure political power for the slave interests of this country. We need not inform the Senate that Texas is now a part and parcel of the United States, and that the resolutions by which Texas came into the Union provided that there may be four additional States carved out of that territory. Of these, not less than three must be slave States, and as the admission of the four depends upon the consent of Texas, I do not think it is very likely that any of them will come in other than slave States. Here, then, are four States expressly provided for in a country which is rapidly becoming peopled, and which will soon swell this Unions tional members. Texas was brought in for this avowed purpose. Gentlemen really seem to think that in all this there is no cause of complaint—that it is not only unjustifiable, but proof of bad faith, to make any complaint. Yet it is very well known that Texas, brought in, as she has been, for a specific purpose, has been the cause of the war with Mexico—that annexation was the cause of the waste of blood and treasure which has been witnessed within the last two years. But there are other consequences which some portions of the country feel deeply and more strongly even than that war. It was by the introduction of the representatives of Texas into this chamber that Congress, following out the policy of the President of the United States, was enabled to overturn the former financial system of the country—by repealing the beneficial and salutary act of 1842, that had received the sanction of the country, revived its credit, and caused the highest degree of prosperity. It was that addition to the forces of the administration which enabled them to pass the fiscal system of 1846. This is another of the results of the annexation of Texas. It is, then, remarkable that that portion of the country which complains of sectional legislation, should happen to be that very portion of the country which has received the benefit of all these acquisitions. Without dwelling more at large, as I might with great propriety do, upon this interesting aspect of the case, and the pernicious effect upon industrial pursuits, we naturally inquire, who has done this? Who has brought it about?—Who is responsible? I can say who has not brought it about, and who is not responsible. It has not been brought about by the Whigs upon this floor. In good faith they stood by their principles. They opposed the annexation of Texas until a compact was made against their will, and complied with on her part; but the united strength of the democracy of the South, with the aid of the democracy of the North, accomplished it. And gentlemen will permit me to say—and I mean it in no offensive sense—that that measure was accomplished under circumstances peculiar in their character. The annexation of Texas was pressed into the Presidential election, and carried through by the esprit du corps of party; and now another favorable moment for concession has arrived! The Senator from South Carolina, with characteristic frankness, avows that now, on the eve of a Presidential election, a favorable opportunity is afforded of settling this question—of turning the screw upon party men. Politicians, in their zeal for the success of a party candidate, are apt to forget the interests of the country, and such an occasion is deemed favorable to effect certain objects.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Senator entirely misapprehended the tenure of my remarks. He would scorn to resort to arts of that description.

Mr. DAVIS.—The Senator certainly contends that this is the time to make these concessions, and best knows his own motives, which I by no means question. I agree that the success that has heretofore attended this policy, might well astonish those who have achieved it. But are gentlemen not sensible that they have pushed this policy to such a degree of extravagance that it has alarmed the public mind? I think I hazard little in saying, that the day has gone by when this system is to be further pursued.

A DEMOCRATIC SENATOR.—It is too late.

Mr. DAVIS.—I thank my friend for the word; it is too late: nor does this conviction in the public mind grow out of a little heat which has been engendered, and will speedily die away. It is the result of the firm belief that the thing is wrong—that there has been a course of policy pursued which demands correction at the hand of Congress. I do not mean that we should retrace our steps by attempts to disannex, this would be idle, but that we are to guard the future. And let me tell the gentlemen that if the free States be denied their rights which belong to them, the difficulty will be fomented, and it is not for me to say where it will end. I do hope that this Union is near and dear to us all. I trust we are all fully sensible of our obligations to the benificent Providence who has bestowed upon this land an unparralled degree of prosperity and happiness, resulting by his blessing from the free institutions under which we live. It would be a melancholy result indeed, if the struggle for political power should lead to the forfeiture of all these blessings.

I have said little on the question directly before the Senate. My design was to limit myself to the general political aspect of the subject. There are other topics connected with it in a moral point of view, on which I might have dwelt with great propriety, but I must at this time forbear. Enough has been said to show that heretofore there has been a great inequality in the distribution of political power, and that there is an overwhelming conviction in the public mind of the necessity of a change, which shall restore the compromises of the constitution to their equilibrium. If gentlemen suppose that the free States can submit to the appropriation of additional territory to slavery, they are very much mistaken. They misapprehend the public temperament—the public feeling—the public disposition.

While I speak thus plainly and frankly, intending to give offence to no body, I may repeat what I have often declared, that I am entirely willing to abide by the compromises of the constitution, and leave slavery in the States to be managed by the States, without interference from this government. On the other hand, I have long since declared my sentiments in this chamber—and very distinctly at the two last sessions—that free soil ought not to be encumbered with slavery. Without going more at large into the reasons for that opinion, I am disposed to leave this subject to the judgment and good sense of the Senate and the country. But I do sincerely hope that gentlemen will ponder well upon this matter, before they proceed to force slavery into Oregon, or into any part or portion of the territory of the United States which is now free.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, expressed his desire to address the Senate, but as the hour was late, he gave way to a motion that the subject be passed over informally.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, took the floor, and it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed to Monday next.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JULY 10, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Winnebago county, Illinois, praying the abolition of slavery in the United States.

The motion to receive the petition being objected to, it was Ordered, That the motion lie on the table.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Amesbury and Salisbury, Massachusetts, praying a reduction of the rates of postage, and the discontinuance of the franking privilege; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. UPHAM presented a memorial of citizens of the United States, residing in Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia, praying the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government.

In presenting this petition, Mr. UPHAM took occasion to observe that he should ask a different reference of this petition to that which those of a like character had hitherto received. One of the chief objects in the purchase of this place was to establish a school for the promotion of agricultural science and its practical operation. While all other pursuits had been more or less encouraged and protected by government, that of agriculture, which sustains all others, had been neglected. It was time that this policy should be changed. It would appear from the census of 1840, in which for the first time there had ever been any attempt to show the number of persons employed in the various occupations of industry, that 3,619,751 were engaged in agriculture, while in manufactures and commerce there were only 909,356: navigating the ocean 56,021; navigating canals, lakes, and rivers, 33,076; mining 15,211; and learned professions 65,235. The same authority demonstrates the fact that four out of five of the working men of our republic are engaged in agriculture. On looking further into the last census it would be seen that the annual products of agriculture amount to $554,487,597; while the annual products of manufactures and commerce were only $319,557,310; mining $42,358,761; and forest and fisheries $28,831,068.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. NILES presented a petition of citizens of Brooklyn, New York, praying that Congress will withhold any appropriations for the purchase of certain grounds adjacent to the Navy Yard and Hospital in that place, which it is proposed to sell to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HANNEGAN presented the memorial of R. R. Gurley, praying that an appropriation may be made for the purchase of a collection made by George Catlin illustrative of the manners and customs of the North American Indians; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. RUSK presented the memorial of delegates from the Chickasaw nation of Indians, praying that the United States agency in that nation may not be discontinued; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a petition of citizens of York, Maine, praying a reduction of the rates of postage and the discontinuance of the franking privilege; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented the petition of delegates from the Creek nation of Indians praying that no change may be made in the United State's agency in that nation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of James Maglenen, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act for the relief of Russell Gros.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate, amended and disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill making appropriations for the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes; and

The question being taken upon agreeing to a motion made by Mr. ATHERTON, that the amendments be referred to the Committee on Finance, it was determined in the affirmative.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill, as in Committee of the Whole; and, no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

SIGNING OF A BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the following enrolled bill:

A bill to extend the provisions of the existing pension laws to enlisted men of the Ordnance corps of the United states army.

BRANCH MINT AT NEW YORK.

Mr. DIX rose to give notice that he would, at an early day, ask the Senate to take up a bill, in which those he represented felt a deep interest—he alluded to the bill for the establishment of a branch mint in the city of New York. He had introduced it at an early period of the session, and it had been reported, he believed, without amendment, by the Committee on Finance. His colleague, who felt the same interest in the subject with himself, had twice given notice, as a member of the Committee on Finance, that he would call it up after the Oregon bill should be disposed of. But the debate on this bill had been protracted, and was likely to continue, and he would, therefore, with the concurrence of his colleague, move that it be taken up during the morning hour—not to-day, but at an early day during the present week.

Mr. DICKINSON said the bill to establish a branch mint in the city of New York had been reported by him a few days since, from the Committee of Finance. A special order for its consideration was made at the time upon his motion, but had been overrode by other business. He had recently given notice that he would call it up as soon as the discussion upon the Oregon bill should terminate. But it was now apparent that the discussion upon that bill was not soon to end, and he concurred in the suggestion of his colleague that it should be taken up as morning business. It was demanded by the public exigency, and would give extensive business facilities to the community, and put in circulation a large amount of coin and bullion now lying idle in the banks or transferable only in large amounts or by weight.

THE AMISTAD CASE.

Mr. YULEE desired to know whether the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the President's annual message as relates to the Amistad case, were ready to report in relation thereto.

Mr. MANGUM replied that the Committee had had the subject under consideration, and would probably report in the course of a few days.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced the appointment of Mr. METCALFE, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, in pursuance of the order of the 6th instant, in the place of Mr. Crittenden, resigned.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HALE, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to discourage speculation in the public lands, and to open the same to actual settlers and cultivators; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent; and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in the Committee of the Whole, the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon:

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, addressed the Senate at length upon the subject. A report of the honorable Senator's speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. HUNTER obtained the floor.

Mr. HANNEGAN gave notice of an amendment to be offered by him; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave notice that he would modify the amendment heretofore submitted by him.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JULY 11, 1848.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution to inquire into the expediency of appointing ten or more additional cadets in the Military Academy.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Ambrose R. Davenport.

THE TEXAS NAVY.

Mr. RUSK moved that the prior orders be postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill to authorize the President to increase the naval establishment of the United States.

Mr. DICKINSON hoped the bill would not be taken up, as it would produce debate.

After some conversation, the motion to take up the bill was determined in the negative.

BRANCH MINT AT NEW YORK.

Mr. DICKINSON moved that the prior orders be postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill to establish a branch of the mint of the United States in the city of New York.

Mr. BADGER hoped this bill would not be taken up, for the reason that the Senate had refused to take up the Texas navy bill. It would produce debate, and it wanted but twenty-five minutes to the hour for taking up the special order.

Mr. DICKINSON urged the importance of speedy action on the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that his colleague [Mr. BUTLER] desired to be present when this bill was taken up; and, as he was now absent and engaged in one of the committee rooms, he hoped the motion would not be pressed now, and the bill could be taken up after the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] had delivered his remarks on the Oregon bill.

The motion to take up the bill was negatived. Ayes 17, Noes 19.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1849.

The question pending was upon agreeing to the second amendment proposed by the Committee of Finance, to strike out the 119th and 120th lines, on the 6th page, the appropriation for furnishing the Marine Hospital at New Orleans.

Mr. ATHERTON briefly stated the reasons which governed a majority of the committee in submitting this amendment, and was briefly replied to by Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana; when

On motion by Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the Territorial Government of Oregon.

Mr. HUNTER.—Mr. President: Nothing but a sense of duty could constrain me to speak on a subject which I approach with great reluctance. The topics involved are so nearly connected with the family peace, that I take no pleasure in their agitation and discussion. But this debate has been forced upon us without any agency on the part of the South. The Committee on Territories introduced a bill re-enacting a law passed by the so-called territorial government, which expressly excludes slavery from Oregon. The Senator from New Hampshire offered what is called the Wilmot proviso, and although it was withdrawn for a time, he has given notice that he would present it again. The whole discussion on the part of the non-slaveholding Senators has been of a character to press whatever was most exciting and dangerous on this question upon the deep and solemn consideration of the South. They have all told us that the slaveholder is to be excluded from participating in the benefits of settling a territory, won by the common blood and treasure of all the States of this confederacy. The free negro from our own States, the mendicant, the pauper, the felon, who is cast over from the shores of Europe, may inhabit it, but they exclude the son, if he be a slaveholder, of the sire whose bones are bleaching on the very soil which he contributed to win, at the expense of a life bravely lost to maintain the honor of his country's arms. The Senator from Connecticut told us, as I understood him, that it was a struggle for power, in which the majority must govern and the minority must yield. The Senator from Vermont characterized the assertion of an equal right on the part of the slaveholding States to settle and colonize this common territory, as an arrogant pretension. Surely, sir, these things are hard to be borne. The smallest spark of sympathetic feeling must enable one to see that such pretensions are, at least, calculated to stir the blood of every southern man. But, sir, I shall discuss this question dispassionately. I believe that truth is with us, and truth is always strongest when most calmly presented. If, in the course of this discussion, any rebellious feeling should struggle for utterance, I will endeavor to keep it down; and if it should at any time prove too strong for my control, something will be pardoned out of respect to the sources from which the sentiment springs.

Mr. President, this subject of the territories has been variously considered in the course of the discussion which has arisen upon it. But the main issues involved are, in whom or what body was reposed the power to govern them—under what limitations is this power to be exercised, and what are the rights of the several States, to be preserved and protected in the administration of this power?

When I remember the uniform course of precedents upon this subject, I am not a little surprised that the question should at this day be mooted, as to where is lodged the power of governing the territories of the United States. Congress has invariably prescribed the fundamental ordinance or quasi-constitution of the territorial government. It has introduced into these ordinances matters of mere municipal regulation, such as the course of descents and distribution, and in some cases reserved to itself expressly the right of vetoing the action of the territorial governments. In addition to this, it has been universally conceded as the right of the federal government to cede away the territory, with sovereignty and jurisdiction, to foreign state. Now, if the major includes the minor, the power which can prescribe a constitution and transfer the sovereignty and allegiance of the territory and its people, must surely include the right of governing both. But of late the power has been denied by some to Congress, because there was no express grant of it in the constitution, and it was alleged to be contrary to principle to imply it. Those who maintained that the power was expressly given in the clause of the constitution which provides that "Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property belonging to the United States," were met by arguments, in my opinion, convincing and sound. I agree with those who maintain that the right to govern the territories, is in Congress; but I do not concur with some of them who attempt to derive it from this clause. Upon that subject, I think the argument of the Senator from South Carolina was clear, conclusive, and demonstrative. I shall not repeat it, not only because he has exhausted that branch of the subject, but because it would be unnecessary for the purposes of my argument, as I shall endeavor to show that the power, no matter from whence it is derived, can only be exercised under certain limitations. The power, in my opinion, is implied, amongst other sources, as has been well said, from the right to acquire territory. If this right of acquisition is to be implied from the necessities of war and peace, or of making new States, over which subject Congress has power, this necessity of acquisition can only exist on account of some end to be secured after it is acquired. To effect these purposes and ends, the territory must be controlled and governed by those who acquired, or the very necessities which justified its acquisition could not be met. But there are other sources from which the implication is equally obvious.—There are two purposes for which the territory of the United States is plainly destined by the constitution—I will not say that they are the only ends for which it may be acquired—but they are the only uses specied in that instrument. I mean the disposition of the soil and the erection of new States. Now, the right of governing the territorty is necessary to the efficient exercise of both powers. If the soil is ours to be sold and settled, we must have the means of preventing trespasses and keeping the peace upon it. This right of property vested in the States would not be secure if they were dependent upon any other authority than an agency of their own, for the preservation of peace and order upon this domain. Counterfeiters, horse thieves, fugitives from justice, might collect in bands upon this territory, and there would exist no adequate power any where to restrain or reclaim them, unless the authority to do so existed in Congress. Without this power, we could not guarantee to the purchaser the use of the public domain after he had acquired it, and of course there would be no demand for the soil which we wished to sell. But there is another still more important purpose for which the territory of the United States is destined. I mean its settlement and erection into new States. To train up these infant communities under such institutions as may fit them to become members of our confederacy, is an object of the highest importance. To attain this great end, where could the power of governing be so well lodged as in Congress, the common agent of all the States? For these purposes, the maintenance of order and peace in the infant community is indispensable, and there is a point of time in its existence when Congress alone possesses the physical force to do it. There is, then, a point of time when Congress must govern this territory—when is it divested of this power? The constitution has specified one, and but one period. When the infant community arrives at its majority—when it is strong enough to assume the responsibilities of a sovereignty, and comes as a State into the confederacy. Here are three sources from which the power of Congress to govern the territory, as I think, may be clearly implied. I believe I might name others. But, it is said that no power so important can be derived to Congress by implication, and yet these very gentlemen, or most of them, maintain the existence of the power to acquire territory as implied from the war making or treaty-making powers. If they imply the right of acquiring territory from some necessity for its use, surely they must go further and imply the right of controlling and making that use of it after it is acquired. But are not gentlemen applying a strict rule of construction, fitting one class of cases to another, to which it is not so fully appropriate? When it is a question as to the distribution of power between the federal and State governments, then the implication must be strict and necessary, by which the former can claim a power not expressly granted by the constitution. Here, what is taken by the one is subtracted from the other, and this strict rule as to necessary implication is derived, not only from the nature of the parties to the contract, but from the express terms of the instrument, which declares all powers not granted to be reserved. But there is a class of cases arising out of powers which the States are forbidden to exercise, they being expressly given to the federal government alone. Such are the powers of making war and treaties; such, too, is the power of acquiring territory, for the States are prohibited from making war or treaties, from which that power is implied.

Here the rule of construction is not so strict; this implication need not be necessary, but under certain limitations may be one of convenience, fitness, and propriety. The limitations are, that Congress shall not assume obligations or exercise powers under their grants, express or implied, which are expressly prohibited to it by the constitution, or which would encroach upon rights reserved to the States or the people thereof. A trustee cannot imply a right to do what is expressly prohibited in the deed creating his powers, or what would defeat the great ends of the trusts declared in the instrument. The distribution of power between the State and federal government is vital to the body politic and essential to the scheme of American association. The power of making war and treaties was given to preserve the existence of this political organism, and must not be perverted to destroy it. To illustrate the rule and its limitations, Mr. President, let us take a recent instance. In our war with Mexico we established governments, collected revenues, and regulated municipal affairs in that country, by implication from the bare power, without regarding limitations which the constitution would have imposed upon that power at home. Then, it was no question of distribution between the State and federal governments, but as to a right which the States could not exercise and which the American people could not use at all, except through the federal government. But no one pretends that, under the war power, the federal government could exercise municipal functions in the States at home. So under the right to make treaties, power is implied liberally, but under the limitations which I have named before. We have reported to us now a bill to exercise jurisdiction in China, which to a certain extent has been ceded to us by the Emperor. It proposes to exercise this jurisdiction without regard to limitations imposed by the constitution at home, but as Chinese jurisdiction, acquired from them, and administered with a source of power to the principles of that empire. This implication of power is large and liberal, yet it may not be objectionable, as it subtracts nothing from the reserved rights of the States or their people. But none would contend that we could make a treaty which would enable us to pass an ex post facto law, or to meddle with the constitutions and powers of the States at home. Mr. President, I have been thus particular in entering upon this canon of construction in relation to implied powers, because the consideration of these distinctions is indispensable in settling much in our past transactions, and may bear upon much that is to come. These considerations bear decidedly upon the matter in hand, because I think they meet the objections of those who deny that a right to govern the territories cannot be implied by Congress at all. So far from this being a case in which Congress can claim no power by implication, it is one in which Congress may derive more largely from this source than if it were a question between the federal and State governments, because under the constitution it is a power which the latter cannot exercise at all.

But if the power does not exist in the Congress of the United States, in whom does it reside? Such a power must exist. At the time when the constitution was formed, the confederacy possessed territory. There was an obvious necessity that it should be governed. But we are told that it exists in the people of the territory. Does the constitution say any thing of the grant of such a power? Is it not an implied power? And how do they imply it? There are but two possible modes in which the people of the territories could derive it—either from the general right of man to self-government, the right of separate and distinct society, or by implication from the constitution of the United States. Can they derive it from the former, as a distinct and separate society? If they can, Congress has no right to extend over them its revenue laws, or exercise in relation to them any of the functions of government, until this self-existing, self-governing society shall have come in, and by its own voluntary act made itself a part of this confederacy. But no man who will look to the consequences of this doctrine, can seriously maintain it for a moment. I would state, with great deference, that gentlemen have been misled by a fancied analogy between the territorial and State governments—an idea that it was more harmonious and more consonant with the scheme of our confederacy, that Congress should exercise no more power over the territories than it exercised over the States, and that as to the residue, the people of the territory derived from this natural right of man to self-government, the right to exercise all the other functions of government. This is a mere gratuitous assumption. I might demand the proof and the reason for any such assertion, but I shall endeavor to do more than that. I think that I can demonstrate that it is an unconstitutional assumption. It is to be remarked that there is a class of restrictions imposed in the constitution upon the State governments, necessary for the whole scheme of American society, which apply in terms to the States and not to the territories. No State shall pass ex post facto laws without the consent of Congress. But there is no such restriction with regard to territories. The citizens of each State are secured in the ejoyment of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States. There is no such provision in relation to the territories. There is a whole class of restrictions and prohibitions, which I need not enumerate, applied in the constitution to the States, but not to the territories; and yet if it was assumed that that right of government existed in the territories, is it not obvious that these restrictions would have been extended to them? If this power of government exists in the territories, there is no constitutional obligation upon them to deliver up a fugitive from justice or labor. Nor do the guaranties in relation to republican government or domestic insurrection extend to them, although the latter is most indispensable for a sparse and weak people. Their power is greater than that of the States, and they would thus be allowed to derange the whole system of American organization. But this is not all. When we come to recognize the remarkable fact that none of these restrictions apply to territories, it follows that we must, by necessary and inevitable implication, repose the power in the Congress of the United States. We repose it in them because they are the agents of the States, and because under the letter and spirit of the constitution, they are governed by all of these limitations, which are restrictions as necessary for the government of the territories as of the States, and which would effect the same ends in the territories as are effected in the States. In that point of view it was unnecessary to introduce these express prohibitions, because they already existed as constitutional limitations upon the power of Congress to govern them. They were imposed upon State governments because they were separate and independent, but there was no necessity for introducing them in relation to territorial governments, dependent upon Congress.

But is this the only point of view in which the necessity of the implication that all power to govern these territories, rests in Congress, is rendered apparent? It must be recollected that the States cannot acquire territory—that the territory thus acquired is the joint property of all the States; and therefore by necessary implication the power of governing this property, which is to be used not only for the purpose of disposing of the soil, but for the formation of new States, should be reposed in that agency which acts for the States jointly. But if this power to govern the territories exists in Congress—as I maintain it does—the question presents itself, under what limitations that power is to be exercised? Is it a power unlimited and absolute? Can there be any power in Congress express or implied, which is absolute and unlimited? Is not each provision of the instrument be construed in connection with every other? Must we not here apply that rule of construction which makes the whole instrument consistent and harmonious, giving effect to each and every part; and if haply there should be an inevitable conflict between the grant of any one power and the residue, is it not obvious that the lesser intent must give way to the greater, and the particular provision be ruled by the general spirit of the whole instrument? But in relation to the exercise of any power, whether granted or implied, there is no gentlemen in this chamber, who would I think undertake to deny that in the exercise of it, Congress shall do none of the things actually prohibited. It cannot pass an ex post facto law, it cannot establish a religion, or create orders of nobility; and it will be conceded by all, that we cannot under pretence of exercising an acknowledged power, do anything which is expressly forbidden to be done. But I go farther. There is another limitation which is equally demonstrable, and that is a limitation derived from the spirit of the instrument, as positive and absolute as the limitation in those prohibitory clauses to which I have just referred. It is provided that Congress shall guarantee a republican form of government to the States. There is no such provision in relation to the territories, and yet is it not obvious that Congress is governed by the spirit of the instrument in relation to this matter, and that there is a constitutional obligation resting upon it, to guarantee a republican form of government to the territories as well as to the States? It does not expressly provide that the citizens of the States shall enjoy equal privileges and immunities in the territories, and yet does not every one feel and know that there is a constitutional obligation upon Congress to secure that to them? To suppose otherwise would be to suppose that they had the power by means of territorial government to defeat the whole end and intention of the instrument. There is another and still more important provision securing the equality of the States. Call upon any man who understands the theory of our government, and who has any experience in its workings, and ask him to name to you the grand cause of American progress and development, and he will tell you that it is to be found in the equality of the citizens and of the States. It is thus that the door of competition is opened to all. Every man has an equal chance in the struggle for wealth, honor, and the rewards of society, and each State has an equal right to participate in the benefits of the federal government. We make success the reward of merit, and merit consists in the possession of those qualities necessary under a system of free and universal competition in order to attain success. We thus afford the highest possible stimulus to individual and State organizations for the cultivation of those qualities necessary to the progress of the people; thus too we secure the harmony of the confederacy by the very means which foster a high and generous spirit of emulation amongst individuals and States in the general and equal competition for high rewards which must be deserved to be won. Change these great features and you make a revolution as complete and entire in this system of American society as if you were to say that the President and members of this body should hold office, not for a limited period, but for life. Neither of these changes would work a more entire revolution than would the destruction of this principle of equality of the citizens and of the States. Here lies the whole secret of our progress. Destroy the one and you put an end to the other. That this is the leading and cardinal feature in the construction of the American confederacy, we derive from every source to which we may refer. We derive it not only from that doctrine of national law and common sense which makes a confederacy of sovereignties, a confederacy of equals, but from the constitution itself. Open this instrument any where, and you find abundant evidence of the equality of the States. What are the ends sought in the formation of this instrument, as given in the preamble?

"To form a more perfect union, to establish justice, to insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare."

How are these ends to be so well secured as by preserving the equality of the citizens and the States? In the enumeration of the powers given to Congress, how does the list commence? Congress are authorized to lay duties, &c. For what purpose? To pay the debt and to provide for the common defence and the general welfare. How can you provide for the general welfare unless you make equality the rule? Let any man reflect upon it, and he will perceive that there is no other rule by which this provision can be carried out. Contrive any scheme of universal benefit and you will find it must be equal. I mean not absolute equality, but the equality of proportion. But this is not all. It is provided that all taxes shall be uniform, and that the laws of bankruptcy and naturalization shall be uniform. It is provided that no preference shall be given to ports in one State over those of another; that the citizens of all the States shall have the privileges of the citizens of each; and in order to insure this equality, the State governments themselves are hedged about by prohibitions. They are not allowed to make treaties, because in that way some might gain the advantage over others. They are not allowed to lay duties, because the benefits of commerce might thus be unequally conferred upon the States. Turn where you will, you find the constitution filled with provisions to secure this equality, and there is one remarkable instance in which it is clearly proved that the constitution contemplated the States as equal. We all know that when an election by the people forthe Presidency fails, it is to be made by Congress, whose sense is taken by States, and by the very provision of the constitution these States are made equal, so that Delaware is as influential as New York or Pennsylvania.

If this equality among the States is a fundamental principle essential to the well-being and existence of American society as it was organized under the constitution, I ask if we are not bound in the exercise of every power, whether granted or implied, to administer it with reference to those limitations? The highest of all obligations upon government, is that of avoiding all acts which would change the organic structure and impair the vital functions of the society which entrusts it with power for purposes not of destruction, but of preservation. It is the obligation of the nurse not to destroy the child. I ask if we are not especially bound thus to act when we come to this question of the organization of territorial governments, when it is remembered that the people of the States cannot acquire territory in severalty but must take it jointly. Who doubts that in the disposition of the money arising from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, an equal distribution is to be made? I did hear it stated on the other side, that Congress possesses the power to dispose of the property unequally; but no one who considers this proposition attentively for a moment, can, I think, maintain it; because to maintain that there was an absolute power to dispose of these proceeds, would be to make all the limitations of the constitution actually worthless.

If Congress has an absolute power of disposing of the proceeds of the sales of public property to that extent, it may do whatever can be effected by money; not only to that extent, but to the measure of the whole public treasure; for it may convert the money derived from taxation into property, and when that is again reconverted into money, the former restrictions as to its appropriation no longer apply. The reservations of the constitution to the States and its limitations upon federal authority, no longer apply to the appropriating power, and are utterly useless. But who can seriously contend for a proposition which leads to such startling consequences. So long as it is a mere question of money it will be almost universally admitted that the appropriation of the proceeds of the public property must be made under all the limitations express and implied of the constitution. To show how deeply this sentiment of the equality of the States has entered into the hearts of our people, I would appeal to every one here if he would not feel it as a flagrant violation of right if these proceeds of the public lands were given only to part of the States, or if they were unequally distributed amongst them. I mean, as I said before, the equality of proportion not absolute equality. It is in relation to that other end to which territory is applied, the erection of new States, and their preparatory settlement and colonization, that the equality of the rights of the States is most important, and is most disputed. This right of colonizing and settling vacant territory is the highest and most important of all that arise out of such possessions. To find a convenient and easy outlet for the excess or discontented portion of the population, is an object of the highest possible importance for every State. To plant this population in positions where they may grow from infancy into matured societies, and enter into the confederacy as individual and fitting associates, is to give our facilities for emigration a value and importance beyond any thing ever enjoyed by other nations.

How much have not these very opportunities added to the stability, harmony, and power of our confederacy? But this right, important to all, is most so to the slaveholding States. To deny it to them, and confine the slave population within its present boders, would be to deprive them of all chance of preserving weight enough in the confederacy to protect their rights under the constitution, whilst it would dangerously diminish the relative superiority of the white race at home—without an outlet for their redundant population, without the means of throwing off the dangerous and disaffected portions of society, in its growth, which is the vis medicatrix naturæ of our political system, and soon to be without any sensible weight in the government of the confederacy, what would be the ultimate condition of these States? No impartial man can consider these things without feeling that it is indispensable to the slaveholding States to maintain their equal right to plant, colonize, and settle the vacant territory of the confederacy. No just judgment, I think, can be pronounced upon the constitutional obligations of Congress which does not maintain as one of the highest, that of preserving to the States an equal participation in the benefits of settling and colonizing this common fund of the confederacy. It is, therefore, a high and positive duty of Congress to protect the property of those who move into the territory to settle it. The end of government is the protection of the rights of persons and property.

If the duty of governing these territories devolves upon Congress, the obligation also rests upon it to protect the property of those who go there to settle, occupy, and colonize it. But we have been told when pressing upon this obligation on the part of Congress, that it is asking too much; that it is asking the free States to participate in the establishment of slavery. But if the constitution imposed upon them that obligation, are we to be charged with asking too much, when we demand that the obligation should be fulfilled? If they aredissatisfied or tired with the bond let them say so. But if they mean to live under it, let them fulfil all the obligations which the instrument imposes upon them. Is it, in point of fact, however asking them to establish slavery in the territories? I maintain that it is not. The right of property in a slave is established in the slave State from which he comes. No man can dispute the right to property in slaves in the State of Virginia. It belongs to the supreme power of that State to say in what things property shall consist, and in what it shall not consist. It is one of the attributes of sovereignty, and if the State of Virginia so please that there shall be property in slaves in the State of Virginia, there is property in slaves; and when property once exists, it remains until it is divested either by the act of owner, the act of law, or the act of God. If the slave is freed when he is carried to England, it is not because the owner has no property in that slave, but because that is inflicted as a penalty on him for bringing the slave there. If you were to carry into the Slave States though any question arising out of slavery, in a contract made in a State where slavery existed, and raise the point whether there was property in the slave in a case belonging to the class in which the law of the place where the contract is made governs it, I undertake to say that that court would enforce the contract which depended upon the existence of that property. I undertake to say that they must do so, according to all principles of national law or deny the existence of sovereignty in that foreign State. If sovereignty exists it belongs to it to say in what property consists. Now if it could not be denied in Europe that property consists in slaves, it cannot a fortiori be denied in Massachusetts or Vermont, because the the existence of this property is recognized in the constitution. If a slave escapes to Vermont, that State is under an obligation to restore him to the owner. If an insurrection occurs in a southern State, all will admit, also, that there is a constitutional obligation resting on the goveanment to put it down. It is admitted, therefore, by the constitution that there is property in slaves, and if the slave be freed because his master carries him to to Vermont or Massachusetts, he was freed, not for the reason that there is no property in the slave, but because it is a penalty for carrying him there. If the slave owner carries his property to territory which is the joint property of all, shall he be divested of it as a penalty for going upon his own land? I do not mean to say that it is his separately or solely, but all of it is his jointly; and to divest him of that property for going there would be an act of practical abolition, which would be very little exceeded in its stretch of authority by an act for abolishing slavery in the States.

But I go further. If this property exists in the slave, and the owner is not divested of it by his own act, and he moves with it to his own land, it is not enough that Congress does not deprive him of it by law. I maintain that there is a positive duty to protect him in the possession and enjoyment of that property. It is the duty of Congress to govern that territory, and from this results the obligation to protect the rights of person and property. If Congress fail in doing that it fails of its duty, and would be universally so acknowledged if the case arose with reference to any other species of property than slaves. I maintain, therefore, that we do not call upon Congress to establish slavery, when we call upon them to protect us in the preservation of that which they recognize as property, and which, if no constitutional provision existed at all, they would be obliged to recognize as property as resulting according to the law of nations from the rights of the sovereignty which gave it that character, and from the nature of property itself. A right exists until a man is divested of it either by his own act or the act of law, and is it competent for this Congress to say that the man who moves from the slave States into this joint property, will be divested of his property as a penalty for going there? Has any portion of these joint owners a right to expel the others? If A, B, and C, purchase a common of pasture in joint tenantry; A being the owner of cows, B of sheep, and C of horses, would it be competent for those who moved the cows and horses to unite, and say to the owner of the sheep that he should not bring his stock upon the common. They knew beforehand that it was purchased for that very purpose. They knew that the pasture was purchased to be held in joint tenancy, and that each had a right to pasture upon the whole soil. Now, if they do justice, they must maintain equality and allow the right of each to pasture upon the whole, or make an equal division in severalty.

Another objection has been made in relation to our demand, that this right of governing territory shall be exercised under those limitations which establish the equality of the States. It is said that the good of the new States forbids it. We are told to look at the immense difference between the old and the new States. This is a question, sir, upon both sides of which much may be said. It is a question, in my humble opinion, to be determined by circumstances—by soil, climate, and a thousand things to which I cannot now advert. But I do not choose to go into that enquiry, as it does not affect the purpose of my argument. These provisions in relation to the establishment of new States were intended for the benefit of the old. The old States have certain rights, in relation to this matter, under the constitution, and you are not to disregard the obligations and duties which you owe to them, for the imaginary good of some unborn people, who at some future time may occupy a distant land with which we are not even acquainted. But even if it would be better for them, you have no right to trample upon our rights, and disregard your obligations, imposed by the constitution, in order to benefit them at our expense. Mr. President, suppose we were to make my view of the case—and exercise this power under the limitations which I have endeavored to establish as clearly to be derived from the spirit and meaning of the constitution itself—I beg to know the effect? Suppose you allowed all the States to colonize this territory at their pleasure; what would be the result? Would it not result in the harmony and prosperity of the confederacy? Would it not result in the improved happiness of the negro race? Should we not see the tide of black population, following the natural law of colonization, and settling by degrees towards the line, at each step of its progress attaining a clime more and more congenial to negro nature? Would we not then see old territory made free, as new regions become occupied by slaves, to be reduced in their turn to the uses of civilization and humanity? And perhaps amongst the inscrutable purposes of Providence, there may be a design thus without shock—without disunion—without injury to any one, to educate and cultivate this race under the dominion of the white man, so that one day they may reach a clime and country fitted for them, around the shores of Mexico, some portion of which it may be their ultimate destiny to hold, govern, and enjoy. I know not what is to happen in the future, but I say that if there be any one of those schemes which look to the advancement and benefit of the negro race that is plausible, this seems to me the most practical of all that have been named. And what would be the effects upon the non-slaveholding States? Why, does any one believe that it would diminish their political superiority, or affect their power in this Union? They already have superior power and they must retain it. When we look to the population of the United States we know that the free States must be predominant. The annual increase by emigration alone is greater than the increase of the colored population in the slaveholding States. That question of power was settled when the provision was introduced into the constitution, prohibiting the importation of slaves. When you prohibited the importation to one, and opened the doors wide to the other, you settled the question of power, and settled it irretrievably. The whole effect of permitting our people to migrate with their slaves where they choose, would be, not to raise us even to an equal strength, but give us some little temporary addition to our political power, and teach us to feel that we were received and treated in this Union as equals and confederates. Is there anything so dangerous in that? Is there anything in the past history of the Union to make such a result dreaded? I ask if this institution has not been the balance wheel of this confederacy—the conservative element, if I may so speak, between the extremes of federalism and democracy? Who led the war in opposition to that system of banks, tariffs, and monopoly, which proposed an unjust distribution, as we believe, of the profits of production as between capital and labor? Was it not the South—the southern democracy? And from what portion of the confederacy would we soonest expect to see resistance to any of those extremes into which, at times, all parties may be hurried by a lust of conquest, or an appetite for war? Would it not be from the representatives of the South? The organization of society at the South naturally exerts a conservative influence. The southern slaveholder represents fairly both capital and labor, because he owns both, and interest makes him impartial and conservative in disputes between the two. The slaveholder, without any superiority in wisdom, or patriotism, may thus exercise a conservative influence from his position in regard to those two great elements of society. The history of our country has proved the truth of these positions, for the influence of the slaveholder has been eminently conservative not only of progress, but of the limitations indispensable to its steadiness and the order of society. I am told that the gentleman from New York said it must be admitted that the non-slaveholding States are the most republican.

Mr. DIX.—(In his seat, was understood to say,)—I did not express such an opinion.

Mr. HUNTER.—I am glad to hear it. I ask, then, is there any danger to this confederacy in permitting the southern States to retain their present relative strength, when it is remembered too, that it is less than that of the non-slaveholding States? The Senator from Massachusetts said that the slave States had grown relatively weaker than the free. Is it not obvious that he was mistaken? Is not the relative power of the non-slaveholding States greater at this day in the House of Representatives than when the constitution was formed? No man can doubt it.* Let him look to the future—let him look to the new territories and States which have been brought into this confederacy, and is it not obvious that the non-slaveholding States possess an increasing superiority? Let him look to the sources from which our population must be derived—to the fact that emigration alone furnishes a larger edition to the white race than the annual increase of the negroes. Let it be remembered, too, that at the last census the whites stood to the slaves nearly as 14 to 2.5, or as 28 to 5, so that the additions by increase from this source must be as 5 or 6 to 1 in favor of the whites. Who in his senses then can pretend to believe that the southern States will acquire superior power in this confederacy? No, sir, no! That can never be our lot; we know it and acknowledge it. If you were to permit us to live in this confederacy hereafter as we have lived heretofore, as your equals and brethren, the whole result would be, not to change to any sensible extent the relative degree of power possessed by the two sections of the Union, but to secure to you the united exertions of all for the good of all. You would then have an harmonious, prosperous and happy confederacy. Who could then undertake to assign the limits to our future progress, if we thus moved on devoid of sectional jealousies and hostilities. Imagination halts at the attempt to conceive it. It is not for my pencil to make the effort to paint such a future.

But suppose we take the other course, and declare that the slaveholding States are not to be treated as equals and confederates in this Union. Suppose we brand them with the badge of inferiority, and deny them a participation in equal rights where those rights are not merely important, but essential to their very prosperity and existence. Suppose you thus introduce this principle of inequality and thus brand them as inferior, I ask, if you have not virtually dissolved the Union? You have destroyed that spirit upon which it depends for existence. The southern States might nominally remain within the Union, apparently bound by its forms, but in spirit and in truth, they would be out of it, and you would have revolutionized the whole system of American society. The prosperity and happiness of the confederacy would have been blasted forever. If they consented to remain in the Union, what part would they play in the government? The slaveholding members would be bound with hooks of steel to one another as a band of brothers on this slavery question. They would throw all other issues to the dogs, and unite with minorities in the free States on whatever question would afford the best protection to this vital interest. They would, in order to secure themselves on this question by the aid of these minorities, effect results repugnant to you all. Thus the government, instead of being administered for the general prosperity and the welfare of all, would be converted into an instrument of mutual offence and hostility. But it may be said that the free States would bind themselves together, and become united on that question of slavery. Suppose they did; what would be the effect? It would lead to new insults—new oppression—new injuries. All considerations of the general interest would be sacrificed and merged in the spirit of hate, which would be inevitably engendered by this civil war, to be carried on not with arms, but under the forms of law. Suppose the South submitted to this treatment from day to day, what would follow? Its spirit would be worn down by constant submission to insult and injury. The security of its property would be destroyed—its domestic peace invaded, and eventually the right of the slaveholder to participate in the honors or administration of the government would be denied. Is it to be supposed that the white man would be content to remain there as an inferior and degraded being? By merely leaving the country in which he was reduced to the level of his own slaves, he could go into a State where he would be received as an equal, and as one of the governing race? Sir, he would abandon the soil—he would leave the graves and the homestead of his forefathers, to preserve the rights and liberties of his children; and what would be the end of it all? You would have the West India experiment re-enacted. You would erase that picture of life and progress in which we now rejoice, and substitute for it the dreary blank of barbarian waste. The wilderness would encroach upon the area of cultivation, and the negroes relapse into their original state of barbarism. Night and chaos would resume that reign which seems to be so congenial with African sloth and ignorance. Is this a consummation to be desired by modern philanthropy?—Alaric, the Goth, and Attila, the Hun, trampled down the flowers and fruits of an old civilization, but they left behind them the germ of another, which promised a more vigorous growth. If they felled the very tree of knowledge, of good and evil, in the gardens of Roman and Grecian culture, they engrafted in its root a wild scion, with higher powers of development, and destined to expand to loftier proportions than the stock whose place it was to supply. If the Goth and the Hun uprooted, they also planted—if they destroyed one system, they laid the foundation of another, which was destined to become a better. But the strange achievement which modern philanthropy proposes for itself, will leave no such hope behind it when its work of destruction shall have been accomplished. Nor can such an achievement find a historic parallel, except the one in minature, which has been recently presented in the West India Islands. If we seek for another, we must leave the realms of history for those of fiction. We must turn to the gloomiest conception of Milton, who makes his Satan address "old night and chaos," and promise to extend their reign at the expense of light and life:

* If we reckon Delaware as neutral so far as the political differences between the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States are concerned, and leave it out of the calculation, we shall find that in the first Congress under the present constitution, the northern members in the House of Representatives stood to the southern as 30 to 24, the present proportion is as 136 to 87, showing the non-slaveholding representation in the House stood nearly as 44 to 46; now as eleven 60 to 39, which shows a large relative increase of the political power of the former.

> "Once more
> Erect the standard there of ancient night,
> Yours be the advantage all, mine the revenge."

Sir, I would ask any enlightened man in the non-slaveholding States, appealing not merely to his feelings of philanthropy, but of self-interest, to say if these are the results which he would be willing to bring upon the South? If he would not, let him remember that they are the inevitable results of the proposed system of assault not only upon the slave States, but upon the constitution. Let him not forget either that these measures are traced to their consequences upon the supposition that they could carry out all these purposes, and regulate this government at will, without any breach of the Union. But can it be imagined that the southern States could submit to a long system of such insults and oppressions? Why should they? Look to the elements of social strength and greatness already existing on the slaveholding States. If they submitted, it would not be for want of strength enough to ensure domestic peace, and secure themselves against aggression from without. But, sir, does any man believe that the southern slaveholder would fold his arms in mute submission to a system of oppression which day by day wasted his spirit, wounded his self-respect, and robbed him of his rights? Would he quietly submit to all this for the sake of union with those who were placing himself and his children in a situation worse than that of their slaves—a condition in which they had all the responsibilities but none of the rights of freemen? Would he in patience possess him of his soul in reverence for those bonds which bound him to behold his domestic altars wrapped in flames, and the midnight assassin entering to slake the ashes on his hearthstone with the best and dearest blood of the household? If he did, sir, I can only say that he would richly merit the fate that would meet him, and deserve the worst of all the sufferings with which his heart would eventually be wrung. But I beg pardon for the feeling which I have manifested; its expression escaped me under the strong impression of the moment. The State which I have the honor in part to represent, puts no words of taunt or menace in my mouth. She has not anticipated the necessity of ever being brought to calculate the consequences of such a course of action as I have supposed. She cannot permit herself to believe that her non-slaveholding confederates would so far forget old associations—the constitution and a thousand obligations, as to attempt, wilfully and willingly, to impose upon her a position of inferiority. Why should an American Congress hesitate between such alternatives as are presented? On the one side, we see nothing but harmony, union, prosperity, the united exertions of all for the good of all. On the other, we see bickerings, discord—the wreck of all our hopes—perhaps, of the Union itself. Can it be possible that we would blast the glorious prospect which opens before us, with which we seem to sport as a child with his toy, to be preserved or broken, as either will contribute most to his amusement? There is nothing that can explain it, except that cabalistic word, "slavery." When that word is uttered it seems that we are to forget all the obligations of the constitution—all the duties of partners of confederates and friends. Alas! when the philosopher in his closet—when the dreaming enthusiast—from whose pen abstractions seem to ooze without difficulty—traces them in ink, he little sees that hereafter they are to be graved by steel in characters of blood. He little knows that he is sowing the dragon's teeth which are one day to spring up as armed men. He does not foresee that the questions which he is preparing as "puzzles of the brain," are hereafter to come up in the shape of revolutionary issues, to be decided by the "trial by battle," by armed men upon horseback. Perhaps, if he did, he would be somewhat more cautious in the coinage of those abstractions. He would weigh more carefully, and limit more considerately, the sentiments which he thus throws before the world.

Sir, what is slavery? Solve me that problem, and, rash as the promise may appear, I think I might undertake to say, that I will reduce all the books on political science to the dimensions of a simple primer. What is slavery? Will any gentleman here define it; and after he shall have done so, let him see if he cannot find an application for his definition some where at home? Does slavery consist in the control which man exercises over man? In what clime or age of the earth has the nation been found in which there have not been multiplied instances of such control? Or shall we be told that slavery does not consist in the fact of this control, but in the degree of it? Then define to me the limits within which this control is compatible with freedom, and beyond which it becomes slavery; and when you have pointed out those limits, see if you do not find some where at home an application for your new definition. In what country do we not find the old primitive legalized government of parent over child? Is that not often a control as absolute—as despotic, as that of the master over the slave? But shall we be told that this is absolutely necessary for the good of society, and that the child is protected by those natural affections, which, like so many guardian angels, spring up in its presence? I reply: Is it not also for the good of society—if you place two races side by side, widely different in intelligence, and separated by marked distinctions in color—that the superior should control the inferior? When two races are separated by natural characteristics so deep and strong that it is impossible to amalgamate them, is it not necessary for the good of society that the interior race shall be ruled by the superior? Nay, I go further: Establish what laws you will, you cannot prevent it. You cannot prevent the inferior from being virtually enslaved either as a class or as individuals. And have we not in favor of the form of individual slavery the affections which spring up between the master and slave, not as strong as in the parent's bosom, but still strong enough to afford him much of sympathy and protection?—In what civilized—in what Christian country, do we not find paupers, and paupers subjected to the control of their managers to an extent fully equal to that exercised by the master over his slave? Look to England, the great focus of abolition excitement, with her legions of paupers, and show me the practical difference between their condition and that of the slaves; nay, is not the difference in favor of the slave? Shall we be told that the good of society requires that when the pauper comes for his portion of the common stock, he must submit to those regulations which are necessary to secure the faithful distribution of this charity? I admit it; but does not the same argument apply when you come to this question of the two races, side by side, one being superior to the other? If the stronger race permit the weaker to sit down by its side, to share the benefits of that society and the fruits of the soil, are they not authorized to impose conditions, not harder certainly than those imposed upon the pauper? But does not the good of the two races require the imposition of those conditions? If the arrangement is justifiable and expedient in the one case, why not in the other?

But, again, is there any civilized country in which we do not find involuntary servitude for crime? The good of society requires that condition of servitude as we are told, and we must confine them to preserve the peace of the community. Well, does not the good of society demand that when two such races come together, as are found side by side with us, that the weaker should be reduced to the position of the stronger? Does not the peace of our society imperatively demand it? I appeal to all experience if it be not so? Wherever you place one of these black races beside a stronger, whether it be the white or even the Malay, the colored race has been enslaved; and the proposition is as true in New Zealand as in the West Indies or the southern States of this Union. But of all the power exercised by man over man, the most despotic will which I am acquainted is that possessed by him who controls the entire means of subsistence of another, on whom he himself depends for nothing. Here is a source of positive power and more absolute control than the master exercises over his slave.—Do we see nothing of this in the free States of this Union, where this agitation on the subject of slavery is conducted so fiercely? Do we see nothing of it in Europe? We have it from their own authorities. Dr. Arnold, an intelligent, candid, and experienced observer, declares in more than one of his letters towards the close of his life, that the condition of these "railway navigators," as he calls them, and of the operatives in factories, was worse than that of West India slavery. If any man doubts it, let him take up the accounts of a French traveller in Leeds, Birmingham, and Manchester, in a series of letters which appeared in one of the French reviews, the "Revue de deux Mondes," some year or two since; in which you have a description of society in those places. In consequence of the improvements in machinery, and the superior suppleness of the limb of the child, the natural order is reversed and the youthful members of the family become, not only independent, but the most important individuals in it. As the necessary consequence of this revolution in the paternal or household government, we ought not to be surprised to find overthrown all those barriers between age and sex, which were designed to preserve the very decencies of life.

Take the pictures drawn in these letters, or in any other accurate description of life in those crowded manufacturing cities, and you will find accounts of infant and adult depravity at which the blood runs cold. You will find, too, pictures not merely of crime, but of destitution and suffering, and the subjection not only of man to man, but of man to whatever is most brutalizing, in dependence and sin, which startle the more by the depth of their contrast with scenes amongst the more favored classes. Now, all of this is not inevitable—much of it is occasioned by law, and ought to be removed by government: but, when that is done, much of the misery and dependence must remain in very crowded populations. Is it surprising, with such spectacles as these before the public that the doctrines of communism should find a footing amongst the laboring classes? It is not so very wonderful that labor unanimated by wages should have been treated as modified slavery, and that government should be called on to distribute the proceeds of production between capital and labor. What is the answer to these appeals? That the laborer would suffer even more than the capitalist by such attempts at reform—that it would diminish production, and reduce the condition of the laborer still lower by lessening, or perhaps destroying, the stock from which his subsistence is to come. He is told that the evil is confessed, but the proposed remedy is unwise, and he is left dependent still upon him who gives him employment and bread—who can say to him live or die. Now, sir, I do not mention these things by way of reproach or complaint. I am only remarking upon facts, not attacking the institutions of others. I will only say, by the way, that this spectacle of a man willing to work and dying, for want of bread, is not to be found in the slaveholding States. It is not there that you > "See yonder poor o'erlabored wight,

> So abject, mean, and vile,
> Who begs his brother of the earth
> To give him leave to toil."

On the contrary, the subsistence and protection of the slave, from the cradle to the grave, is secured to him by positive legislation, by public enactment, and last, but not least, by private affection. But, as I said before, I do not advert to these things by way of reproach to other States or nations. I point out the existence of these things to show evils amongst themselves of precisely the same character with those which they complain of so much in us. I do not see that they upheave the pillars of State or dissolve the fabric of society in vain, or, indeed, in any, attempts to remedy these grievances at home. Why, then, disturb us with agitations attempts to remove inequalities amongst us which they do not interfere with at home. If the good of society requires them to tolerate this unequal condition of man at home, how much stronger is the argument to justify us when the question is between two such races as are found upon our soil? We claim nothing but the protection of their own argument. I, for one, do not reproach the governments of other States for the inequalities of human condition which exist under them if they have done all in their power and under existing circumstances to relieve them. The government which does the best which is compatible with the circumstances under which it acts, has done all that could be expected, and more than most of them effect. But if these inequalities still exist, and exist they will, I can only say, that such seems to me to have been the ordination of Providence. Why it should be so I know not—the finite cannot comprehend the infinite. But wherever I look on nature, whether to the vegetable or animal kingdoms, I find this eternal struggle between capacities of different extent and power of different degrees. The whole progress of organized life seems to consist in a series of victories achieved by the stronger over the weaker, whose places they take upon earth. In the forest, the stronger scions crowd out and overshadow more numerous germs, which spring up to decline, decay, and perish. Amongst herds of animals the stronger appropriates the larger share of the food designed for all, and appropriates it at the expense of the weaker. So of the races of man; the superior subdues or supplants the inferior. Amongst the members of the same race and society we see the most powerful commanding a larger share of the means of subsistence, and grow, whilst the weak decline. If our sympathies should follow the weak, who disappear, we cannot deny but that a stronger germ is planted in their place, and another advance is thus made in the progress of organized being and of human society. What is it that characterizes free governments, if it be not the equal and general competition for the rewards of society which it authorizes amongst its members. And what is this universal competition but a universal struggle between man and man—a struggle not of physical but moral force for mastery and power. It is true that social rewards in free governments are made to depend not upon law, but the merits of the aspirant. To succeed, he must have the qualities which command success; and these are the qualities of wisdom, of fortitude, of energy, and virtue. It is thus that the highest possible stimulus is given for the cultivation of those qualities which promote the prosperity and happiness of a people. It is thus that society advances most rapidly, but it by no means follows that the inequalities in human condition diminish with this advance. On the contrary, if you make a man's condition depend upon himself, you make as many differences in the condition as there are in the capacities of men. The nearest approach to absolute equality of condition of which I have seen any account is to be found in despotisms, where one is master and the residue slaves.

I speak, sir, of things as they are. I am not now dealing with imaginary schemes of government, or theories for human advancement, however wise and good those may be who have formed them. I am merely depicting things as they exist, for the purpose of showing our brethren who are disposed to interfere with us, that they have not taken the mote out of their own eye, before attempting to remove the beam from ours. I have shown then, that to some extent these inequalities in human condition are inevitable; and that no government can remove or destroy them. It is an ordinance of Providence, and we cannot control it. I am endeavoring to show them that this question of slavery must be viewed in connection with circumstances—that what is good in one condition of society, may not be appropriate in another—and that all stable and wise governments must consider these circumstances and conditions of society which modify and control particular institutions, before they undertake to interfere with them.

Let gentlemen look at home and weigh the consequences of pushing this agitation to its extreme. Let him ask himself what would be the consequences of destroying this condition of slavery, and leaving the two races side by side in the same country. I have admitted that the extension of an equal privilege of competition was a characteristic of free government and a benefit, but this last is true only of a homogeneous people, and not of a society including widely different races under the same bonds. In the latter case, the benefit ceases when the privilege is extended beyond the members of the superior and governing race. Suppose the door of competition open to the black as well as to the white, would not the former be trampled down and destroyed? Would they not be reduced to a condition infinitely worse than that in which they now exist? But why, I ask, why should there be any dread and hesitation, when these alternatives to which I have referred are presented to us; and when it is so easy to take that course which would lead to harmony, prosperity, and progress? Passion and prejudice, madness—if I may be pardoned for using the terms, may for the present rule the hour, so that reason may find no moment of calm to seek the response. But the day for that response must come. Mankind will demand of us to render up an account of that high trust of humanity and civilization, which was reposed in us, by the virtues of our forefathers and the blessings of Providence; and posterity will reckon with us for the loss of that inheritance which was given to us to be improved and transmitted to them. The future historian will record with shame and grief, that the half-raised column and the broken shaft are all that remains to commemmorate the unfinished achievements and abortive efforts of a people more richly endowed than any that have ever existed upon the earth.

Let gentlemen beware how they stimulate this agitation, for their are problems in political equations as troublesome of solution north of "Mason and Dixon's line," as any south of it! This agitation which you throw upon us, may return to you in the expansion of its circle, over the great wave of public opinion. The seeds of the thistle with which you sow over our fields, may be borne on unseen wings with the breath of public discussion and be planted in your own. The very mine which is so cunningly wrought to shake our social fabric from "turrit to foundation stone," in the reaction and vibration of its shock, may involve the ruin of your own. It is an evident truth that if this Union is to be dissolved, the injury will not be confined to one side. The mischiefs will be common to all. I can only hope that if this ruin come, the sin will not rest upon me or upon my father's house. The South will be clear of it. She has already sacrificed much to Union. She is willing to make fresh sacrifices if she can secure and preserve her equality. But she never will be willing to sacrifice the birth-right of her children, and thus reduce them to a condition worse than that of their own slaves—a condition in which, as I have said, they would be involved in all the responsibilities, without the rights of freemen.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following Message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

> MR. PRESIDENT: The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed two enrolled bills, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of their President.

SIGNING OF BILLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bill to amend an act, approved 24th of May, 1824, entitled "An act supplementary to an act," approved on the 3d day of March, 1819, entitled "An act providing for the correction of errors in making entries of land at the land offices."

Also, the enrolled bill to extend an act entitled "An act providing for the adjustment of all suspended pre-emption land claims in the several States and territories," 3d of August, 1846.

THE TEXAS NAVY.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize the President to increase the naval establishment of the United States.

Mr. BERRIEN opposed the bill, upon the ground that it would do injustice to gallant officers in the American navy, who would be overslaughed by these Texan officers, if the bill should become a law.

Mr. RUSK contended that the "injustice" in the case had been done to the officers in the navy of Texas, who had risked their lives in aiding that republic in securing their liberty and independence, and placing it in a condition to become a part of this Union. The bill proposed not to fill vacancies existing in the present navy, but to create additional offices, to be filled by these Texan officers. The necessity of an augmentation of the navy was apparent from the increasing extent of our sea coast.

Mr. BADGER observed, that a majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs were opposed to this bill becoming a law; but they had deemed it due to the honorable gentleman representing the State of Texas to bring the question before the Senate for their direct vote. His own opinion was, that the Senate owed it to the gentlemen engaged in the American navy to reject it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD considered the terms of the bill unconstitutional, inasmuch as it directed the President to appoint certain men to office, while the constitution provided that he should make appointments to fill those offices by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. RUSK contended that the power to re-instate the Texian officers in the ships of the American navy by the President was not unconstitutional. He was opposed to any exclusiveness in the navy. In time of war he would be in favor of drawing from the ranks of private life, such citizens as would be competent to discharge offices in the navy. Mr. R. cited from an act passed by Congress in September, 1789, in reference to the officers of the army, connecting as a precedent in favor of the constitutional power of the President to do justice to all the officers of the Texian navy.

Mr. CALHOUN advocated the passage of the bill, contending that it was constitutional, proper, and just, providing merely for the fulfilment of a stipulation made with Texas in the resolutions of annexation. Texas had always understood up to the present time that that stipulation would be strictly adhered to, and that if there was any foundation whatever for the constitutional objection raised by the gentleman from Kentucky, it would be an easy matter to remedy the difficulty. Mr. C. further spoke in commendation of the course of those of the American officers who preferred entering the service of Texas, and fighting for the cause of liberty, than remain in a state of inactivity in the American service. He said this without meaning the slightest disparagement towards those who chose rather to remain from motives doubtless of pure patriotism in the American service, although having the same opportunity as those others had of entering the Texian service.

Mr. BERRIEN considered that there could be no greater merit than that which accrued from remaining in the service of one's country and faithfully discharging all the necessary duties, no matter how irksome, in time of peace. The feeling which prompted men to abandon the flag of their country to enter a foreign service, in which they would receive more rapid promotion, was selfish, not patriotic. Those gentlemen who had remained in the service of the United States had had as much opportunity to have entered the Texian service as did these officers whose claims for offices in the American navy were now being pressed; but they had chosen rather to surrender the advantages which might result from such a change, and though men of enterprize and ambition, they had a love of country which forbade their abandoning the American flag. For the same reason he objected to discarding the just claims of his own countrymen in this matter, and giving the preference in promotion to those who were not more brave, or gallant, or patriotic, than those who remained at home. In regard to the case cited by the Senator from Texas, he thought there was no analogy between it and the one then under consideration. The case alluded to by the Senator from Texas was one in which the troops of the United States had been raised by the several States to share in the revolutionary struggle, after the war was over, in consequence of the recommendation of Congress, were incorporated in the service of the United States. The case before them was that of a navy of a State admitted to have been foreign at the time when these officers entered its service—a navy too not raised under the authority of the United States. The officers who had entered this navy, were according to the bill before them, to be permitted to come in and command those in some instances who had commanded them when they were in the service of the United States.

Mr. HALE wished, as so much had been said about the necessities of our navy in consequence of our extended coast, that gentlemen would look into the Naval Register and see what was the real situation of the naval corps at this moment. According to the register we had sixty-seven captains in the American service, forty put down as on leave of absence, or waiting orders, i. e. literally doing nothing. Of ninety-seven commanders, forty-three are on leave of absence and waiting orders; and of three hundred and twenty-seven lieutenants, eighty-six are on leave of absence and waiting orders. Thus we had forty captains doing nothing but simply waiting orders, and receiving twenty-five hundred dollars a year; and so with the remaining grades. He did not know by what rule of justice it could be made to appear that a captain should receive twice as much as a lieutenant for doing nothing; nevertheless, according to the register, such was the fact. The appropriations proposed in the naval appropriation bill of this year amounted to some eleven millions, as much as the whole of the expenses of Mr. Monroe's administration of eight years. The amount of expenditure, however, was not at all surprising, when the fact of so many men being paid such large sums for doing nothing, was made apparent. Should he live to take his seat in that body at another session, he would pledge himself to introduce some practical reform of this enormous abuse.

Mr. ATHERTON stated that the expenses of the navy proper were only some six or seven millions. If the appropriations for marine hospitals and other necessary adjuncts to the navy were included, the whole amount of appropriations would be some ten or eleven millions.

Mr. FOOTE was somewhat surprised at the range the discussion had taken, which seemed a very liberal one, to say the least. The question before the Senate was not the one that had just been discussed by the Senator from New Hampshire, but it was simply whether we should repudiate the solemn compact entered into with Texas at the time of her annexation, or whether we should, in a spirit of fairness and magnanimity, carry out that compact. There were no legal rights of the American officers violated in this case; this idea the Senator from Georgia had distinctly discarded. If their rights, then, by this bill, were not interfered with in a legal sense, were they in a moral sense? If these officers were men wanting in intelligence and moral worth, that suggestions might be plead with truth. But, on the contrary, these officers, and Com. Moore in particular, were known and esteemed for their estimable private characters. Surely he thought the officers of our navy could not consider themselves aggrieved, or offer any reasonable ground of complaint if these Texian officers were dealt with as was proposed in the bill. Gentlemen had seemed to imply a want of love to country in these Texian officers leaving the American service. He was not sure but that such acts were to be regarded as evidencing a greatly increased love of country, a greater regard for free institutions, by going abroad for the purpose of aiding in the establishment of free institutions to a people kindred to us in name and ancestry. Mr. F. then warmly eulogized the conduct and character of Commodore Moore as a private citizen and a soldier in the cause of freedom. The extent of coast, by recent acquisitions, justly demanded, he thought, the increase proposed in the bill. Texas had opened the road to these acquisitions, and by every light in which the right could be viewed, he thought we were bound to do justice to the officers of her navy.

Mr. WESTCOTT said he should vote for the bill, but preferred that its praseology should be amended The amendments he suggested would obviate the objection of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] It would make the bill read so that the navy of the United States should not be increased by adding to it the specific officers of the Texan navy, by direction of Congress to the President, but merely allowing the increase of the United States navy sufficiently to enable the President to nominate those of the Texan officers he might deem worthy and well qualified. He would not attempt to fetter in any wise the constitutional power and discretion of the President with respect to nominations. Congress had no right to do so by law—not even by treaty, or joint resolutions, not then annexing Texas or in any other mode. The amendments he suggested were as follows, and were read:

He proposed to strike out the words "by adding thereto the," and insert "by an addition equal to the," and to add at end of line "and in such appointments the President may select persons not now officers of the navy of the United States."

Mr. BERRIEN inquired if the Senator from Florida meant to authorize the President to build new ships if those of Texas were unfit for service?

Mr. WESTCOTT replied that he would; and for reasons that he would give presently. He would return to the claim of those officers. He did not agree that they derived any rightful claim, arising from the terms of the joint resolutions concerning Texas, or founded on annexation. He did not agree with those Senators who had argued that we had adopted those officers into our navy by those resolutions. Their arguments had not convinced him. He would take occasion also to reiterate what he had said at former session, when a similar bill was before the Senate, that he did not conceive the officers of the United States navy had any right, or that it was in anywise becoming, for them to object or interfere as to any provision Congress might make for these Texan officers. They had no business to meddle; they had just such rights as, and no more, than the laws Congress passed conferred upon them; and Congress had the rightful power to alter, repeal, or amend these laws whenever it deemed it proper for the interests of the country, and to abolish the navy entirely, or half of it, or remodel it altogether, or reduce the rank and pay of the officers. Such course would afford no ground of just complaint by them whatever. They were not above the laws or legislation.—They should understand this. He placed the propriety of Congress making provision for the Texan officers entirely upon other and different principles than those urged here. We had admitted Texas into the confederacy. While in it she could not maintain or keep a navy; she was restricted from so doing by the federal constitution. These officers were, therefore, thrown out of employment. They were gallant, meritorious men; some of them would adorn our navy, or any other navy. They were Americans, born and bred. He would act liberally, generously towards these officers, not because there was an actual obligation to give them commissions, but because it was a course that became the government of this great confederacy, to act generously and liberally towards Texas and her officers. We received the ships and their armaments, and then refused to license the officers. We ought not to be restrained by any niggard rules of false economy in this matter. We should act towards those who aided the cause of constitutional freedom in Texas as became the greatest, richest and most powerful republican confederation that had ever existed, and these rules, in his judgment, demanded provision for these officers. He did not believe the President needed any prompting, if the bill be general, to nominate the Texan officers. Public opinion and the debates here would indicate to him the object of the law, and he doubted not he would act properly.

As to the inquiry of the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN] whether he (Mr. W.) would increase the navy without reference to these officers, he unequivocally answered, yes. He regretted to hear the remarks of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] It was not a satisfactory mode of argument to compare it or its expenses now, with what it was, or what its expenses were, under Madison's or Monroe's, or any past administration. Within ten years we had added upwards of one thousand miles of sea-coast to our country on the Pacific; within four years we had annexed to the Union the Texan coast of four or five hundred miles. In 1821 we had obtained thirteen hundred miles of gulf and sea coast by the cession of Florida. Who would say these additions to our maratime frontier, of nearly three thousand miles, did not demand increased naval force to defend them? Again, could any sagacious man be blind to what was going on in Europe? She would be involved in a general war in less than six months. Did any one doubt it? Could we keep out of the contest? We might try, sir, but we could not.—The belligerants would force us into it, unless we tamely submitted to spoliations on our commerce, and insult and outrage. If we had such contest with England or France, the struggle would be on the ocean. In such case our present navy would not be sufficient for the Gulf of Mexico alone. It should be increased in such event three or four fold. We should not forget the old maxim, "in time of peace prepare for war." Further, in such contest, if it should be with England, our eastern and northern brethren might become a little less hostile to the great principle of progress and doctrine of annexation. As a set off to the acquisition of the British West Indies, the Senator from New Hampshire, and our northern and eastern brethren, might look with longing eyes to the Canadas, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, where what that Senator calls the "black field of slavery" does not spread over the land to shock his philanthropic sensibilities. Should we not want an increase of naval force to defend such possessions when acquired. Suppose we had Cuba ceded to us, should we then need no greater force? These were not dreamy visions. He did not think the army should be increased. The navy was the branch of the public service that we should look to now. We could raise an army in thirty days as powerful as any that ever fought. For the reasons he had suggested, he should vote for the bill, whether amended or not. He did not think an admiral as necessary, but he wanted to see more ships and officers and men ready for any crisis or contingency.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, was not willing that the navy of the United States should rest under the imputation thrown upon it by the Senator from New Hampshire. He had listened on a former occasion to speeches made in a similar strain, in reference to the West Point academy, that it was a worm gnawing into the vitals of the government, and that on account of the expense it gave rise to, it should be put down. But he thought, after the service that the graduates of that academy had rendered in Mexico, that now there could not be found a man willing, in either House, to rise up and declare himself opposed to the institution because of its inutility. Our naval marine, in proportion to our commercial marine, was the smallest in the world. Our navy did not bear the proportion to our commerce that it did thirty years ago. It was necessary that we should have men in training in time of peace, at school as it were in the navy, for we all knew that it was by experience alone that a man was qualified to manage a ship.—Time and a thorough education was requisite to an understanding of ship navigation, and, therefore, he thought that the present number of officers, either on duty or off duty, was necessary, and that the arrangements made in reference to them was judicious. Where were our enemies to come from in case of war? From across the Atlantic. If we were to have a conflict with any foreign power, it would be with a European power, and of course our navy marine should be in a state adequate to repel aggression. In such a case we would need all their seamanship, which was only to be gained by years of preparation and practice. There was not a more gallant set of men, in his opinion, in the service of the United States than the officers of the United States navy; none more justly entitled to the respect of their fellow-countrymen. He would venture to predict, whenever the occasion demanded, that they would not fall behind any of their countrymen for gallantry and patriotism.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that the respect which he felt for the opinions of the Senator from Texas, had induced him to examine the precedent he had cited of the act passed by the revolutionary Congress, in reference to the army in service during the revolutionary war. He apprehended that it did not approach at all the question at issue. That act merely adopted an existing establishment, and did not authorize the formation of a new commission. This was a bill in which the officers to be created were expressly designated.

Mr. RUSK was still of opinion that the case he had cited was directly in point. He entered into a further exposition of its analogy to the case before them; and defended the course of these officers now claiming promotion, who had left the American for the Texan service. He urged the passage of this bill for the relief of the Texan officer as an act of justice to Texas, and in fulfilment of what had always been understood by the government and people of Texas a solemn compact on the part of the United States. [Mr. RUSK then handed to the Senator a copy of the message of the governor, and the resolutions of the legislature, affirming and sustaining the act of incorporation of the navy officers of Texas into the American service, which was read.]

Mr. NILES did not take much interest in the bill, inasmuch as he did not like the title of it. He felt somewhat alarmed at the views thrown out in the course of the discussion, for although they had just got through with a treaty the other day, putting an end to a war that had been carried on for some time, yet here was a bill before them for the increase of the navy, looking to another war—a maritime war. The Senator from Massachusetts thought our present navy insufficient, although its expenditures had been increasing through the agency of a thousand sinister influences, within a few years, from four millions up to eleven millions. We had had a set speech from the Senator from Massachusetts, who had hitherto been advocating peace for years, and with whom he, [Mr. NILES,] had been fully cooperating in that advocacy. Now, if there was to be a war—a maritime war—and he did not know but that there was some intention of it—it must be an aggressive war. Surely, there was no nation who could make war upon us. The gentleman from Massachusetts was looking to a different state of things from that of peace; but he, [Mr. NILES,] would inquire if we could not, for a brief season at least, have a little repose upon this subject of war. The public mind needed repose; but if gentlemen were to stand up and advocate an increase of the navy, because of a supposed maritime war, the people of the whole country would become alarmed; they would think there was something in it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, disclaimed any intention of increasing the navy for the purpose of having a maritime war, or alarming the country. His purpose was simply to keep out of war by making suitable preparations, so that other nations would be more inclined to respect our rights, seeing we were fully prepared to maintain them.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

On the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Atchison, Borland, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Dickinson, Downs, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson, of Ga., Lewis, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Westcott, and Yulee—17.

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—Shall jealousy, discord, and dissension, shall political strife, for sectional supremacy, be permitted to undermine the foundation of our republican fabric? Shall an interference with the domestic affairs of the people in one portion of our Union, wounding to their pride and sensibility, and unwarranted by the compact of confederation, be pressed, to the destruction of that fraternal feeling and mutual confidence, on which alone can our institutions securely repose? Shall a discrimination against one section of the confederacy, the palpable object of which is totally to destroy political equality, be sanctioned by the common agent of the States, and receive here an impulse to hasten its progress, to the inevitable goal of such a principle—the disunion of the States?

These, and such as these, are the grave, the melancholy questions which arise from the consideration of this bill and the character of the discussion we have heard upon it. Happy, thrice happy, will it be if the answers to these questions shall be given by a lofty patriotism and enlightened statesmanship, which, disregarding the passions of the hour, look to the general welfare and the permanent good. But, if personal considerations govern our actions, if each Senator reflects the prejudice and extreme opinion which may exist in the section he represents, then it may be our lot to witness the fulfillment of the foreboding fear of Mr. Jefferson, when such agitation as that which surrounds us caused him to express the apprehension, that the sacrifices of the generation of 1776 had been made in vain.

Deeply impressed with the gravity and importance of the subject, I shall offer my opinions dispassionately and candidly, briefly and decidedly, as the occasion requires and my deep-rooted love of the Union demands.

I consider the 12th section of this bill, to establish a territorial government in Oregon, to be practically the abolition of slavery in said territory by the government of the United States; and seeing no adequate disposition to strike that section out of the bill, I introduced the amendment now under consideration. To this I was prompted by a sense of duty to myself, of duty to those whom I have the honor to represent, of obligation to the principles avowed as the basis of my political creed, and which are the cardinal points by which my political course must be directed. This amendment has received an interpretation which its language in no degree justifies. To this misconstruction I will first call attention, as upon it rests a position, assumed in several quarters, which it is important to combat. Senators have treated this amendment as a proposition to force slavery into the territory of Oregon. Sir, I had no such purpose, no such desire; and, surely, the most ingenious must fail to extract any such intent from its letter. It is but a distinct avowal of the ground uniformly maintained by all statesmen of the strict construction school, and adhered to by southern men generally throughout the entire period of our confederate existence. Its direct aim is to restrain the federal government from the exercise of a power not delegated, its ultimate effect to protect those rights which have been guaranteed by the federal constitution. The amendment is in the words:

"That nothing contained in the act shall be so construed as to authorize the prohibition of domestic slavery in said territory whilst it remains in the condition of a territory of the United States."

There is nothing directory, or enactive, or proposed for enactment. It is restrictive, and directed against a prohibition which is covertly contained in the bill. Though it is, not expressly declared that slavery shall be prohibited in Oregon, this would be virtually enacted by the 12th section of the bill which gives validity and operation to the laws enacted by the "provisional government established by the people" who inhabit that territory. It is known that one of the laws passed by the people of Oregon prohibits slavery. To give validity to those laws is therefore equivalent to the passage of a law by Congress to prohibit slavery in that territory. Does Congress possess such power?

If the right to migrate with their property to territory belonging to the United States attaches equally to all their citizens; and if, as I have been credibly informed, citizens have migrated with their slaves into Oregon, to pass the bill before us without amendment would be abolition of slavery by the federal government. Entertaining this opinion I submitted an amendment to meet the case distinctly and singly. Now, for the first time in our history, has Congress, without the color of compact or compromise, claimed to discriminate in the settlement of territories against the citizens of one portion of the Union and in favor of another. This, taken in connection with all which is passing around us, must excite the attention of Senators to the fact, and forces on my mind the conclusion that herein is sought to be established a precedent for future use. Here upon the threshhold we must resist, or forever abandon, the claim to equality of right, and consent to be a marked caste, doomed, in the progress of national growth, to be dwarfed into helplessness and political dependence. As equals the States came into the Union, and, by the articles of confederation, equal rights, privileges, and immunities were secured to the citizens of each; yet, for asserting in this case that the federal government shall not authorize the destruction of such equality, we have been accused of wishing to claim for the citizens of the southern States unusual rights under the constitution. This accusation comes badly from those who insist on provisions for exclusion, and cannot find its application to a demand that nothing shall be done to affect the constitutional relations of citizens or the constitutional rights of property. We do not ask of the federal government to grant new privileges, but to forbear from interfering with existing rights; rights which existed anterior to the formation of the constitution, which were recognized in that instrument, and which it is made the duty of the federal government, as the agent of our Union, to protect and defend.

Such obligations as belong to other species of property, nor more nor less, we claim as due to our property in slaves. Nor can this claim be denied without denying the property-right to which it attaches. This, it has been contended, is the creation of local law, and does not extend beyond the limits for which such laws were made, and, with an air of concession, we are told that it is not proposed to interfere with slavery as it exists in the States, because the constitution secures it there. Before the formation of our confederacy slavery existed in the colonies, now the States of the Union; and but for the Union of the States, would have no legal recognition beyond the limits of the territory of each. But when the fathers of the republic had achieved its independence, they sought to draw closer the bonds of union, and to remove all cause for discord and contention. For this holy purpose, they met in council, and formed the constitution under which we live. This compact of union changed the relation of the States to each other in many important particulars, and gave to property and intercourse a national character. Property in persons held to service was recognized; in various and distinct forms it became property under the constitution of the United States, was made co-extensive with the supremacy of the federal laws, its existence subject only to the legislation of sovereign States possessing powers not drawn from, but above, the constitution. Thus provision was made for the recovery of fugitive slaves, and the question of right to such property as absolutely precluded, as the guilt or innocence of one charged with "treason, felony, or other crime." In both cases it is made the duty of the State authorities to deliver up the fugitive on demand of the State from which the felon fled in the one case, and of the person to whom the service is due in the other.

By the 2d section of the fourth article of the constitution, it is provided that—

"A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

"No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

Thus was the property recognized, and the duty to surrender it to the claimant made as imperative as in the case of fugitives from State authority and law.

This property was further recognized by including it in provisions which are only to be drawn from the power to regulate commerce. By the ninth section of the 1st article of the constitution, it is provided that—

"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person."

Could there be a more distinct recognition of the property right in slaves? Here is not only a permission to import, but a duty to be laid upon them as a subject of commerce. The fact that an exception was made against the entire control of such importation by Congress, is conclusive that but for such exceptions, it would have been embraced in the general grant of power to the federal government to regulate commerce. If the framers of the constitution had intended to recognize no other than the right to recapture fugitives—if they had denied the existence of property in persons, they surely would not have used the word importation, as found in the clause of the constitution just cited. In further support of this opinion, I would refer to the fact that the exception was so strictly construed, that laws prohibiting such importation in territories not included in the exception were enacted. I was, therefore, surprised that the Senator from New York should have cited as a proof of the power of the federal government to legislate on the subject of slavery in the territories, the law to prohibit the importation of Africans into the Mississippi territory before the year 1808. That territory was not included in the exception which restrained the federal government from prohibiting the importation of slaves before 1808; therefore it was exercised under the general power over the subject as an article of commerce. Upon this power over commerce, and upon the property nature of the persons so considered, must rest all our laws for the abolition of the foreign slave trade. To deny this general basis, would draw after it the sequence that all our laws upon that subject were enacted without any grant of authority, and were therefore unconstitutional. Nor is it thus alone that this property in persons has been recognized. During the revolution, and by the men who framed our declaration of independence, throughout all the States of the confederacy, the propriety of refusing liberty to a certain caste of persons was admitted, and in the earliest legislation under the constitution, those to whom the services of such persons were due were denominated their "owners."

In the treaty of peace which closed the war of our revolution, the phrase "negroes, or other property," shows the position assumed upon our side, as well as the admission made by Great Britain that the persons so referred to were recognized in their character as property. Again, in 1815, after the adoption of the constitution, the same construction was explicitly admitted in the treaty of Ghent, in the first article of which we find the expression, "any slaves, or other private property." With what propriety—with what fairness can it now be assumed that that which we have called property, and negotiated upon as such in our diplomatic relations and international acts from the birth of the republic down to 1815, has no existence among the States of the Union—no claim to recognition or protection beyond the limits of the States where it is ordained and sustained by local law. The constitution recognized slavery—by it the federal government was constituted the agent of the States—entrusted with the power of regulating commerce with the States, and with the conduct of all foreign relations. In the discharge of its appropriate functions, the federal government, as shown above, has maintained this property right against a foreign power, and it is equally bound to defend it, within the limits of federal jurisdiction, against any encroachment upon its security and use, as guarantied by the constitution.

To those who argue against this extension of the property in slaves beyond the limits of the States which they inhabit, as an unequal obligation or unusual right, I will render the admission, that but for the constitution, the right to property in slaves could not have extended beyond the States which possessed them. But gentlemen should recollect that all the territory northwest of the river Ohio, from which five non-slaveholding States have been carved, was originally the property of Virginia, and but for the compact of our Union, the institutions of that State would have been extended over it. This territory, thus interposed between the northern Atlantic States and the vast region which has been acquired west of the Mississippi, must have prevented those States from all such acquisition. How, under this contingency, would have been the relative size of the slave and non-slaveholding territory? The answer to this inquiry should silence complaint of advantages accruing to the South from the guarantees of the constitution.

To avoid the possibility of misconstruction, I repeat that we do not seek to establish slavery upon a new basis; we claim no such power for the federal government. We equally deny the right to establish as to abolish slavery. We only ask that those rights of property which existed before the constitution, and which were guarantied by it, shall be protected. If it can be shown that the southern States would, as independent sovereignties, have possessed no right of extension, or that the right of territorial acquisition was transferred to the federal government, subject to the condition that it should be used for the benefit of the northern States exclusively, then we will have what has not yet been presented, a foundation for the assumption that from all territory thus acquired, slavery or involuntary servitude should be forever excluded. Sectional rivalry, stimulated by the desire for political aggrandizement, party zeal, local jealousy, and fanaticism, maddened by recent success, have each brought their contribution to the mass of assertion, which has been heaped upon the South, to deny to her an equal participation with the North in the enjoyment of the territory belonging in common to the States. But assertion is not proof, abuse is not demonstration; and that claim sustained by justice, and supported by the staff of truth, stands yet unbent beneath the mountain of error which has been accumulated upon it.

The various modes which have been proposed to exclude slaveholders from entering territory of the United States with their property, may be referred to three sources of power: the federal government, the territorial inhabitants, and the law of the land anterior to its acquisition by the United States.

The federal government can have no other powers than those derived from the constitution. It is the agent of the States, has no other authority than that which has been delegated, cannot by the character of its creation and the nature of its being have any inherent, independent power. To the constitution as the letter of authority for this federal agent, we must look for every grant of power. All which is not given is withheld, all which is prohibited is doubly barred. It is not to be supposed that the sovereign States when forming a compact of Union would confer upon the agent of such compact a power to control the destiny of the States, nor is it in keeping with the avowed objects, "to insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare," that it should be used to disturb the balance of power among the States. Were one portion of the Union to increase whilst the other remained stationary, the result would be reached in the course of years which led to the war of our revolution, and the separation of the colonies from the mother country. What would it profit a minority to have representatives in Congress, if opposed to a majority of mastering strength, and of will, as well as power to sweep away all the protecting barriers of the constitution. It was not for representation in Parliament, that the fathers of our republic dissolved the political bands which connected them with the parent government; but to maintain the freedom and equality which could not be secured by a hopeless minority in common legislation; to defend their inalienable rights from aggression by those who were irresponsible to them, that they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. The such men it was of paramount importance in forming a general government to guard against interference with domestic institutions, and to preserve such equality among the different sections and interests, as would secure each from aggression by the others. This purpose is deeply graven on the constitution, pervades it as a general spirit, and appears both in its grants and prohibitions. Thence arose the different basis of representation in the two Houses of Congress, those the Executive veto, the limitations on the power to regulate commerce among the States, the prohibition against interference with private property, against discrimination in favor of one port over another, the partial representation of persons held to service, and the many other provisions which will occur to Senators, illustrative of the design to preserve such equality, as is necessary to prosperity, to harmony, to union among sovereigns.

The right of the federal government to legislate for the territories has been claimed from two sources of power, the grant to Congress "to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," and as a power necessarily incident to the right to acquire territory. The power drawn from the first mentioned source is plainly a power over the territory as public land the expression "territory or other property" shows the idea too distinctly to require elucidation. The territory belonging to the United States at the formation of the constitution was such as had been ceded by particular States as a common fund of the Union The federal government as agent of the States was charged with the disposal of the public domain, under the needful rules and regulations which Congress were authorized to make. The source from which this addition to the common stock was derived, the object for which it was given, the conditions of the cession, all unite with the general provisions of the constitution to forbid the idea of a transfer of absolute powers of legislation, or the existence of a power in the federal government to make laws for the territory which would affect the political rights or interests of the States. The laws of Congress in relation to territory belonging to the United States must be "needful" to execute the trust conveyed by the States; and none of the grants of the constitution are to be so construed as to prejudice the rights of the United States or of any particular State." To promote the sale of the public land where no settled government exists, it may be claimed as an incident to the power to dispose of such property, that Congress should provide for courts and such government generally, as will give security to settlers, and certainty to titles in the region to which we invite emigration.

Thus far the powers of a trustee may properly extend; thus far the agent may go in good faith to those for whom he acts; the sovereignty still remaining, where alone it can reside, in the States to whom the territory belongs. It will probably not be contended that to exclude a portion of our citizens, or to prohibit a certain kind of property, is a "needful regulation" for the disposal of public lands; certainly such a position could not be maintained, and those who contended for the power of Congress to prohibit slavery in the territories, have usually relied upon the second source of power, the right of acquisition.

Before considering how much may be derived from that right, it might have been well to examine into its existence, and inquire to whom its benefits attach. The power to admit new States into the Union was conferred by the constitution; but not to acquire territory as such. The former was a power properly conferred upon a confederation which looked to the addition of new members; the latter belongs to sovereignty, and can be possessed by nothing less. The right to acquire belonged to the States as an inherent right of independent existence, one which attaches to all bodies animate and inanimate. Stones gather accretions, vegetable forms grow by increment, animals assimilate food and incorporate it with their bodies; by like operation of this general law, the States as independent sovereignties had a right to acquire. But the means of acquisition, the war and the treaty making powers, were entrusted to the federal government. The right to acquire was not delegated, save as the means were to be used by the federal government, and therefore the acquisition must enure to the benefit of the States in whose right alone it could be made. The power to govern as an absolute, ultimate authority remains in the States, and their agent can only exercise so much of that power as has been granted. Our legislation for the territory must, if this view be correct, be drawn from the specific grants, and be subject to all the limitations and prohibitions imposed on them by the constitution. The rule that the right to acquire carries with it the right to govern, receives a modification in its application to the federal government, in this, that it acquires as agent for the States, by the blood or common treasure of the States, or as in past cases by a cession for the common benefit of the States, and can therefore only govern as authorized by the sovereign owners of the territory. The question then is reduced to this: has the federal government, under the grants of the constitution, power to prohibit "slavery" in the territories of the United States? The right to property in slaves being recognized by the constitution, this question is convertible into another: has the general government the right to exclude particular species of property from the territory of the United States, and thus confine the enjoyment of its advantages to a portion of their citizens? A proposition so repugnant to justice, so violative of the equal rights which every citizen of the United States has in the common property, so destructive of the equality in privileges and immunities secured by the constitution, would seem to be answered by its statement. Yet palpable as the wrong may appear, it has been perpetrated in legislative resolutions by 11 States of the Union, bound by the federal compact to recognize the co-equality of the States; and repeatedly asserted by Senators in this chamber, pledged to maintain the constitution. This federal government designed to render more perfect the Union of the States, and to promote their common defence, is thus to become the most formidable enemy of some, the great seedsman of discord among all.

The union of the States into one confederacy, gave no power to destroy local rights of property, or to change the condition of persons; but much, to protect and preserve the existing rights of property, and relative condition of persons, by extending the limits of their recognition, and enlarging the provisions for their security. Thus the federal government cannot take "private property" except for "public use," and by making "just compensation" therefor; the obligation of contracts cannot be impaired; duties cannot be imposed on articles of commerce passing from the limits of one State to another; nor apprentices, indented servants, or slaves, by escaping into another State be discharged from their obligations under the laws of that from which they fled. In these, and similar instances, the federal government can do, and has done, much which is beyond the power of a State, to protect and enlarge the value of property. To determine what shall be property, what the condition of persons, are functions of sovereignty beyond its delegated authority; which can only be exercised by a sovereign State within its limits, and beyond that, by the majority of States required to amend the constitution. I deny, then, that the federal government may say to any class of citizens, you shall not emigrate to territory which belongs in common to the people of the United States; equally deny, that it can say what property shall be taken into such territory, or legislate so as to impair, after his arrival in the territory, any of the pre existing rights of the emigrant to the property he may carry with him. Many of the reasons and principles presented to establish the absence of power in the federal government to exclude slavery from territory belonging to the United States, bear with like force against the second class of opinion—that the power rests in the territorial inhabitants. In the unwearied search of those who, from the foundation of our government, have sought in every quarter for the fountains of power by which the sovereignty of the States might be submerged, this, until recently, remained undiscovered. When territorial governments were first established in the territories now the States of the northwest, a very different doctrine obtained, and quite opposite was the practice under it. There, though the foreign inhabitants were mainly those who had taken part with us in the wars against Great Britain, they were not considered so capable of self-government as to be entrusted with the powers of local legislation, and the restricted governments established in Indiana and Michigan, were required to adopt the laws of some State of the Union for their rule and government. Thus, in relation to French settlers at Vincennes, and the Canadian refugees in Michigan, it was decided. Now, sir, for whom is it proposed to reverse the decision, not only so far as to recognize local legislation, but to admit the power to pass fundamental laws controlling the action of Congress, and determining the future policy and institutions of Oregon?

For a small settlement composed, to a large extent, of the late dependents of the Hudson's Bay Company, subjects of the British crown, the very men who were arrayed against us to dispute our right to the soil, the same who, by force and violence, wrested from our citizens their property and possessions on the Columbia river; the same who, in violation of the faith of our treaty with Great Britain for the joint occupancy of Oregon, made regulations, the effect of which was to destroy the valuable furs in that portion of the country which they expected to become exclusively the property of the United States, whilst they were preserved in that which was expected to pass at a subsequent day to the sovereignty of Great Britain. So much for those who fortuned a large, if not controlling part of the population of Oregon when this policy of excluding slavery was adopted there. Shall they be permitted to sit in judgment on the constitutional rights of American citizens? Shall they decide the future institutions of our territory? Looking further to the south, in the valley of the Wallamette, we find it as true, settlements of American citizens, on whose patriotism and love for the States from which they are distant wander, we can safely rely. They are American citizens, a name which all who were born beneath the flag of our Union must cherish with such affection and pride that their bond of allegiance needs no endorser. Giving them full confidence, so far as their conduct might be involved in any contest for the interest or honor of our common country, there arises, from the question before us, an inquiry of a very different nature. I have said that the power to prohibit the introduction into Oregon of slavery, as recognized under the constitution, is such control over property and persons as can only be exercised by sovereignty. If this be correct the proposition to leave the whole subject to the territorial inhabitants is equivalent to acknowledging them to be sovereign over the territory. If they are so, by their own right, then it is not "territory belonging to the United States." If it be the territory of the United States Congress has no right to surrender the sovereignty of the States over it. No right to entrust to other hands the formation of the institutions which are in future to characterize it. In connexion, however, with this proposition, I have spoken of one portion of the territorial inhabitants, as men having no claim upon our confidence, and suggested that there were other inquiries than those connected with their patriotism which required consideration in relation to the other portion of the settlers in Oregon. Are they statesmen? Have they such political experience and wisdom that the settled practice of the country should be changed in order that they may fix the fundamental principles on which their future institutions shall rest: that they may lay the corner stone of that republican edifice, which is in after time to overlook the Pacific? Or are they, as we have heretofore believed them, missionaries of religion, whose studies have been devoted to subjects, which however high and holy, have not been those which would qualify them for the labor of forming temporal governments. And beyond this; traders, trappers, adventurers in the forest and in the mountain, whose pursuits and character have least led them to contemplate, or to value the forms and blessings of civil government. Such is the character of the inhabitants in Oregon. and if there be little to justify the surrender of the highest powers of legislation to them, there is still less to warrant the character of the inhabitants of those territories we have recently acquired, and which must soon be the subject of governmental organization. There we find a people educated to opinions and habits hostile to our own, mongrels of the Spanish and Indian races, inheriting from both the characteristics, pertinacity, treachery and revenge; and fresh from conflicts, the history and consequences of which are well calculated to excite the bitterest animosity towards our citizens and our government. A people whose religious prejudices are so strong that they have recently sought to transfer a large part of their country to a foreign colony, for the purpose of excluding the immigration of American citizens, to whom they gave the name of "Methodist wolves." Morally, socially and intellectually degraded to such degree, that with the forms of free government, they have never enjoyed any of its essential rights. With the writ of habeas corpus as the established law of the land, citizens were nevertheless transported by order of the central government across several States of the republic, and incarcerated without question or power to obtain legal redress. Are these the men who shall prescribe the fundamental law of the land? Shall they determine the rights, privileges and immunities of the American citizens who may migrate into that country? Shall they decide with what property one of your citizens, to whom you have granted land for services in the war with Mexico, shall be permitted to take possession of his grant? If so, the territory we have acquired belongs not to the United States, but to the people so recently conquered, now become sovereign over the rights of our citizens, our laws, and our constitution. This opinion in favor of the sovereignty of territorial inhabitants, of such recent origin and rapid growth, seems to have found an equally rapid decline; and has not, I think, sufficient importance now, to justify me in detaining the senate by further remarks upon it. To the citizen who presses beyond the limits of civilization, to open up to cultivation and settlement the forest domain of the United States, I have always been willing to extend protection, and such peculiar advantages over other joint owners of the common stock, as are due to the services he has thus rendered to the common interest. But the civil rights, the political principles of our government are not to be transferred to those who shall be first in the race to reach newly acquired possessions, or who shall by accident be found upon them. To point this opinion by a single application, I will refer to a large body of American citizens, who under the control of religious enthusiasm, have gone beyond the limits of State jurisdiction to found a sectarian colony in the unexplored wilderness of the Tlamath lake. My remark will, of course, be understood to apply to the Mormons, and I introduce the case to ask if any one is prepared to welcome the consequences to civil and religious liberty, which would flow from the exercise of sovereignty by them over the country of which they may take possession.

I now pass to the third source of power from which it is claimed the right may be derived to exclude slavery from a territory of the United States.

The inviolability of the law as it exists at the period of acquisition.

Did I seek protection under a principle which I believe to be wrong, I would concede this point to those who make it, because I hold it to be conclusive against them in the case of Oregon. That territory whether derived from France as a part of Louisiana by the treaty of 1803, or from Spain as a part of the vice-royalty of Mexico, in 1819, would by the application of this rule be a slave territory, that institution having existed under the laws of both France and Spain in the provinces and at the dates referred to. If then the law existing at the date of acquisition be inviolable, the case is closed. Those who have set this mine have sprung it to their own destruction. But, believing this to be wrong in fact, I claim no advantage from it. The progress of humanity softening the rigors of slavery, has constantly modified and restricted the rights of the conqueror; it has gone so far as to leave the municipal regulations, the private rights of property, and existing relations of persons undisturbed. The laws are permitted to remain so far as they do not conflict with the rights of the conqueror, not so much to satisfy a supposed claim of the conquered as to prevent anarchy, to promote order and to preserve the necessary relations in society, until the new sovereign shall give other laws to the country. The object for which such continuance of existing laws is permitted, clearly marks the limitation of their effect to the existing condition of those who inhabit the territory. To extend it beyond this so as to affect the political or personal rights of those by whom the territory has been acquired, either by conquest or purchase, would be to render the acquisition nugatory, and present the absurdity of ownership without jurisdiction, of a conqueror made subject by his conquest. The laws of Spain or of Mexico, if they should remain paramount in the territory acquired from either, would exclude a large portion of our citizens, and many kinds of property which are articles of free commerce among the States. The mass of our citizens would never submit to restraint on their religious worship. The monopolies of Mexico, and the free-trade throughout the United States guaranteed by the constitution, could not exist together. The power to exclude one species of property can be no better founded than that to exclude any other; the constitution protects all which it recognizes or none. Those who contend that the laws of Mexico will prevent the introduction of slaves, as held among us, into California or New Mexico, have not shown why the same laws by their course of reasoning will not exclude the introduction of tobacco. Believing that the principles and guarantees of the constitution extend over all territory belonging to the United States, and that all laws violative of either are abrogated by the act of acquisition, it imports to me nothing by what authority such laws were passed. To those who hold that municipal laws endure until specific legislation repeals them, I commend inquiry as to the character of the laws prohibiting slavery in Mexico. They are not municipal, but general laws—were not passed by the State legislatures, but by the federal Congress, and I have been informed in opposition to the wishes of the northern and eastern States of that republic. The central government against which we have waged war, from which as indemnity for long continued flagrant wrongs we have taken territory, will surely not be permitted to leave its legislation over the country we have acquired, as a form on which its institutions are to be moulded. Shall the citizen, who rejoicing in the extended domain of his country, migrates to its newly acquired territory, find himself shorn of the property he held under the constitution, by the laws of Mexico? Shall the soldier who locates his grant in California find himself under the authority he had contributed to conquer? Shall the widow and the orphan of him who died in his country's quarrel, be excluded from the acquisition obtained in part by his blood, unless they will submit to the laws of the power he bled and died to subdue? Never, never! Reason and justice, constitutional right and national pride, combine to forbid the supposition.

I have thus presented my view of the three sources from which it is claimed to draw the power to prohibit slavery in territory of the United States. From the considerations presented, my conclusion is that it cannot properly be done in either of the modes proposed. That not being among the delegated powers of the federal government, or necessary to the exercise of any of its grants, Congress cannot pass a law for that purpose. That the territorial government is subordinate to the federal government from which it derives its authority and support, and that neither separately or united can they invade the undelegated sovereignty of the States over their territory. That the laws of a former proprietor so far as they conflict with the principles of the constitution, are abrogated by the fact of acquisition. That territory of the United States is the property of all the people of the United States; that sovereignty of the territory remains with them until it is admitted as an independent State into the Union; and that each citizen of the United States has an equal right to migrate into such territory, carrying with him any species of property recognized by the constitution, until sovereignty attaches to the territory by its becoming a State, or until the sovereign States by common consent, shall regulate specifically the character of property which shall be admitted into any particular territory. Against such conclusions, those who take an opposite view of this question, have cited precedents to sustain their positions. In the long course of years, and under the widely differing circumstances of the various cases which have arisen, the practice of our government has not been so uniform as in my judgment to furnish any settled rule of construction. Nor can I prepared to admit either on this or other occasions the binding force of precedent over the legislation of Congress. I yield to it such authority as is due to the wisdom and purity of those by whom it was established; more than this it cannot claim. In referring to the early legislation of Congress in relation to territories, I have not been able to perceive the general application of more than one principle, which is that a territory politically considered is treated as an embryo State, therefore the guards thrown around it have been mainly those which would prepare it for a republican form of government. This being the only restriction which Congress is authorized to impose on the constitution of a new State at the period of its admission into the Union. In the organization of territorial governments in the earlier days of our republic, we find no attempts by Congress to legislate for them. Where powers of legislation are not conferred upon the territorial inhabitants, their laws were to be adopted from the statutes of some State in the Union; and to show that no claim was set up by the federal government to regulate property or change the condition of persons, I would refer to the States formed out of the northwest territory, over which the often cited ordinance of 1787 was extended. There we find, notwithstanding the provisions of that ordinance, that slavery continued to exist, as to some extent it still exists, in the State of Illinois. In the act of 1793, passed to carry out the ordinance of 1787, the following language occurs: "where a person held to labor in any of the United States, or in either of the territories on the northwest or south of the Ohio, under the law thereof," &c., which is a distinct recognition by Congress of the existence of slavery in the territory covered by the ordinance of 1787; and is conclusive against the pretension here set up, that by the ordinance of 1787, the power to prohibit slavery in the territories was claimed, exercised, and admitted. The whole extent and force of precedents upon this subject, has been so fully and ably investigated by others who have spoken on the same side of the subject with myself, that I will not pursue this branch of the investigation further. I therefore dismiss it with the remark that whatever of validity they possess is to be drawn from the idea that each was a compact ratified by the acquiescence of the States, and can have no other application than to the particular case for which each was formed. There is a marked difference between territory acquired by joint efforts or common treasure of the States, and that which was derived by the cession of a particular State. In the former case the sovereignty attaches to the States of the Union by the fact of acquisition, and no other functions could be vested in the Congress than those derived from the constitution. In the latter, sovereignty and jurisdiction could be transferred in any form which it might please the giver and the receiver to adopt it. If, then, Virgima or Georgia has conferred upon the federal government higher powers than would necessarily belong to its character of trustee for the public domain, it could not thence be inferred that equal powers would be possessed over territory acquired in common by the States. Nor the legislation in one case would form a precedent for the other, because of the different sources of authority. In this connexion, I will notice a position taken by the Senator from Massachusetts in relation to the cession made by Virginia of the territory northwest of the Ohio river. He assumes that it was made to preserve the existing ratio between the slave and non-slaveholding States. If, sir, I have read the history of that transaction aright, it was founded on far more noble considerations, upon motives alike honorable and patriotic in the State which ceded, and in those which demanded the cession; it was to preserve that just relation between the confederates, of which was deemed essential to preserve the equality of the States, the prosperity, the perpetuity, and the harmony of the Union.

The States of Maryland and Delaware objected to the articles of confederation because of the immense territory held by Virginia, maintaining that it gave her a controlling power which might be destructive of the prosperity of the smaller States, as it would be subversive of the equality essential to the confederacy of sovereigns. In the act of New Jersey for ratifying the articles of confederation, this objection was noticed, and their delegates instructed to sign the articles, "in the firm reliance that the candor and justice of the several States will, in due time, remove as far as possible the inequality which now subsists." The legislature of Delaware passed resolutions, one of which contained the following:

"That this State thinks it necessary for the peace and safety of the States, to be included in the Union, that a moderate extent of limits should be assigned for such of those States as claim to the Mississippi, or South Sea," &c.

In 1779 the delegates from Maryland laid before Congress the instructions of their general assembly. That paper was an able argument against the propriety and justice of the extensive claims of some of the States to the western territory—strongly exhibited the political and financial evil which would probably result from the admission of them, and after asserting the right of all the thirteen States to the unpeopled territory as a common property, declared,

"We have coolly and dispassionately considered the subject; we have weighed probable inconveniences and hardships, against the sacrifice of just and essential rights; and do instruct you not to agree to the confederation, unless an article or articles be added thereto conformably with the declaration before mentioned."

It does not appear that any question of domestic institutions influenced the action of the States upon this subject; indeed, an opposite conclusion is forced upon us by the character of the parties by whom the cession of this territory was insisted on. Slave States cannot be supposed to have insisted on a cession of territory, that the power of the non-slave States should be increased. Who, then, looked to the ignoble war of sections, which it has been our shame and misfortune to witness? Who, then, would have consented to any measure which looked to the reproduction of that inequality, the revival of that interference with the domestic affairs of the States, which had caused the revolution?

The reason most strongly urged was the injury likely to result to some from the disproportionate power of others, the object most sought was the security which would result from equality. In keeping with these, the Congress of the confederation, in 1780, took into consideration the addresses of the different States on the subject of the western territory, and recommended to "Those States which can remove the embarrassments respecting the western country, a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims, since they cannot be preserved entire without endangering the stability of the general confederacy."

And resolved,

"That it be earnestly recommended to those States who have claims to the western country to pass such laws, and give their delegates in Congress such powers, as may effectually remove the only obstacle to a final ratification of the articles of confederation."

By force of such appeals, urged by the conviction that it was necessary to place the federal Union on a permanent basis, and to make it acceptable to all its members, Virginia, with that devotion to the common good which became the land of Washington and Jefferson, ceded her rich birth-right, the vast territory from which has arisen the five northwestern States of our Union. This surrender of individual interest to the general welfare—this concession to secure the tranquility of the States, marked by a dignity and patriotism in the contemplation of which paltry struggles for political advantage should be forgotten, is now cited as a measure to distribute unequally to the slave and free States, the contending parties. With what probability can it be argued that Maryland would demand or Virginia give, for such a purpose?

No, sir, it was fraternity, not strife—it was the general good, not sectional advantage—it was the sovereignty, the equality, and the prosperity of all the States, for which the men of the revolution made their sacrifices, both of war and of peace. It was to perfect the confederation, to remove the distrust and dissatisfaction of slaveholding States, that Virginia ceded the northwestern territory to the common stock of the Union. And this act of magnanimity, of generous confidence, is now cited as authority against those who were weakened by it. Nor is it in this case alone that the South may complain of such injurious and unfair construction. In every instance concession has been made the basis of aggression, and the language of conciliation has been answered by objurgation and taunt. The right to representation in proportion to population was waived so far in relation to slaves, as to exclude two-fifths of their number, yet those who have the advantage of this concession, those who deny that there can be property in persons, are those who attack this compromise of the constitution, and denounce it as an unequal privilege bestowed on the property of the South. The partial representation of slaves is in keeping with their mixed character, being both persons and property; but with much more reason might it be contended that they were entitled to full representation in the federal government than to no representation at all. Indeed, if the South had yielded no claim to full representation in proportion to the number of slaves, I do not perceive how those who deny that there can be any connection between person and property would resist the right; except by the absurd contradiction they perpetrate when railing against it as the representation of property. There is another concession which has been often referred to in this debate, the Missouri compromise.

With the right to extend slavery into any portion of the territory of Louisiana, secured by the treaty of acquisition, there was, nevertheless, a fierce controversy against the admission of Missouri into the Union as a slaveholding State. During its territorial condition the right had been unquestioned—the controversy only arising in view of the political power which would attach to a sovereign State. I will not dwell upon the nugatory character of any law which should attempt to control the domestic institutions of a State, but pass to the result of this controversy about the admission of Missouri. Again, the South, in the spirit of concession which had marked the conduct of her sons at a former period, surrendered their unquestioned and unquestionable right to extend slavery over the whole of that territory which had been acquired under the name of Louisiana, and agreed, except within the limits of Missouri, to confine it to the south side of the parallel of latitude 36° 30′ north. Again was sectional interest abandoned to the hope of permanently establishing the tranquility in the Union. If that hope is now to be destroyed, it will be by those who derived all the benefit from the compromise—not by those who waived by it a portion of their rights. In the compromises of the constitution and the concessions which have followed its adoption, the advantages have mainly accrued to the North; yet the South has steadily and faithfully observed them. Can as much be said of the North? The constitution recognizes the institution of slavery, which thence acquired a general, instead of its previous merely local character. It was made the duty of the State authorities to deliver up fugitive slaves to their owners, and the free commerce among the States secured to each citizen, was a prohibition against State legislation to disturb the right of the master to pass from one State to another with his slave property. The duty has been neglected, the right has been obstructed, slaves have been torn from their masters when exercising the right of every American citizen to pass from one part of the Union to another; the magistracy have stood silent when these outrages were perpetrated, and the legislation of three States, instead of looking to prevention and punishment of such cases in future, have enacted laws best calculated to magnify the evil. Even here in the course of debate it has been asserted that, to carry a slave out of the limits of the jurisdiction of a State in which slavery is recognized, emancipates him. If that were true, the relinquishment of slavery by the constitution would be a nullity. The master who, in discharge of a duty to the government should enter an arsenal or dock yard under the exclusive jurisdiction would thereby lose the right to property in his slave. Or, if he should sail from Norfolk to New Orleans by going to sea, he would pass beyond the jurisdiction of a State, and thus incur the forfeiture. Beyond the limits of a State, whether in territory or on the deck of an American vessel, the constitution and laws of the United States follow the citizens and protect their property. The recognition of slavery by the constitution, therefore, presents a case arising here, in a very different view from one in Great Britain. The difference destroys the value of the argument based on British practice and analogy.

Eleven States of the Union have spoken through their legislatures against the further extension of slavery, with the clearly indicated, sometimes even expressed intention thus to prepare the way for a more direct and fatal attack upon the institutions of the South. When we are told that slavery is an "immense moral and political evil, which ought to be abolished as soon as that end can be properly and constitutionally attained;" when we are admonished of the design "to resist the admission of any new State into the Union while tolerating slavery," he must be blind, indeed, who does not see the purpose, by thus forbidding the growth of the slaveholding States, and devoting all vast territorial domain, to the formation of those in which slavery is forbidden, to obtain in the future such preponderance of free States as will enable them constitutionally to amend the compact of our Union, and strip the South of the guaranties it gives. If factious opposition and sectional disregard of the common good have been able thus to obliterate the great land-marks, equality among the States, and non-interference with domestic affairs, so brief, and such partial enjoyment of power, how can we expect moderation and forbearance when swelled to a three-fourths majority? Those who seek to appropriate our territories to the exclusive formation of non-slaveholding States, must not hope by catch words, and abusive epithets against slavery, to conceal their real purpose, the political aggrandizement of the North.

Was their object the benefit of the slaves—did they seek as a paramount object their emancipation, the policy would certainly be the reverse; instead of confining, to disperse them. Nothing can be more plain than that if confined to small space, they must accumulate in the hands of a few, and if dispersed, that they must have many masters. Whatever there is of harshness, arises from their condensation, so that the master and slave are necessarily separated, and the latter placed under the authority of a hired agent. While the number owned by one person is small, he has immediate charge of them; from their daily intercourse, permanent connection, and real identity of interest, arise those kindly relations usual in such condition. The power to oppress dependents exists in all countries, and bad men every where abuse the power. In no relation which labor bears to capital, is such oppression better guarded against than in that of master and slave. There is in it all which naturally excites the forbearance and kindness of the generous and the good; and this failing there are considerations of interest of pecuniary advantage, to restrain the sordid and the vicious, which do not exist in cases of hired laborers. To confine slavery to a small district, would go further than any other means to strip it of its kind paternal character; when the master should no longer know his slave, when the overseer would have plenary power, then would disappear many of the features which commend it to those who have been reared amidst it. Then would cease the moral and intellectual progress of the slave; then would steadily diminish the feelings promotive of emancipation, and the power to affect it. It has been from the association with a more elevated race, that the African has advanced; it has been from their mutually kind offices that the master has, in many instances, liberated his slave as a mark of affection; for this association and for this feeling, it is required that there should not be a great disproportion in the number of the races where they reside together. The power to emancipate must depend upon property considerations, and upon public policy conjointly. A large community of free men would have the pecuniary ability to emancipate a small number of slaves, the reverse would be beyond their power. Upon a large territory, a few blacks might be turned loose without injury to the progress of society, but on a small territory a large number of blacks could only be released by surrendering the country to them. If then, as proposed, slavery as it exists among us should be confined to the States in which it now exists, the consequence will be not its extinguishment, but its perpetuation. Each State, when it finds within its borders as many Africans as safety and policy will permit, will enact laws to prevent their further introduction; the tide which has flowed uninterrupted on from New England to Texas will be checked, and they will thenceforward continue to accumulate, and when they reach the density which renders involuntary labor no longer profitable, they must still be held, from the impolicy of liberating them in the country, and the inability to send them away, the latter increasing in a compound ratio, because the augmentation of number will bring with it a diminution of profit from their labor. Gentlemen have spoken of the spirit of the age as opposed to slavery. Sir, I think there is no foundation for the presumption of moral change, that all the changed action which has occurred is referable to density of population. It may be taken as a general rule, that involuntary service is less profitable than voluntary labor, and there is a singular uniformity in the degree of density, at which in different countries it has been abandoned. The villeinage of England, and the serfdom of Russia, both become unprofitable to proprietors at the same point—that is when the population reached the point of forty persons to the square mile. But our slaves are a distinct race, physically differing so much from theirs, that no one can look to their emancipation without connecting with it the idea of removal, separation of the races. When, therefore, they cease to be profitable, we cannot, like the ancient Britons, say, be free, and see with the announcement, all cause for distinction cease. Therefore it is to be observed, that those States of our Union who have passed acts of emancipation, have first found themselves nearly rid of the caste, or made their laws prospective and so remote, that this result would be reached before the act went into operation.

With what justice or propriety do those who have availed themselves of the demand for their slaves in the more southern and sparsely settled States, now insist upon closing the door against their egress to newer countries, as the white population gathering behind them would press them still further on? They have sold their slaves when they ceased to be profitable, and slavery became to them a sin of horrid enormity when the property was transferred from themselves to their brother. Therefore they will confine it to the country in which it now exists, and deprive others of the uses used by themselves, and which forms the only practicable mode of getting rid of it. To those who are sincere in their professions of a wish to banish slavery from the United States, and feel it is only to be effected by the voluntary action of those among whom it exists, I say, leave your territories open, and let the white race, as it flows in from the North, gradually, by its greater energy and intelligence, bear the African race before it to regions unsuited to the labor of the white man, as the tide bears the foam to the shore, and gives back to the beach the things which are its own.

The Senator from Vermont objects to the introduction of slave property into territories, and says it should not be forced upon an infant community, but left to be adopted, if they desire it, when they have power to organize an independent government. I have expressed my opinion of the constitutional rights of the holders of that property, and distinctly stated that I desire no Congressional legislation beyond that which is necessary to secure those rights. Non-interference with the subject of slavery is our main position; and is equally opposed to force for or against it. But the experience of our pioneers, the condition of those who first grapple with the difficulty of taming the wilderness, furnishes a forcible illustration of the truth of the relation I have attempted to show exists between involuntary servitude and density of population. The hard necessity, which maintains the power of capital over labor in old settled countries, is not known among the forest adventurers. The bond between the employer and the servant is therefore so weak, that in the first settlement of a country, more than at any subsequent period, would involuntary servitude be advantageous and desirable. I can readily conceive that slaves would be taken into countries where they would cease to be profitable as soon as other labor flowed in. Such instances have occurred in our northern territories, and early emancipation was the result. Why is it assumed that slavery degrades labor, and its presence excludes the white laborer? It may be true as regards the whites, and free blacks of the North, that they will not toil together—there is rivalry between them; but if thence a conclusion is drawn that the same condition exists in the slave States, it is founded on false reasoning, and is wrong in result. Among slaves, the white laborer is elevated by the fact of a caste below him; and in slave States there is an equality among white men which never can exist where the same race fill the places of master and menial.—Slaves are capital, and in the mind of the master there can be no contest between capital and labor—the contest from which so much of human suffering and oppression have arisen. No, sir; that slavery in the territory would not exclude white labor, the constant emigration from the non-slave to the slave States, conclusively establishes. This opposition to slavery is political, and rapid are the strides it is making in aggression. The mighty State of New York is now convulsed to its centre—men who were justly entitled to the appellation of statesmen, in its most dignified sense —who have filled the highest stations of honor and trust, are now identified with a movement at war with justice—at war with the constitution, and which, disturbing the tranquility of to-day, will, if not checked in its onward progress, reach disunion to-morrow. The time is not remote when an abolition meeting could not have been held in New York; but it has become political, and before this new form of the monster, duty, fraternity, faith, give way, and masses worship the idol without the fanaticism which alone could excuse the apostacy. With political abolitionists, what argument can avail? The security, the prosperity, the growth of a section only is considered; and all which would benefit those to whom they believe their interest opposed, must find therefrom resistance — Theirs is the policy so deeply and sadly deprecated by Mr. Jefferson, when he spoke of a geographical line coinciding with a marked principle, moral and political, which every new irritation would mark deeper and deeper. Theirs the policy which Mr. Monroe described in his letter to Mr. Jefferson as "an effort to give such a shape to our Union as would secure the dominion over it to its eastern section." That patriot statesman, in the same letter, as a justification for the treaty by which Texas was surrendered, describes the sectional struggle which existed at the time as so fierce and uncompromising, that it was necessary for the mutual peace to make the sacrifices of this treaty, and that it was from the contest the conclusion, "that the further acquisition of territory to the West and South involves difficulties of an internal nature, which menace the Union itself." This letter of Mr. Monroe, taken in connexion with that of Mr. Jefferson, to which it was a reply, shows how deep-seated and extreme was the opposition at that day to the growth and prosperity of the southern and western section of the Union. From the hazards which then impended over us, we were saved by the patriotic devotion of those northern men, who sacrified themselves for the peace and general welfare of the confederacy. Now, when like hazard and difficulty surrounds us, it is my pride and comfort to believe that like sacrifices, if necessary, will be made. To those who consider the Union worth preserving, it must be a primary object to give peace and security to its members. The pure and wise men who formed our republic, foresaw what events have so clearly demonstrated, that these objects were only to be certainly attained by approximating equality among the sections, and leaving all domestic affairs entirely to the control of the States. This policy has been generally adhered to, by admitting alternately slave and non-slave-holding States into the Union, and by affirming in solemn manner, at different periods in our history, the restricted character and general purposes of our federal government. Thus, on the 6th of January, 1838, the Senate of the United States, by a vote of thirty-one to eleven—

"Resolved, That it is the solemn duty of the government to resist to the extent of its constitutional power, all attempts by one portion of the Union to use it as an instrument of warfare, upon the domestic institutions of another, or to weaken or destroy each institution."

But ten years have passed since this declaration was made, yet mark how great has been the advance of aggression on the constitutional guaranties and principles of our compact, as at that day admitted. It is openly asserted, as a principle of action, that slaves shall be confined to the territory upon which they are now located, not for their benefit, but for the political advantage of the non-slaveholding States; or in other words to weaken, who can doubt, finally to destroy slave institutions. No longer is the claim to humanity set up, but the thirst for power goes step by step in this aggression with hostility to the African race. The Senator from New York, [Mr. DIX,] my friend who sits near me—and I do not use the phrase in a merely complimentary sense; in opposing the extension of slavery to wider limits, uses the following language:

"The tendency of the human race is to increase in a compound ratio of the extent and population secured to each individual contained. * * * The multiplication of the human species has exceeded the facts as indicated in certain instances. Nations can be made from a vegetable. * * * I have in mind a calculation which shows that the blacks, supposing them in the northern States does not increase, in a certain period, * * * Under the most favorable circumstances it is, and must continue to be, an inferior caste in the South. * * * A class thus degraded will not multiply. This is the first stage of retrogradation. The second almost certainly follows. It will not be reproduced; and in a few generations the process of extinction is performed."

And this is the moral teaching of those who assume to be our pastors, and offer their vicarious repentance for the sin of slavery. With surprise and horror, I heard this announcement of a policy which seeks through poverty and degradation the extinction of a race of human beings domesticated among us. We, sir, stand in such relation to that people as creates a feeling of kindness and protection. We have attachments which have grown with us from childhood—to the old servant who nursed us in infancy—to the man who was the companion of our childhood, and the not less tender regard for those who have been reared under our protection. To hear their extinction treated of as a matter of public policy, or of speculative philosophy, arouses our sympathy and our indignation. If I believed slavery to be the moral, social, and political evil which it is described—if I believed the advantage of rendering our population homogeneous to be as great as it is asserted, not then—no, nor if both were ten times greater—would I be reconciled to such a policy for such a purpose.

It has been usual for southern men to decline any discussion about the institution of domestic slavery, in the midst of which they have grown up, and of which they may be supposed to know something, however vituperative and unfounded the accusations made against it. Agreeing in the general propriety of this course, I nevertheless propose, on this occasion, to depart from the ordinary practice. The question is forced upon us by our northern brethren to such extent that silence, if persevered in, might be construed into admission of the truth of their accusations. In debates of Congress, by the press, by legislatures of the States, in the pulpit, and in primary assemblies it has become customary to denounce slavery as a political evil, as a burden on the government, as the sin and opprobrium of the nation—as destructive of good order and human advancement, as a blighting curse on the section where it exists, and a gangrene, extending its baleful influence to every portion of the Union. Now, sir, upon what do these assumptions rest? Have we been less faithful as citizens—have riots, conflagrations, or destruction of private property been more frequent in the slave than in the non-slave States? Have their citizens been less humane, their divines less pious, their statesmen less eminent, their soldiers less efficient than yours? If not, then why this unwarrantable denunciation—why this unfounded assumption? If it be a sin, you are not otherwise involved than by your connection with its introduction—with its existence you have nothing to do. As owners of the commercial marine, you were the importers of Africans—you sold them in the South—you are parties to a compact which recognizes them as property throughout the United States, and secures to their owners rights which, but for the confederation, would have been local. Show, then, your repentance, if you feel any, for having contributed to the increase of this property, by observing the obligations imposed by the circumstances of the case upon you; and the rights recognized in the fundamental, paramount law of our Union. The constitution did not create the institution of domestic slavery—it was no part of the object for which it was formed, to determine what should be property, but an important portion of its duty to generalize and protect the rights of citizens beyond the limits of State jurisdiction. From this duty has arisen all the intermediate acts in relation to slave property, yet, at this late period of the practice under our constitution, Senators assert that slavery is so purely local, that if a master pass with his slave into the limits of a State or territory where such property is not recognized by local law, the slave becomes free! that an act of Congress is in keeping with the legislation of those States in which the legal and constitutional obligations to surrender fugitive slaves have been nullified. It is in keeping with the repeated declaration here, made with the condescending air of a sovereign granting a favor—that there is no intention to interfere with slavery as it exists in the States, but that its further extension cannot be permitted. Do Senators forget that this government is but the agent, the creature of the States—that it derives its powers from them—not they from it—or institutions from it. Slavery existed in the States before the formation of the constitution—it needed no guarantee within their limits—its recognition beyond this was part of the more perfect Union, as its protection against all enemies whomsoever is part of the common defence for which that constitution was adopted. There is not a more prominent feature in the federal compact than the prohibition not to the States to interfere with commerce. But if a citizen of Maryland cannot pass through Pennsylvania or Ohio, on his way to Kentucky or Missouri without submitting his property to the tests of those States through which he is merely travelling, the right to free commerce among the States has no practical value. The right to uninterrupted transit is not varied by the character of the property—the power is the same, whether the question arise upon a slave or a bale of goods. There is no discretionary power, and a total prohibition would be less offensive than an invidious distinction, claiming to spring from a moral superiority. Each State is responsible for its own institutions—the sovereignty and coequality of all the States forbid the idea of moral responsibility on the part of one for the acts of another. If slavery be a sin, it is not yours. It does not rest upon your action for its origin, or your consent for its existence. It is a common-law right to property in the service of man—it traces back to the earliest government of which we have any knowledge, either among Jews or Gentiles. Its origin was Divine decree—the curse upon the graceless son of Noah. Slavery was regulated by the laws given through Moses to the Jews. Slaves were to be of the heathen, and with their offspring to descend by inheritance: thus, in the main particulars, being identical with the institution as it exists among us. It was foretold of the sons of Noah that Japhet should be greatly extended, that he should dwell in the tents of Shem, and Canaan should be his servant. Wonderfully has the prophecy been fulfilled—and here in our own country is the most striking example. When the Spaniards discovered America they found it in the possession of the "Indians"—many tribes were enslaved, but the sons of Shem were not doomed to bondage —they were restless, discontented, and liberated because they were unprofitable. Their places were supplied by the sons of Ham, brought across the broad Atlantic for this purpose—they came to their destiny, and were useful and contented. Over the greater part of the continent Japhet now sits in the tents of Shem, and in extensive regions Canaan is his servant. Let those who possess the best opportunity to judge, the men who have grown up in the presence of slave institutions as they exist in the United States, say if their happiness and usefulness do not prove their present condition to be the accomplishment of an all-wise decree, which may have for its end the preparation of that race for civil liberty and social enjoyment. Compare the slaves in the southern States with recently imported Africans, as seen in the West Indies, and who can fail to be struck with the immense improvement of the race, whether physically, morally, or intellectually considered. Compare our slaves with the free blacks of the northern States, and you find the one contented, well provided for in all their physical wants, and steadily improving in their moral condition; the other miserable, impoverished, loathsome from the deformity and disease which follows after penury and vice, covering the records of the criminal courts, and filling the penitentiaries. Mark the hostility to caste, the social degradation, which excludes the able from employment of profit or trust, and leaves the helpless to want and neglect. Then turn to the condition of this race in the States of the South, and view them in the relation of slaves. There no hostility exists against them—the master is the natural protector of his slave, and public opinion, common feeling, mere interest would not allow him to neglect his wants. Those who urge that exclusion of slavery from the territories does not exclude the slaveholder, because he may dispose of his property before emigration, show such inability to comprehend the attachment which generally subsists between a master and his slaves, that I will only offer to them interest as a motive for the care which is extended to those persons—securing comfort to the aged and to the infant, attention to the sick, and adequate provision to all. Such is the difference between the condition of the free and slave blacks under circumstances most favorable to emancipation. Does it warrant the desire on the part of any friend of that dependent race to hasten upon them responsibilities for which they have shown themselves so unequal? If any shall believe that the sorrow, the suffering, the crime which they witness among the free blacks of the North have resulted from their degradation by comparison with the white race around them, to such I answer, does the condition of St. Domingo, of Jamaica, give higher evidence? or do the recent atrocities in St. Martinique encourage better hopes? Sir, this problem is one which must bring its own solution, leave natural causes to their full effect, and when the time shall arrive at which emancipation is proper, those most interested will be most anxious to effect it. But as the obligation is mutual, so must the action be joint; and it is quite within the range of possibility that the masters may desire it when their slaves will object, as was the case when the serfs of Russia refused to be liberated by their landlords. Leave the country to the South and West open, and speculation may see in the distant future slavery pressed by a cheaper labor to tropical regions, where less exertion being required to secure a support, their previous preparation will enable them to live in independent communities. They must first be separated from the white man, be relieved from the condition of degradation which will always attach to them whilst in contact with a superior race, and they must be elevated by association and instruction—or, instead of a blessing, liberty would be their greatest curse. Under these considerations I cannot view the policy proposed to dam them up by the present limits of the slave States, as having one point either of humanity or sound policy to recommend it, or that it can do otherwise than perpetuate slavery even beyond its natural term in the States where it now exists.

When the colonies made common cause against the parent country and conquered their independence, no one State claimed the right to interfere with the domestic affairs of another; each was recognized sovereign within its limits, and all were disposed to respect the rights and feelings of each: had it been otherwise our confederation would never have been formed. This is changed, and strange as it may appear, the change follows the action of the very government whose interference with the domestic affairs of the colonies led to the revolution, a stronger still the first State to follow, is the same which was most oppressed in the colonial condition, and to her honor be it remembered, first raised the standard of revolutionary resistance.

When it was discovered that colored foreigners (from St. Domingo) had instigated the blacks of Charleston to murder the whites and burn the city, as a measure of policy warranted by humanity and necessary for security, a law was passed to exclude foreign colored persons from the city. For fourteen years this law was enforced without objection; then came British emancipation in the West Indies, British agitation, British publications against slavery, and then for the first time Massachusetts discovered that a duty was imposed on her to resist a law necessary to protect the lives and property of those for whom it was passed, a police regulation not directed against her inhabitants, but general in its effect and unmistakeable in its purpose. In the day of her colonial tribulation, Massachusetts sent an ambassador to South Carolina, she now sent another, but how different the missions. Then domestic interference was the grievance, now it was the purpose. And the end of the mission to maintain a right of colored inhabitants to violate a police regulation, which those best informed believed to be necessary to guard against the highest crimes and greatest misfortunes. A like mission was deputed to New Orleans where security to property had rendered similar regulations necessary. All this for the maintenance of a speculative philosophy which sees no guilt in crimes flowing from it, and asks for no practical result. Of all who engage in this agitation on the question of slavery, this indecent intrusion on the domestic affairs of others; I ask what remedy do you propose? We have heard you denounce it in coarsest abuse. We have felt your interference by legislative enactment to render our property less secure, by individual organization to seduce our slaves from comfort and contentment, to turn them penyless upon a community where they are despised and oppressed, and in a climate to which by constitution they are unsuited. We have seen you unite with our foreign enemies to defame us, and join those who for commercial purposes have warred against slavery as the cause of our supremacy in the cotton market of the world. But we have not seen the good you have done, or any other effect you have wrought than to generate distrust among the whites, and to produce a necessity for increased rigor over the slaves. What then do you propose? You speak of emancipation, but you know that immediate emancipation is impractable: that if the States would consent, the Treasury of the federal government would not approximate the purpose. More than this, you know that without slaves cotton could not be produced to supply your factories, and that ruin and want would stalk over your own villages, where now wealth and plenty reign. What prompts to your agitations. Not an instinctive opposition to involuntary servitude, as is shown by your readiness to give validity to the Mexican laws over California and New Mexico, and thus continue the Peon system, far more harsh and repulsive to my mind than our domestic slavery. Limits to the same influences, but without the controlling restraint which interest and the relation of permanent dependence creates in the case of the slave. Is it love for the African? No! his civil disability, his social exclusion, the laws passed by some of the non-slave States to prevent him if free, from settling within their limits, show beyond the possibility of doubt that it springs from no affection for the slave. Is it the moral conviction that there cannot be property in persons? No! you impeach that there cannot be property in persons? No! you impeach your own constancy objecting to their representation as persons in the councils of the federal government. Is it because, as has been said in this debate, slavery is a burden on the government, diminishing its power in peace and in war? If so, let the exports of the country answer, what section of the Union contributes most to supply our Treasury; let the history of our wars reply, as to the number and conduct of the troops which the slaveholding States have given to the service of the country. Those answers must show that this position is wholly untenable. The only conclusion is that you are prompted by the lust of power, and an irrational hostility to your brethren of the South. I say irrational, because an injury inflicted upon us would surely recoil upon you, and because the sons of the South may proudly challenge the recitation of an instance when they have opposed the interest of the North, because it was such; or been recusant to any of the compromises of, or under our constitution.

While northern men contend that the slave States shall not be extended, by participation in any acquired territories, they should remember, and blush to remember that Oregon was acquired by a treaty which ceded a large southern territory, and that southern men have been throughout, those who have led in the efforts to secure exclusive possession of Oregon. Floyd, Benton, and Linn, stopped not to balance political power, nor paused from their labors to secure Oregon to the settlement and use of our own people, because its climate and productions indicated the future erection of non-slave States. I have claimed for southern men that they have faithfully adhered to all compromises. Is there one which has been fully kept by the opposite party? The ordinance of 1787, which can only be considered a compact by subsequent acquiescence, contained a provision for the restoration of fugitive slaves, that being the only consideration given to the South. It has been flagrantly violated. In establishing the ratio of representation the South compromised by deducting two-fifths of the persons held to service, and the North has been from that time to this endeavoring to get rid of the compromise. Without a shadow of propriety, the admission of Missouri as a State of the Union was opposed because of her domestic institutions, the slave States to secure harmony conceded that slavery should be excluded from all that remaining part of the territory which was north of 36° 30′, but now when other territory is acquired, the North assert it all to be free territory, and refuse to declare the territory south of 36° 30′ to be open to the introduction of slaves, as good faith would require, if their assertion were tenable, and the territory in fact not equally open to the property of all the people of the United States. But inflamed by success in former contests, you march boldly to the conflict, and demand the whole. The mask is off, the purpose is avowed, that there shall be no further extension of "the slave power." The question is before us, it is a struggle for political power, and we must meet it at the threshold. Concession has been but the precursor of further aggression, and the spirit of compromise has diminished as your relative power increased. The sacrifices which the South has in other times made to the fraternity and tranquility of the Union are now cited as precedents against her rights. To compromise is to waive the application not to surrender the principles on which a right rests. It has been said that we are contending for an abstraction, a thing of no practical importance. If so, then why is it so obstinately resisted? Do you wish to gain another and a broader precedent for future use? The course of this debate justifies the supposition, and demands caution on our part. If to contend for principle the practical effect of which may be remote, is an abstraction, then, sir, the war of the revolution and the war of 1812, so far as the South was concerned, were both fought for abstractions. In the colonial condition the southern States were especially fostered by Great Britain, and their prosperity was rapidly increasing at the commencement of hostilities against the mother country. The acts of unjust and oppressive legislation were applied to the northern colonies. Sympathy, fraternal feeling, and devotion to principle, brought the South to your side in your first step to resistance. Again int he war of 1812, it was your seamen, not our's, who were impressed, and again from devotion to principle, and the obligations of our alliance, the South stood foremost in that conflict. The blood of her sons stained the battle-fields from Niagara to New Orleans; her exports, main dependence for her support, were cut off, and distress came to every hamlet and cottage; yet she murmured not, railed not, raised not the standard of opposition against the government whilst engaged in a foreign war.

I have said that the South has, on all occasions, been prompted by a sincere desire for domestic tranquility, and an ardent love for the Union. The conduct of her sons on this occasion has, I think, sustained her past character. To prevent further agitation, to secure peace, to perpetuate our Union, I am willing to go as far as my principles will allow. To compromise it is necessary that both parties should, to some extent, yield. To prevent continuance of the agitation, it is necessary that the conditions of the compromise should be express; that nothing should be left to doubtful construction. Finally, the value of any compromise we may make, must depend on the feelings of those for whom it is made, and to whom it is entrusted. If the spirit of compromise has departed from our people, it is idle to propose its forms. If the principles of the constitution are to be disregarded, and a self-sustaining majority, the days of the confederation are numbered. The men who have encountered past wars for the maintenance of principle, will never consent to be branded with inferiority, pronounced because of their domestic institutions unworthy of further political growth. If such be your determination, it were better that we should part peaceably, and avoid staining the battle fields of the revolution with the blood of civil war. Abraham said to his nephew Lot, when strife arose among their people, "Go thou to the right hand, and I will go to the left, and let there be peace between us."

If the folly, and fanaticism, and pride, and hate, and corruption of the day, are to destroy the peace and prosperity of the Union, let the sections part like the patriarchs of old, and let peace and good will subsist among their descendants. Let no wounds be inflicted which time may not heal. Let the flag of our Union be folded up entire, the thirteen stripes recording the original size of our family, untorn by the unholy struggles of civil war; its constellation to remain undimmed, and speaking to those who come after us of the growth and prosperity of the family whilst it remained united. Unmutilated let it lie among the archives of the republic, on some future day when wiser counsels shall prevail; when men have been sobered in the school of adversity, again to be unfurled over the continent-wide republic.

Sir, is the paltry consideration of political supremacy over those who do not possess the power, and have never shown the desire to intrude on the domestic affairs, to impede the growth, or to mar the prosperity of their nothern brethren? Can such consideration palliate this crusade against the South? Shall the fabric of human liberty and republican government, which was founded and built by the wisest and purest of our land, and left as a heritance for their children forever, be torn down by the first generation which succeeded to it, and left in ruin; an object for the republican's pity, the monarchist's scorn.

I hear and see the agitation of politicians, but from these I turn to the people; in their patriosm and good sense is my hope and confidence. They have no interest beyond the public good. To them, in this critical emergency, this imminent hazard, I look for safety, trusting that they will reject every interpolation on our compact which may endanger the perpetuity of our Union, and consign to the obscurity they merit every demagogue who caters to popular excitement, and seeks to elevate himself by an agitation which draws in its train the destruction of the compromises, the subversion of the principles on which the durability of our confederacy depends.

Mr. President: I have intentionally extended my remarks to many points not involved in the amendment I proposed to the Senate. That amendment was confined to the case presented by the bill under consideration, which, though not in terms, does in fact as I have shown, authorize the prohibition of slavery in Oregon. It asks no additional guarantee, no privilege, no concession, but is to prevent a construction which would recognize in the federal government, as in those who derive their authority from it, power to control the subject of slavery without the concurrence of the States. If this amendment be rejected, I shall view it as ominous of the future, and stand prepared for whatever consequences may follow.

Mr. CLAYTON.—This debate has been extended to a very great length. I do not rise for the purpose of endeavoring to arrest it. It is apparent, however, I think, from its progress thus far, that it is calculated rather to exasperate, than to conciliate and mollify. Different views have been presented by Senators who have participated in the discussion, and various amendments have been proposed to the bill now under consideration. Those amendments clash entirely with each other, and we have not been able to ascertain, even after this protracted debate, upon what ground the Senate is prepared to settle this great question, if any settlement of it can be made at all. We have not been able to ascertain what the sentiment of the Senate is upon the subject, and it seems to me as if we have been in session now quite as long as Congress is usually in session—it seems to me I say, highly important that we should know something of each other's views. We have done nothing thus far to ascertain what the views of the Senate will be, nor do I conceive that we are likely, if the debate runs on toan indefinite period, to ascertain those views. It seems to me then, that at this stage of the session, and under these circumstances, something should be done to ascertain, if possible, what the sense of the Senate is upon this great question. As the debate progresses, new amendments are offered, and if it continue, it is highly probable that we shall have many other propositions. Now at this time, the question may be said to be placed before one of the committees of this body—the Committee on Territories—of which I am a member. That committee has no desire whatever to avoid the responsibility thrown upon it by the Senate. It is perfectly willing to do its duty, and its whole duty, on this great subject. It is now preparing a bill on the subject; but that committee, as all are aware, at present consists of only four members; and I may ask, is it probable that having been constituted originally without any reference to this subject, is at all likely that it can report anything satisfactory to the Senate? Is it probable that such a committee could reconcile conflicting opinion upon this great subject? Is it likely that that committee can present all the views and information which the Senate would require? I have been present in this chamber, when a question of as great magnitude as the present was before it, and recollect very well the course adopted by the Senate on that occasion; I refer to the compromise tariff of 1842. The ordinary committee of the Senate, to which the subject might have been referred, were discharged from the consideration of it, and it was placed in the hands of a special committee of seven members, through whose intervention and agency, the question was disposed of, as I think, to the satisfaction of the country. At the time of the Missouri compromise, efforts were made in vain to settle that question through the ordinary committees of the body, and it was eventually settled by a committee of conference, consisting of eight members, three from the Senate and five from the House. The members of that committee represented the various sections of the United States, and were enabled to inform each other of the feelings and views of every part of the country. By them the question was settled in a satisfactory manner. I am deeply impressed with the conviction, that if the important question now before the Senate be settled at all, it must be by the same means that were adopted in the cases to which I have referred, and if the question is not to be settled, it is highly important that somebody should be constituted by the Senate, possessing power and influence enough to be able to satisfy us on that point, so that we may in that case drop the consideration of the subject—terminate the debate which is exciting and agitating the whole nation—proceed to discharge our other duties and go home. Now, with the view to concentrate opinion, if it be possible to act with effect, or if not, with a view to ascertain that fact so that we may proceed to discharge the pressing business of the country, leaving this question to the future, I move that a committee of eight members be appointed by the Senate for the purpose of taking this question under their consideration, to be composed of four members from the northern section of the Union, and four from the southern, to be chosen by ballot. If the Senate should adopt this proposition, I would suggest that the committee should be so organized as to make it apparent to the whole country that this is no party movement; in other words, that two of the members from the North should be chosen from one party, and two from the other, and so with respect to the members from the South.

Mr. FOOTE.—I was one of those who were exceedingly gratified a few days since, when the olive branch was extended to the South by northern hands. I refer to the suggestions made in regard to the Missouri compromise. Deeply regretting the general temper and tone of this debate, which have been, in my judgment, well calculated to extinguish harmony and cause discord, and, perhaps, worse consequences to spring up in our midst. I can say with great sincerity, and am confident that I do not stand alone in the expression of that sentiment, that I feel greatly rejoiced at the proposition which has just been made by the distinguished Senator from Delaware. I hope it will be met in the spirit in which it has been offered. and I have risen only for the purpose of expressing that desire, and making a reply to an observation which, if unresponded to, might perhaps, to some extent, in the estimation of some, implicate others and myself in a supposed understanding that, if this committee shall not be able to adopt some plan of compromise, the Senate is to regard itself as prohibited from any further efforts in its general legislative capacity to arrive at the same object. I simply wish to be distinctly understood on this point, that, whilst warmly approving the proposition of the Senator from Delaware, even though the efforts which he proposes to be made should not be successful, I, for one, shall feel bound, as I intimated some time ago, in case the matter be not settled in this way, to struggle on as a member of this body in the effort, by every sort of legitimate and proper expedient, to bring about a settlement of this much vexed and perilous question. I shall never be willing to go home leaving this question open and undivided, apprehending, as I do most sincerely, the worst results from such a course. At present I say nothing more.

Mr. FITZGERALD.—I rise only for the purpose of having an explanation in regard to a charge, unintentionally made, no doubt, against the State which I have the honor in part to represent. I allude to the published speech of the very distinguished Senator from South Carolina, made upon this floor some days since, upon the subject still under consideration. That gentleman is made to charge the northern States with violating the ordinance of '87, by the passage of laws to prohibit the reclamation of fugitives from service. Now, what I desire is, to appeal to that distinguished Senator to do the State which I have in part the honor to represent, the justice to produce any such law from her statute book, or, failing in that, to declare her free from liability to such a charge. I am well aware that that gentleman would be the last in existence to charge unjustly any State or any individual. If I am mistaken, I hope the gentleman will excuse me, and put me right. If I am not mistaken, I beg the gentleman to attribute the present appeal, to my zeal for the character and honor of that State.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I respond very cheerfully to the appeal made by the Senator from Michigan, but I am very sorry to say that the answer will not be satisfactory. The amount of my remark was, that the ordinance of '87 was a compromise between the North and the South—that the South yielded up to the northern States the exclusive right of settling the northwest territory, and that the North entered into a solemn stipulation with the South, that they would deliver up fugitive slaves, and the point of my charge was, not that any specific laws had been passed, but that the northern States had pursued a course which has rendered utterly null and void that stipulation. I am sorry to say that Michigan is one of those States, and if the Senator wants proof of that, I refer him to a memorial from the legislature of Kentucky presented this very session, which has been referred to a committee who have examined all the facts, and ascertained that citizens of Kentucky, in endeavoring to reclaim fugitive slaves found in Michigan, were overpowered and prevented from recovering their property. Now, the stipulation into which these States entered was not simply that they would not pass laws rendering that stipulation nugatory, but that they should pass laws to protect us, and use their whole power and authority for the purpose of delivering up these fugitive slaves. If Michigan have passed no law against us, she has either omitted to pass laws to fulfil that stipulation, or neglected to enforce them within her limits.

Mr. FITZGERALD.—I beg leave to state, in reply, that although individuals in the State of Michigan may have attempted to prevent the reclamation of fugitive slaves, yet the State authorities are not to be charged with bad faith to the South. We have a few abolitionists in that State, and on some occasions their conduct and declarations have been such as to cause sincere regret on the part of the great body of the people. The legislature has never yet complied with their request, or passed any law to prevent the reclamation of fugitives from service; and so far as I know and believe, the people of the State and the authorities have been anxious to see the spirit of that ordinance carried into full effect. Such, at least, have been my views and feelings; and so far as I have been able to judge, I can say they have been shared by the great body of the people. I would ask the gentleman whether the State of Michigan, in its legislative capacity, or in any other capacity as a State, or whether the great body of its citizens should be held responsible for the conduct of a few individuals, who, on some one or two occasions, may, for aught I know, have violated the laws—may have, as the gentleman insists, violated the spirit of that ordinance?

Mr. CALHOUN.—Michigan was bound to pass laws to carry out that ordinance. I wish I could place my hands upon the report in reference to the facts presented in the memorial from the legislature of Kentucky. A greater outrage never was committed by one people upon another than in that case. Insult was heaped upon injury; and I ask, was the State justified in remaining a passive spectator? Again, is it not known, that for years, there have been organized individuals in Michigan, who have run our slaves through her territory into Canada? Has she taken any steps to prevent that? I do not say these things willingly, but with great reluctance! Would it were otherwise. I would rejoice if the stipulations of the constitution were fulfilled on all sides; but, I must say, that there have been most flagrant violations of these stipulations, not on the part of Michigan alone, but on that of almost every one of the free States.

Mr. CORWIN.—I wish to inquire whether the Supreme Court has not expressly decided that the States can pass no such laws whatever?

Mr. CALHOUN.—My colleague, who has been investigating that subject, will answer the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER.—The case which the Senator from Ohio refers to, I presume is that of Pennsylvania vs. Prigg; in which some of the judges of the Supreme Court undertook to deliver opinions on questions not really involved; and such as did not fall within the scope of the authoritative judgment of the court. The constitutional validity of an act of the legislature of Pennsylvania, was alone involved in the issue before the court. The act made it a felony for the owner of a fugitive slave to pursue and apprehend him within the limits of that State, without pursuing certain statutory prescriptions that were calculated, and perhaps intended to throw impediments in the way of the owner in the pursuit of his slave, escaping from his service. The defendant had been arraigned before the State court, and by their judgment, was subject to the penalties of the act to pay a large fine, and be put to hard labor for seven years, for no other offence than taking possession—forcibly—of his own property. The Supreme Court unanimously decided that the act was unconstitutional and void, inasmuch as it was a prohibition on the perfect rights of the owner over his fugitive slave—his dominion being under the guaranties of the constitution, as perfect and complete in one State as in another. In other words, that no State had the right by any State statute to prevent the owner from apprehending his fugitive slave. The judgment in fact went no further—but a majority of the judges gave opinions going beyond this—and in their judgment—individual judgments of course—held that the power to legislate on the subject of fugitive slaves, exclusively belong to Congress—and whilst they hold that under the constitution, the States were bound to deliver up fugitive slaves; that they could be alone compelled to do so by the legislation of Congress. From this, these judges concluded that all the State legislation, whether intended to retard or facilitate the owner in the apprehension of his fugitive slave was unconstitutional. Seeing the tendency of those opinions—for they were nothing more than so many opinions—not essentially entering into the judgment of the court, the chief justice and two others—Thompson and Daniel—filed their own opinions, in which they endeavored to obviate such consequences of an unqualified judgment of the court.

They held that the non-slaveholding States could pass no laws to prohibit the owner from exercising his constitutional rights—in reclaiming his runaway slave; but that they might make such laws as would facilitate the delivery, which the obligations of good faith would seem to demand at their hands. In the early legislation on this subject, such had been the character of the statutory provisions of most of the States. In other words, it was not wrong to cooperate by State action to carry out the objects of the federal constitution; whilst they were prohibited from opposing its provisions, by hostile enactments. The Judiciary Committee—in the report which I had the honor to submit sometime ago—took the same view, and gave their unqualified assent to the views expressed by the chief justice and his concurring colleagues. Justice Baldwin, in more judgments than one, entertained the same views. I submit that the authoritative judgment of the committee, and the opinions of a bare majority of the judges, were essentially different things. When the opinions shall come to be examined, there cannot be a question as to the weight of the argument being in favor of the views of the chief justice. Some of the non-slaveholding States have taken advantage of the bearing of this decision, and have framed their laws in such a way as to make it criminal for their State officers to give any assistance in the apprehending and delivery of a fugitive slave. In this it was obvious that the obligations of good faith had been violated. Indeed, the design seems to be to evade these obligations.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I would state, in addition to the explanation of my colleague, that at the time, I regarded that decision as the most extraordinary one ever made. It had been the practice of the non-slaveholding States to pass such laws, and their constitutional power to do so had never been questioned. The provision of the constitution for the recovery of fugitive slaves is connected with another immediately in juxtaposition with it—the provision for the delivering of fugitives from justice. Both come under what is called extradition treaties, perfectly familiar to every public man, and as well interpreted as any treaties in the world can be interpreted. Every State in the Union takes an efficient part in the delivery of fugitives from justice. That is the case also with respect to England. I appeal to every man who has ever been in the State Department, whether the States do not take efficient steps in the delivery of fugitives from justice? And shall another provision, standing in the constitution, worded in the same manner, receive a different and most absurd interpretation? For, if the States are to stand by themselves and make no efforts whatever, who does not see that the power of the United States will not be competent to fulfil the law, if the power of the United States is so very remote that it can never be exercised? The committee has reported a bill with a view to carry into effect the powers of the United States; and we shall see how the gentleman will act on that bill.

Mr. CORWIN.—I am perfectly satisfied that the Senator stated the decision as recorded in our books. It is enough to say that a majority of the bench have decided the question which I proposed.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I do not recognize the decision.

Mr. CORWIN.—I will not undertake to say, from a very accurate criticism of the case, whether the point now suggested was brought up directly before the court; but it was discussed before it, as one of the questions necessary to arrive at the decision on the main point; and being discussed by the counsel on both sides, the question was as fully decided by the court as any other brought before them. In regard to the legislation of the States, I am not prepared to say whether the gentleman from South Carolina is fully correct in the statement of his views. But I think the gentlemen from the South have allowed their sensibilities to be quite too much excited on this subject. With regard to the transactions referred to in Kentucky, there has been a great mistake as to the facts. Commissioners were sent on behalf of the State of Kentucky to the State of Ohio, for the purpose of negotiating a treaty of extradition, as the gentleman from South Carolina calls it; and I have only to say, that we did not imprison them nor send them home. We allowed them to remain at our court, where, with the help of the imperial parliament of Ohio, a law was enacted perfectly satisfactory to both sides, and almost in terms the same as the law of Pennsylvania, which was decided upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. That law was repealed by the legislature of the State of Ohio, for the simple reason that the highest judicial tribunal in the United States had decided that they had no constitutional power to pass it. Now, if these States lying within that district of country spoken of as included in the ordinance of '87, are denounced for not complying, as is supposed, with the terms of that ordinance, when it is shown that they have legislated exactly according to the prescription of that only tribunal who can interpret judicially the constitution of the United States, all I can say is, that the charge falls harmless at our feet, and that all christendom, in all time to come, will absolve us of it.

Mr. BUTLER.—I hope the gentleman will inform us whether that extraordinary embassy from Kentucky to the "Imperial Court" of Ohio was not occasioned by the intolerable mischiefs which the people of Kentucky suffered from the escaping of their slaves into Ohio beyond the reach of reclamation?

Mr. CORWIN.—I will answer the Senator with great pleasure. The embassy originated in the solicitude of our sister State of Kentucky to preserve amicable relations with us. The reason assigned by the embassy was, that our law did not furnish to them the means of reclaiming their fugitive slaves. The people of the United States had acted upon the subject in the law of 1793; but it seems that they did not act with that degree of efficiency necessary, in the judgment of the people of Kentucky, to secure to them their property. There was another reason which induced the State of Ohio to entertain that negotiation, and to enact this law.—The people of Ohio were just as solicitous as their fellow-citizens of Kentucky, to have a statute on that subject, or at least embracing many of the cases supposed in Kentucky to fall within the law. There were, I believe, a few felons in Kentucky—for there is, I believe, a penitentiary there—and occasionally it contained individuals supposed to have committed crimes. Some of them finding it inconvenient to execute their purposes in Kentucky, were in the habit of coming over to Ohio for the purpose of kidnapping slaves. Occasionally a gentleman would be killed in this amiable pursuit; and the apology was that they had come to reclaim fugitive slaves. If this statement were false, no harm was done; if true, the man who shot him was punished as a murderer, under the law of Ohio. It was, therefore, very desirable on both sides, as well to protect Kentucky in claiming her slaves as to protect Kentuckians from coming over to kidnap—a very common practice in all States bordering on slave States—with which we were greatly troubled, the expense from penitentiaries being very considerably augmented from that very source—that the question should be settled.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I cannot permit the Senator to escape even under a decision of the Supreme Court. By express contract between the rest of the States and the people inhabiting these territories, which are now States, the latter bound themselves to deliver up our fugitive slaves. They are the parties to that contract, under the ordinance, and it has not been superseded by the constitution.

Mr. CORWIN.—Have not the Supreme Court, to which reference has been made, interpreted our rights, duties, and powers, under that compact?

Mr. CALHOUN.—Simply and only under the constitution of the United States. They could not put aside a contract. It stands upon higher principles. It stands entirely on different ground from the case in Pennsylvania. The decision has not been confirmed, and I trust never will be. I have always considered it as the most extraordinary decision ever made. But I put that aside, and present the positive contract between these parties. There was no United States government then to fulfill it. The old Congress had no such power. There stands the contract—and will ever stand—around which it is impossible to go.

Mr. CORWIN.—I have only one remark in reply to the Senator's view of our obligations under the ordinance. When the Supreme Court decided that, under the constitution, made subsequently to that ordinance, these States had no power to pass such laws, unquestionably they have given a judicial interpretation to their rights, power, and duties under the ordinance as well as under the constitution. The truth is, that the ordinance and the constitution are in the very same words. Whatever obligations there may be under the ordinance of '87 remain under the constitution, and are reimposed by that instrument. Now, it must be seen, that the decision of the Supreme Court comprehends every obligation under which the State of Ohio or any northwestern State has been placed by virtue of that ordinance. Surely, if that compact, in the judgment of the Supreme Court, had had an obligation above the constitution and beyond it, they would have said so. It is true that the case was one from Pennsylvania, but much of the discussion, as every gentleman who attended to it at that time knows, was upon this very ordinance. But that is immaterial. If the obligations under the constitution of the United States which the State of Ohio, or any other State of the northwest territory owes to the South, as it is called, exists by virtue of the constitution of the United States, they are not tolerated in legislating upon the subject.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I cannot permit even that view of the case to pass. The constitution expressly provides for the continuance of this contract between the United States and the people that inhabited the northwest territory. The sixth article of the constitution contains an express permission that "all debts contracted and engagements entered into before the adoption of this constitution shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution as under the confederation." Now, is it not manifest that the ordinance of '87 looked to its fulfillment under the present government and not the old confederation, which had no machinery, no capacity to excute it? If the words of the ordinance and those in the constitution are precisely the same—and I have not compared them—it is one of the strongest a guments to show that the decision of the court was wrong, and that the words of the constitution ought to have received the interpretation of the prior words instead of the prior words receiving the interpretation of the latter.

Mr. CORWIN.—I do not intend to controvert the right of the gentleman to take an appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court, but I do not know where he can find any revisory power at present.

Mr. CALHOUN.—That being admitted, everything is admitted. These States, if they have not violated the stipulation, have permitted it to be violated incessantly. It is of that we complain.

Mr. BRIGHT.—The very important motion made by the Senator from Delaware seems to have been lost sight of. He moves to refer the bill under discussion, together with so much of the President's message as relates to territorial governments in Upper California and New Mexico to a select committee.

Mr. CLAYTON.—My motion embraces only the bill before the Senate, with the amendments.

Mr. BRIGHT.—I suppose the object of the Senator is to refer so much of the message as relates to the territories which I have named to the same committee?

Mr. CLAYTON.—No; only the bill and the amendments.

Mr. BRIGHT.—I ask whether it is not the intention of the Senator to refer also the question connected with the organization of governments in the territories which I have named to the same committee?

Mr. BERRIEN.—If the Senator will permit me, I will state my view of the motion. I understand that the motion is to refer this bill, with the several amendments, to a committee, constituted in the manner suggested by the Senator. The consequence of such a reference would be, I prreume, to induce the Committee on Territories to forbear their action upon the other bills which are before them until the sense of the Senate, shall be known upon the report of that committee. The purpose of the motion of the Senator from Delaware is not to withdraw from that committee the subjects which they have now under their control, but to refer this bill which is now under the consideration of the Senate in order that it may be ascertained by the conference of the members of that committee, whether they cannot devise some plan which may serve to extricate us from our embarrassments in relation to this bill, and also serve to guide the Committee on Territories in relation to the bills which they have in charge.

Mr. BRIGHT.—Sustaining the relations which I do to the Committee on Territories, I thought proper to make a reply to the motion of the Senator from Delaware. I have nothing to say in reference to the bill under discussion. If the debate can be arrested and action had by the reference in the manner proposed, I, for one, shall be much gratified. The inference, however, is a very clear one, that if this bill be referred to the committee, the subjects to which I alluded—the organization of governments in New Mexico and California, will also be referred. Indeed, I think it is proper that it should be so referred. It will be recollected that when a proposition was made the other day to enlarge the Committee on Territories, by adding to its number two members, after exhausting a day in debate, the Senate refused to increase that committee. The committee considered that as tantamount to instructing them to go to work and propose bills for the organization of both these territories. Accordingly we have met twice, and I am happy to say that we have bills in a forward state of preparation, and that we shall probably be able to report them in two or three days. Whether a majority of us can agree with reference to the report that we ought to make on the subject that seems to divide us, I am not prepared to say; but from what has occurred I am encouraged to hope that we may be able to report a bill extending the Missouri compromise. If, however, it be the pleasure of the Senate to refer the bill under discussion, I hope that the Committee on Territories will be discharged from the consideration of those portions of the President's message which relate to the organization of territorial governments in New Mexico and California. The only difficulty on that subject is the slave question. Had it not been for theintroduction of that question, I apprehend that Oregon would have had a government to-day. I hope, then, that the whole subject will be entrusted to the select committee.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I am very much in favor of the motion which has been made by the Senator from Delaware. Here we are, nearly at midsummer, with a vast extent of territory unorganized, and from a portion of which the most urgent appeals have been made for our protection. So far as Oregon is concerned the delay is in my opinion inexcusable. That territory is so situated that it is not contended by the North that slavery can ever go there. The south concede that they do not wish nor expect it to go there; and yet here we are making speeches day after day, and getting further apart on the question of the extension of slavery to Oregon. This motion of the Senator from Delaware affords the first gleam of sunshine upon the subject. I hope the committee will be raised, that the whole subject will be referred to it, and that a practical result will be attained.

Mr. HALE.—I confess that I entirely dissent from the honorable Senator from New York. It does not seem to me that this motion of the Senator from Delaware indicates any clear sky at all. The only effect of it will be to throw a mist all around us. In fact, I do not know why it should be assumed that there is any great difficulty in coming to a conclusion on this subject. To be sure we have talked a good deal about it, and so we talked upon the ten regiment bill. But this amount of talk does not indicate any want of decision upon the subject. I do not see what ground this bill presents to those who have spoken upon either side of the question, on which to make a compromise. Where is the territory of Oregon? It is all north of forty-two degrees. And where is the necessity, then, of extending the Missouri compromise to a region, the most southern limit of which is forty-two degrees of north latitude? I think this assumption of difficulty in the settlement of the case will not be sustained by the facts when the vote is taken. Perhaps many gentlemen desire to speak to the question. I have some idea of prescribing my own views upon it, but I am willing to forego that instanter, if the action of the Senate will thereby be facilitated. But let me say one word, as expressive of my serious conviction. When you undertake here, by a vote of the Senate, and a compromise got up by this committee to settle this question, you talk of doing that which is altogether beyond your power. There is a feeling upon this subject throughout the land, which will guide the Senate, instead of being controlled by it. If we think that by the magic influence of our votes or our speeches upon this subject, we are to settle this question, I apprehend that those of us who go home to our constituents, having betrayed the interests which they entrusted to us, will find that we have an account to settle with them, much more difficult than the settlement proposed to be made here. The feeling which animates the people in that part of the country from which I come, is as controlling as any feeling can possibly be, in any section of the Union. This is a subject which does not admit of compromise. Let us recall to our minds the true statement of the question now before us, and then we may be able, perhaps, to appreciate at its real value this proposition for a compromise. The question is, whether the energies, the power, and authority of this government are to be exerted for the extension of the institution of slavery over the territory of Oregon.

Mr. FOOTE.—I rise to a point of order. The Senator is out of order in undertaking to discuss the merits of the bill. I have no desire to interrupt the Senator, but merely wish to prevent inflammatory discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senator from New Hampshire is discussing the expediency of referring the bill to a committee, and is, therefore, not out of order.

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator was speaking of the feeling in New England on this subject.

Mr. HALE.—I did not name New England, and I was about to conclude my remarks. Certainly I feel this call to order a little more keenly, because it comes from a gentleman who always confines himself so closely to the subject matter before the Senate. I was about to remark that I wished to see a vote upon this question. I think that a vote negativing the provisional legislation of the people of Oregon, would be one of the most illuminating documents that could go out to the people, and would have a greater tendency to settle this question than any report that any committee could make. There is another proposition upon which I would like to see a vote: it is upon the proposition to strike out that prohibition of slavery which the people of Oregon have incorporated in their provisional legislation. I am utterly at a loss to know how there can be any compromise upon these propositions. I cannot possibly conceive what compromise can be made with respect to a territory in which it is conceded slavery cannot exist. Why did we not compromise when we annexed Texas? The whole of that was given up to slavery. There was nothing said about compromise there.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—Yes—yes!

Mr. HALE.—I know what I am talking about. The bill passed through all its stages, and the idea of compromise was never suggested until the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories—then a member of the House—got up, and just as the vote was about to be taken, appealed to the honorable member from Tennessee, who introduced the bill, [Mr. Milton Brown] and asked him if he had any objection to have a provision inserted in the bill prohibiting slavery north of 36° 30'. The honorable gentleman said that he had not; and why? Because there was no more of Texas, as was then supposed, that was north of 36° 30' than there was of New Hampshire south of that line, for the territory of New Mexico ran down south of that parallel, and the city of Santa Fe, which General Kearney lately conquered, is itself south of this 36° 30'. The provision was accordingly inserted in the bill.

Mr. RUSK.—I do not like to remain silent while facts are misstated. I am prepared to show that Texas extended far above that line.

Mr. HALE.—I am speaking only of the boundaries of New Mexico as they existed; and if all the maps which we have had published from the beginning of time are to be relied upon, the city of Santa Fe lies south of 36° 30'.

Mr. RUSK.—The same sort of reasoning would exclude Texas from the possession of any soil at all, because the maps show that Mexico came up to the Sabine.

Mr. HALE.—If the President's message is to be relied upon, Santa Fe was a part of the enemy's country conquered by General Kearney.

Mr. RUSK.—The title of Texas dates back to her revolution. It grew up anterior to any message of the President in relation to Texas. We hold that title neither under maps of Mexico nor messages of the President of the United States. Our revolution took place in 1836, and it is upon that and the acquisition of territory by virtue of that revolution, the treaties entered into with Mexico, and her recognition of the Rio Grande as the boundary, that we base our title.

Mr. HALE.—I do not intend to say one word in derogation of the title of Texas. She may run her boundary north to 54° 40' if she pleases. I have stated only the broad and notorious fact, that it was only at the very last stage of the Oregon bill in the House of Representatives, that the proposition to apply the compromise was introduced. The people of Oregon have incorporated that principle into their provisional legislation. They are willing to abide by that line. How do those who were friendly to that arrangement show their good faith, when the very motion pending before the Senate is, that the legislation which has been had shall not be so construed as to adopt any such institution as slavery?—Whenever there is any thing that a northern man suspects, I am willing to go as far as any body; but it seems to me that this is something that does not admit of compromise. You cannot ask a man to do that which, in his conscience, he believes to be wrong, because that implies that which the Senator from Maryland so eloquently urged the other day as involving moral degradation, which he said was worse than disunion. I trust that we may at once have a vote upon one or the other of the propositions.

Mr. BUTLER.—I am not one of those who think that this question has gone beyond the reach of compromise. The Senator from New Hampshire has said that, in his judgment, the question can undergo no changes, and he draws the inference that southern members are anxious to extend slavery to the territory of Oregon by positive legislation. I think the Senator, from his local position, takes a circumscribed view of the subject. I should regard the 12th section of this bill as very innocent, were it not that gentlemen have advertised us that they intend to extend that principle to every other bill which may be introduced into this body for the government of the other territories, which are hereafter added to this Union. I know that the precedent of to-day is the prescription of to-morrow, and that as certain as we sanction, directly or indirectly, any such legislation affecting Oregon, it will be transferred under authority of our own action to other territories. All that is now proposed is, to make an honorable effort to settle this agitating question consistently, if possible, with the rights and feelings of every section of the confederacy. My solemn conviction is, that unless this question be settled now, all the consequences which have been apprehended may, and I am not prepared to say will not, follow.

Mr. HALE.—I must repeat what I said before, that where a moral principal was not involved, I was ready to go as far as the farthest for compromise. There is one way of compromise which seems open to me. Let us, in a spirit of magnanimity which will be felt and recognized every where throughout the world, come forward and tell Mexico that what we have taken from her injured us infinitely more than her—that we have found it to be nothing but a bone of contention, and that we return it to her. Let us say to Mexico, take it all back and keep it. Into that compromise I am prepared at once to enter, but I can never be a party to any compromise that involves moral dereliction—and when I speak of that I do not mean to guage any man's conscience by mine own. All the horrors of dissolution I can look steadfastly in the face, before I could look to that moral ruin which must fall upon us, when we have so far prostituted ourselves as to become the pioneers of slavery over these territories. When the American eagle plumes his wing for new flights, let it never be to overshadow the land with the dark pall of slavery.

Mr. FOOTE.—The suggestion which has been made by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] touching the propriety of yielding back to Mexico all those valuable territorial acquisitions recently secured to us by treaty, I shall not undertake to reply to seriously. I shall be slow to believe that there is a single sensible, patriotic man in any part of the republic, who, if subjected to regular test, would be found willing to stultify this nation so signally before the civilized world, as would be the inevitable consequence of a proceeding so unprecedented and so unwise. The Senator from New Hampshire can scarcely be serious in urging this view of the subject upon our attention. The Senator declares his capability of "looking all the horrors of dissolution steadfastly in the face." In this respect I differ with the honorable Senator very greatly indeed; there is no evil that I could not look in the face with more calmness and composure than the dissolution of this glorious confederacy. I do not understand how any patriot can gaze with steadfastness and resignation on any such event. As a man devoted to the Union of these States—sworn to support the constitution—whose grand purposes, as declared in the preamble to the instrument itself, to be—

"To form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty"— to the generation which honored it and their "posterity"—I cannot see how any member of this body can reconcile it to himself to aid, either directly or indirectly in any measure or act calculated in the least degree to defeat any one of these great objects. I design to impugn the conscientiousness and patriotism of no member of the Senate, when I say, that I regard every Senator here as bound by the constitutional oath which he has taken, to do nothing, and say nothing, here or elsewhere, at all likely to put in peril the Union of these States, or to endanger our "domestic tranquility." And yet it is most obvious that several gentlemen here, including the Senator from New Hampshire, seem to take a very different view of their official responsibilities under the constitution from that which I have deemed it my duty to state.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I have not participated in the excitement which has been manifested on this subject, because in all sincerity, I can say that I feel none. I am a representative in part of one of the slave States; but it is a State, which it has always been difficult to say, whether it belongs to the North or to the South. A committee of lawyers, it is said, was once appointed to decide the question, as to whether Delaware was a northern or a southern State. It was urged on the part of the South, that the northern boundary was a portion of Mason's and Dixon's line; that was thought to have settled the question at once. But on the part of the North it was immediately afterwards shown that the southern and western lines were also run by Mason and Dixon.

So the committee threw the matter up in despair, and I believe it has never been settled to which portion of the Union that State belongs. I feel, then, on this occasion, very little excitement. But, the people of my State, in the midst of this excitement, appear to be situated very much like the game cock in the stable with the horses. When they began to make a disturbance, he cried out, "gentlemen, let us make a bargain; let us agree that no gentleman here shall fly into a passion, or a stampede, or tread on another one's toes."

I wish to say, in corroboration of what has been stated in part, by the Senator from South Carolina, that the object of my motion is not to discharge the territorial committee from any portion of the duties which devolve upon them, in consequence of the reference already made of portions of the President's message, relative to the organization of territorial government in California and New Mexico. I desire to leave the committee in possession of that subject, and that the Oregon bill alone, with all the amendments which have been made to it, may go to the select committee. I would also state, for the information of those who do not perhaps comprehend the reason for this particular motion, the object which I have in view. In any event, I desire that the territorial committee should report, with the advice and information which they may obtain from the Secretary of the Treasury, a bill to extend our revenue laws over these two territories. A bill on that subject is in course of preparation, and whatever may be the decision in relation to the other great and engrossing topic, I think we shall all agree in the extension of our revenue laws over the country, if the Secretary of the Treasury thinks it proper and necessary to do so.

That subject may be separated with great propriety from the main question, and the Territorial Committee can at once proceed to act upon it, holding themselves of course subject to the action of the select committee in relation to the great and exciting question. I hope therefore, that the Territorial Committee will retain possession of the matter referred to them. No motion has been made to discharge them from the consideration of these subjects. It is not the Oregon bill alone which is proposed to be referred to the select committee, for the various amendments go with it, and they embrace the whole controversy between the North and the South. The whole subject in controversy will thus come up before the committee, which will be enabled to ascertain whether it is practicable to obtain any settlement of it at present. If that result be impracticable, I, for one, would be disposed to leave the matter over for the present. But I will never abandon the hope that we shall eventually be enabled to settle this question honorably and satisfactorily to all parties. I have no more northern or southern feeling, but as a sincere friend of the union of the States, and desirous to prevent unnecessary excitement, I wish to raise the committee. There is another reason for taking this course which I would suggest to gentlemen who have doubted its propriety. By continuing the debate here and acting on the various amendments gentlemen will be committed during this session of Congress, to specific propositions, leading to the embarrassment of their action hereafter. If, at a future session that course should be impracticable to which they may now be disposed to give their assent, it is obvious that gentlemen will feel more or less embarrassed. They will desire to adhere to the decision which they may now give. I desire to avoid that state of things. If Senators fail to agree now I desire the minds of all to remain open to conviction, so that in the recess they may be enabled to reflect in the calm tranquility of their own homes, upon the importance of this great question, and the paramount obligation to preserve the union of these States. I am not anxious to press the matter to a vote, unless it is to be a successful vote. I hope then that the committee will be appointed, and that an honest effort will be made to settle this question. A variety of legislative business awaits our action. The appropriation bills have been all kept back, and with other important measures of the session, are delayed, and in danger, of being lost. Let us then stop this debate, go on with our business, and await the action of the committee, which will be able to report in a few days, when we shall know whether we are to have a settlement of the question or not.

Mr. HALE rose to address the Senate.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I call the gentleman to order. He has already spoken three times upon this subject, and the rule limits him to speaking twice.

Mr. HALE.—I call the Senator to order for a miscount; I have spoken only twice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Shall the Senator from New Hampshire have leave to proceed?

The question being decided in the affirmative, the Senator was allowed to proceed.

Mr. HALE.—I am obliged to the Senate for its indulgence. I rose only for the purpose of correcting a misapprehension of the Senator from Mississippi. The honorable Senator has alledged that I am affiliated in some way with a society or organization who have resolved to destroy the Union.

Mr. FOOTE.—I said more or less affiliated. They have determined, if the Senator be nominated at Buffalo, that we shall have a hail storm with a vengeance.

Mr. HALE.—Oh! all that will certainly be footed up when it comes. I must say that I am very sorry to have wounded the tender sensibilities of the Senator from Florida. His peculiar sensibility on this subject leads me to suppose that he must have been originally, a northern man, for northern men, I know, somehow become endowed with exquisite sensibilities when they get South. Except as a member of the great human family—and I don't know whether that includes the blacks also, but I believe they are human—I am not affiliated in any way with the organization to which the Senator from Mississippi has referred.

Mr. FOOTE.—I ask the Senator whether as a candidate, he does not indulge fond expectations that he will get the vote of that faction?

Mr. HALE.—Let me answer the Senator. In the first place, I do not look upon an election to the Presidency as a very great honor; and in the next place, I have not any very ardent hopes of an election—this time! Wright and Garrison, and the men of that party, do not vote at all. They deny the obligation to sustain any human government whatever, and certainly the Senator must read their papers much more attentively than I do, if he find any thing complimentary to me. One of the most eminent of that party was formerly a lawyer in Boston, of high standing at the bar, and having occasion lately to appear as an advocate in one of the courts of Massachusetts, he procured from his client a special power of attorney, because he would not take the oath to support the constitution, which he would otherwise be obliged to do. The organs of that party are the New York "Anti-slavery Standard," and the Boston "Liberator," and I suppose as these papers are furnished to the Senator, the Garrison men do not think him so incorrigible a case as I am.

Mr. FOOTE.—Not twelve months since, this Garrison stood on a platform, called a whig platform—I hope unjustly—where certain distinguished members of the whig party were present and spoke, and when the aid of that faction was invoked by one of the most distinguished whigs ever named in this Union, it was responded to by the assurance on the part of these gentlemen, that they would vote at the coming election for the Senator from New Hampshire, unless he should withdraw in favor of the Buffalo nominee, whoever he might be.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I am very unwilling to interrupt honorable Senators, but I submit that the whole of this conversation is out of order.

Mr. HALE.—The Senator from Mississippi has asked me if I do not expect the support of Mr. Garrison as a candidate for the Presidency, if I do not withdraw: I tell him candidly that I do not. The gentleman is entirely mistaken when he represents Mr. Garrison and his associates to be the organs of the liberty party. The liberty party is satisfied to abide by the constitution, and wish to bring it back to its original spirit. We are the great conservative party, assailed by the ultras of the North and the South. The Senate might just as well call the State of Illinois

Mormonite, as charge the extravagance of these men upon those friends with whom it is my pleasure and pride to act.

[Mr. WESTCOTT here addressed the Senate at some length. At his request his speech will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. NILES.—I have no doubt that the Senator from Delaware has been influenced by good motives in making the proposition now before the Senate. He lives on the line, and frankly says he don't know exactly to which side he belongs. I have no doubt, therefore, that he feels a good deal of sensibility on this subject. I regret that I cannot concur in his judgment, that any good can come from this proposition. We see, already in this debate, that the advocates of proposed compromise are all on one side of the line. What are we to compromise? Why, sir, I am reminded very much of the case of the two boxers; one of whom proposed to the other to have a trial of skill and strength, and says he, "throw off your coat, and whoever wins will get it." That seems to be the amount of the present proposition. Oregon is now under the law of freedom. I trust it will never be withdrawn from that law by the action of Congress, or in any other way. For one, then, I can never agree to any compromise which is to give up a principle now established there. I know it is proposed to make this compromise more comprehensive, by embracing other territory. I am not prepared to say that that is wise. I believe in the saying, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

I am of opinion that nothing is to be gained by patching up an arrangement, to be carried through without knowing whether it would be satisfactory to the parties concerned, that is, to our constituents who have sent us here. This is not a matter of ours. This is not a matter of which we can finally dispose. Indeed, I have no idea that this question can be settled at all by the present Congress. The people are not represented here upon this subject, and it is impossible that any satisfactory arrangement can be made unless made by the people themselves. The people will be represented in reference to this subject in the next Congress. This is not a Missouri compromise case. That was the admission of a State, and when once admitted, the arrangement could not be set aside. Not so here; nothing can be settled here; the mere passage of a law is nothing. Petitions are now pouring in upon you, expressing opposition to the proposed compromise, and if you pass any such law these petitioners will continue to assail you, demanding a repeal of the law. It is the people, then, alone, who can settle this question; let them settle it. Put your faith in the great principles of the constitution, and yield to the only compromise that is worth anything—the will of the people fairly expressed. I come from a section of the Union that may be misrepresented on this floor, but whether misrepresented or not, we will be compelled to submit to the will of the majority of the people. But I have no compromises to make on this subject. I would submit to be voted down, but never voluntarily consent that one inch of the free territory of this country shall be stained with slavery. That is the prevailing, general, universal sentiment of the North, and yet with that sentiment they are prepared to submit to a fair decision by a Congress fairly representing the will of the people. That is the only way in which this question can ever be settled. All that can be done this session is to pass some general law as in 1803, authorizing the President temporarily to take care of these territories, leaving the settlement of the question to a Congress prepared to decide it.

Mr. BERRIEN.—We ought to be admonished by all the indications of the expediency of coming to a speedy settlement of this question. The object of the Senator from Delaware is conciliation, and not to sacrifice any principle or conviction of duty. It is to abstain from the prosecution of a discussion which is daily becoming more exciting, and by a reference of the whole subject to gentlemen selected from various portions of the Union, to ascertain whether they, in the retirement of a chamber, exchanging opinions with the conviction that the declarations or declamations which may be made will not go out to the public, and they themselves become excited by that very consideration—whether in the calm interchange of their views in a committee room, they may not be enabled to present something to our consideration, which, without requiring the sacrifice of principle in any quarter, shall result in the adjustment of this question. We are told that the country is excited; I admit and lament it. But it is that very excitement present and prospective, which induces me to look with pleasure to the proposal of the Senator from Delaware. Nor do I despair of adjustment because of that excitement. The whole history of our government is that of a people excited on all questions connected with their rights. The constitution itself was formed at a period when a far greater degree of excitement existed than now throughout the United States, yet that work of the representatives of the people has had the happy effect of producing those results, which it is our good fortune to witness in the administration of this government. I pray gentlemen, then, unite with us in adopting a measure which, if merely an experiment, is worth trying, to ascertain whether a course cannot be proposed which will relieve them from the temptation, and absolve us from the necessity of a discussion calculated to add to the excitement. Gentlemen must remember that this debate, involving questions of political power on one hand, embraces in the other associations connected with the protection of our altars and our fire-sides. All must admit, then, I think, the propriety of bringing the debate to a close, and taking the sense of the Senate in order that we may ascertain whether a settlement cannot be made.

Mr. DOWNS.—I concur entirely with the Senator from Delaware, and my hopes of a beneficial result, if his motion be adopted, are strengthened by the active opposition made to it by the Senator from New Hampshire. I did think that when his reasons for objecting to the settlement were so obvious, there would not have been another member of the Senate to raise his voice against it. His opposition is very rational; nothing else could have been expected from the Senator from New Hampshire, because it so happens that if this matter be settled "Othello's occupation's gone." He would then have no ground to stand upon. The agitation is at an end. But I am very sorry that another Senator should be found to oppose it. But it is this opposition as I have said, which induces me the more earnestly to desire the reference. It is their interest to prevent a settlement of the question. They say it will amount to nothing; that the people will appeal from our decision, and the agitation be increased. As they live and breathe, and are advanced by agitation only, I don't see why they should oppose this on that ground. But the fact is they oppose it because they knew that it would kill this agitation stone dead, as it did in the case of the Missouri compromise, the Texas compromise, and all other compromises. Every man here who looks to the interest of the country alone, and not to his own advancement, whether from the North or the South, will come forward at once in favor of this proposition, so honorably made by a gentleman standing on or so near neutral ground. I do hope that the good sense of this body and the country, which has prevailed hitherto and sustained us amidst so many difficulties, will again prevail—that oil will be poured upon the troubled waters, and the question be settled to the satisfaction of all.

Mr. NILES rose, but gave way to

Mr. BALDWIN, who said that he desired to ask the Senator from Florida a question. Was that gentleman one of the meeting from which this proposition emanated?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I did not use the language which the Senator supposes he heard me utter, and I do not consider it important enough to repeat what I did say.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I should be very happy if the gentleman would inform us whether that meeting was or was not entirely sectional?

Mr. DAYTON.—It seems to me that the proposition of the Senator from Delaware does not involve at all the difficulties pending in this chamber. The proposition is to refer the question of slavery, so far as it respects Oregon, to this special committee of eight, in order that they may ascertain, after consulting together, whether any plan can be devised by which this difficulty may be surmounted. Now, I ask, is there one man in this chamber or out of it, throughout the length and breadth of this land, who feels that in point of fact, there is any difficulty about Oregon?

Mr. CLAYTON.—The Senator misunderstands. There is no difficulty about Oregon; but is not the Senator aware that there are amendments before the Senate applicable to all the territories, and that these are to be referred to the committee?

Mr. DAYTON.—I have not overlooked the previous explanation of the Senator, nor the proposition of the Senator from Indiana to refer the whole matter to the committee; but those portions of the President's message relating to California and New Mexico still remain in the hands of the Territorial Committee. As to the existence of slavery in Oregon, or any where north of 42°, it is all a farce, and in my judgment—I say it with all respect—there is much more excitement here upon that subject than in the country. It is by stirring this matter up here, and making this chamber the centre of a whirlpool, that we throw these waves hither and yon all over the country. If we can stop it here, we stop it substantially altogether.

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator certainly does not mean to say that it commenced here.

Mr. DAYTON.—I do not mean to say that there has not been some general feeling throughout the country, but it has originated very much in the two chambers of Congress. As a practical question, it amounts to very little elsewhere, either as respects Oregon, New Mexico, or California. If forced to a vote, those of us who came from the free States may be obliged to vote in a particular way. But I deny that there is any real difficulty in the question; for, in my judgment, the treaty practically absolved us from all difficulty in relation to the slavery question. I do not mean to say that it it be left open some man may not carry a slave to Oregon, or that some slave may not run there. I do not mean to say that if New Mexico and California be left open, individual slaves may not be taken there; but I say that circumstances forbid the existence of slavery in a permanent institution in one territory or the other. Looking at the productions of the country, and its relations in reference to slavery in other parts of the country, it is my judgment, that New Mexico and California cannot become planting States; and experience has shown that slave labor cannot be made productive in agricultural or grazing countries. And yet in the face of all this, we are raising issues and producing excitement, the end of which no man can see.

Mr. FOOTE.—Does the Senator mean to compare any excitement here with that which has brought up another Presidential candidate in New York?

Mr. DAYTON.—If the gentleman desires my opinion as to the comparative magnitude of the excitement here and in New York, I would say that if to be judged of by numbers, it is greater in New York; but if its importance be the test, it is greatest here. I desire the whole subject to be referred, as suggested by the Senator from Indiana. If the question is really to be settled, gentlemen will know whether to debate it or not; but if it is to be merely talked about, many do not care to engage in the talk, and I am one of them.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I am very glad to hear the Senator from New Jersey say that this is not a practical question; and I hope, therefore, that he will leave it open. We are in favor of free territory, and opposed to monopoly. We wish to leave the soil open to every American citizen so long as it remains a territory, leaving the people to form their own government when it becomes a State.

Mr. DAYTON.—The Senator goes for free territory; so do I. The question is in reference to free territory in Oregon, and the people of Oregon want the territory to continue free; and all that the Senator asks is, that the restrictions may be removed, so that he can go there with his slaves.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Senator says that it is an abstract question; why not leave it open? We got Oregon from France and Spain—both slaveholding communities. We got New Mexico and California also from a slaveholding community. Strike out the 12th section of the bill and leave the territory as you find it.

Mr. DAYTON.—I am for leaving the territories as we found them, and I trust the Senator will join with me. I would leave it as it now is with great pleasure, exactly as you find it—free from slavery.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It is slave territory. Did we not get it from slaveholding countries?

Mr. DAYTON.—Not at all. I hold that we did not get Oregon through the purchase of Louisiana. I hold that the discussion proved—if it proved anything—that Oregon did not come from that source; and certainly we did not get New Mexico from that source.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Certainly. Slavery existed throughout the dominions of Spain on this continent. We got Oregon partly from Spain and partly from France—both slaveholding communities.

Mr. DAYTON.—As to the origin of our title to Oregon, there has been some difference of opinion. But that the territory is free—that the foot of a slave has never passed its soil, no man, I believe, ever controverted. Oregon is now free; and its inhabitants have said that it shall continue free. Permit me now to ask the Senator from South Carolina does he not believe that this is an abstract question as respects Oregon? Does he believe that slavery can ever be introduced there; and if so, why does he desire to change the existing law which has been adopted by the people?

Mr. CALHOUN.—Whatever territory we purchase from any community, if slaveholding at the time of the purchase, the territory must follow that law. Every one who remembers the discussion knows that more reliance was placed upon our title through France than on any other. One of the ablest gentlemen on that side of the chamber [Mr. Evans] declared that that was our strongest title. All the possessions of Spain were open to slavery. Now, I put it to the Senator, that he is bound to unite with us, and make it free territory—open to every American citizen.

Mr. DAYTON.—The Senator has put that question half a dozen times, and I have answered him. The difference between us relates to a matter of fact. He says the territory was slave territory when we got it. In my judgment, it was not. In reference to the existing state of things upon which we are called to act, we should respect the wishes of the people of these territories, and take their laws as they have made them, and by which they choose to abide.

Mr. BRIGHT pressed his suggestion, that the whole subject should be referred to the select committee.

Mr. CLAYTON said, that as the gentleman seemed to be so strenuous in his request, he would not oppose it, and he modified his motion accordingly.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, moved that the Senate adjourn.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—No! no! Let the question be taken on the motion for a committee first.

The motion to adjourn was determined in the negative.

Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays upon the question of agreeing to the motion of Mr. CLAYTON, as modified; which were ordered, and it was determined in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Badger, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Borland, Breese, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Clayton, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Downs, Foote, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Lewis, Mason, Metcalfe, Rusk, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Westcott, and Yancey—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bradbury, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dix, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Miller, Niles, Upham, and Walker—14.

So it was Ordered, That the bill, with the several amendments proposed thereto, be referred to a select committee, to consist of eight members, to be appointed by ballot; that the Committee on Territories be discharged from the consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to New Mexico and California; and that the same be referred to the proposed committee.

On motion by Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the Senate will, at 12 o'clock to-morrow, proceed to the appointment of the committee.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

They have passed bills of the following titles, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate:

An act to admit certain articles, of the growth or production of Canada, into the United States free of duty, upon condition that like articles, of the growth or production of the United States, are admitted into Canada free of duty.

An act to annex that part of the State of Indiana bordering on Michigan to the Chicago collection district.

An act in addition to an act entitled "An act for the relief of the reputed inhabitants of the reserved township in Gibson county, in the State of Indiana," approved August 11, 1842.

The President of the United States approved and signed, the 10th July, the following acts:

An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending 30th June, 1849.

An act to establish the collection district of Brunswick, in the State of Georgia.

Joint resolution to change the location of a light-house on Lake Superior, in the State of Michigan.

Joint resolution disposing of two brass field pieces captured at the battle of Bennington in 1777.

LIGHT-HOUSE BILL.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, the prior orders were postponed, and the bill making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the bill, at page 5, under the head of "Georgia," by striking out lines 96 to 99, inclusive, (the same provision being made under the head of "Florida,") which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS moved further to amend the bill, in line 113, by striking out "Kehoon," and inserting "Racoon;" which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS moved further to amend the bill, in the same line, by inserting "$12,000" after the word "point;" which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS moved further to amend the bill, in line 115, by inserting "$12,000," after the word "foster;" which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS moved further to amend the bill, in the same line, by striking out the word "thereof," after the word "lieu," and inserting the words "of the;" which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS moved further to amend the bill, in the 116th line, by inserting "$10,000" after the word "shoal;" which was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE inquired when this bill was reported?

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—The Clerk will inform the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—It was reported on the 26th of June.

Mr. YULEE desired to state that the bill was not on his table. It was usual for such bills to originate in the other House, and he asked that it might be postponed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, could not consent to the postponement. He would have no objection if he could see a prospect of the bill being acted upon by the other House in time, but he could not, and he had been urged to press the bill here.

Mr. YULEE said it was only a short postponement he desired, to examine the bill.

Mr. DAVIS said he had given notice, some days ago, that he should call the bill up on the first opportunity that presented itself, and Senators had had ample time in the meanwhile to examine it.

Mr. YULEE said it had been his misfortune not to hear the notice. He desired to have an opportunity of looking into the appropriations for that section of the country which he represented.

Mr. BADGER hoped the bill would not be postponed.

Mr. DAVIS said the Senator from Florida could lay his views before the committee of the House, when the bill went there, if he desired any amendment made.

Mr. YULEE thought a single day could not make much difference. He had just glanced over the bill, and found a section for the appointment of a board of examiners, with, as he thought, very extraordinary and dangerous powers.

Mr. DAVIS inquired whether the Senator from Florida supposed the section embraced anything beyond light-houses.

Mr. YULEE read the section. He could not help thinking it covered a very large ground. The terms "facility to navigation" and "any other improvement," were susceptible of being construed to mean many other kinds of improvement than light-houses or light-boats. He moved to strike out the section.

The question being taken, the motion to strike out the section was disagreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate; and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered. That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bill.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill, as in Committee of the Whole; and having been amended, it was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, and the title was amended so as to read "An act to annex the town of Essex, in the State of Massachusetts, to the collection district of Gloucester."

Resolved, That the bill pass with amendment.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendments.

THE SENATE REPORTS.

Mr. NILES submitted the following resolution and asked for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the committee on [illegible] Senate, be instructed to inquire whether the contract to report the [illegible] debates of the Senate, has been faithfully executed, and whether [illegible] answered the purposes expected, and if not, to report such [illegible] evil.

Mr. NILES.—The resolution explains itself. I do not know that I understand what the precise requirements of the contract are, but I believe that the proceedings of each day were to be laid upon the tables of Senators off the following day. But whether the contract was adhered to in one question, and another is whether it has answered the expectations and purposes of those who favored the plan at the outset? As to the contractor, I suppose he has endeavored to perform his duty faithfully; and without reference to that question, I offer the resolution, under the conviction that the plan, whether carried out according to the contract or not, has entirely failed to fulfil the expectations of Senators; for it is very well known to every Senator, that the proceedings of this body are, to all substantial purposes, suppressed. I noticed in one of the newspapers this morning* as a matter of curiosity, the comparative quantity of reports given of the proceedings of the Senate and House of Representatives, of which were eleven columns and a half for the House, and for the Senate only half a column. Well, now, this is the public record that goes out to the people of the country in regard to the proceedings of the Senate. Why, the Senate apparently, is of no sort of consequence here. The public knows nothing of what we are about. We might as well sit with closed doors. The reports which come out, are, I believe, substantially correct, and well got up, but the difficulty is, that they come so late that they are of no use except for posterity. Probably they will be valuable for the antiquarian, or the historian, but for present purposes they are totally useless.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I do not rise to oppose the resolution, but I prefer that it should remain its usual time before the vote be taken upon it.

Mr. FOOTE.—The resolution, although it merely proposes an inquiry, implies delinquency on the part of the individual who has contracted to furnish reports; I cannot, therefore, consent to its adoption unless delinquency be shown, or unless some good and sufficient reason be assigned why such resolution should be adopted. In regard to the non-publication of the reports in the newspapers, I feel bound to say that we cannot hold our reporter responsible. He is willing to supply the newspapers both in this city, and throughout the country, and I know that he does supply them with copies of the reports, and if they do not publish them, it is not his fault. The arrangement may have been an injudicious one in the first instance; it may have had the effect of preventing so early a publication as otherwise would have taken place of a summary of debates; but without it, we would have had nothing like the amount of reporting that has been done. And in regard to the delay of publication, my impression is, that it will be found to be the fault of Senators. I undertake to assert, that were it not for the fact that Senators justly careful, perhaps, of their reputations, have from time to time held back the reports of their speeches for the purpose of revising and re-revising them, the delay would not have occurred.

Objection being made, the resolution lies over one day under the rule.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were read the first and second times by unanimous consent:

An act to grant certain lands to the State of Indiana for a canal around the falls of the Ohio river, and for other purposes;

An act to grant certain lands to the State of Indiana, for a canal from Lake Michigan to the Illinois river;

An act to grant certain lands to the State of Indiana, for a canal from Lake Michigan to the Chicago collection district.

An act to admit certain articles of the growth or production of Canada, into the United States free of duty, from the reciprocation of the like articles of the growth or production of the United States are admitted into Canada free of duty.

Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill in addition to an act for the relief of the inhabitants of the reserved township in Gibson county, in the State of Indiana, approved August 11th, 1842, was read the first and second times by unanimous consent.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill for the relief of Jose Argote Villalobos, Marie Rose, Francois Felix, Marquis de Fougeres, or their heirs or legal representatives; and it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill to revive an act authorizing certain soldiers in the late war with Great Britain, to surrender the bounty lands drawn by them, and to locate others in lieu thereof; and it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives agree to the amendments asked by the Senate, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the amendments to the bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30th, 1849; and have appointed Mr. Vinton, Mr. Nicoll, of New York, and Mr. Chapman, of South Carolina, managers of the conference on their part.

* NOTE.—Upon an examination of the paper referred to, the National Intelligencer, I find that the eleven and a half columns devoted to the House of Representatives, comprise three days' proceedings, and is made up most of debate, but of amendments and explanations on the bill under consideration, and also a case offered by members who were absent for absence during a call of the House.—REPORTER.

BRANCH MINTS.

On motion by Mr. DICKINSON, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish a branch mint of the United States in the City of New York.

Mr. DICKINSON.—This bill was introduced by my colleague two years ago. It has received a favorable report from the committee as often as it has been introduced, and at the last session it passed the House of Representatives. It has been recommended by the President, and its passage has been urged by the Secretary of the Treasury. It will appear, by reference to the last letter of the Secretary, that about thirty millions of dollars of foreign coin have been imported into New York during the last eleven months, all of which would have been coined if there had been a mint at New York. If not re-coined, its value being unknown to the mass of the people, it cannot go into circulation, but finds its way into the vaults of the banks, or is re-shipped, in place of sending bills abroad. If specific, detailed information be desired by any Senator, I would refer him to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BUTLER.—The reasons that have been assigned by the honorable Senator for the establishment of a branch mint in New York, are applicable in an eminent degree to the city of Charleston. I therefore offer the following amendment:

Add the following sections:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That a branch of the mint of the United States shall be established in the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, for the coinage of gold and silver. And for the purpose of purchasing a site, erecting a suitable building, and supplying the necessary machinery and apparatus for such branch, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That so soon as the necessary buildings shall be erected for the purpose of well conducting the business of the said branch, the following officers shall be appointed, upon the nomination of the President, one with the advice and consent of the Senate, viz: one superintendent, one treasurer, one assayer, one melter and refiner, and one coiner. And the said superintendent shall engage and employ as many clerks and as many subordinate workmen and servants as shall be awarded for by law; and the salaries of said officers and clerks shall be as follows:

To the superintendent the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars; to the treasurer the sum of two thousand dollars; to the assayer, two thousand dollars; to the melter and refiner two thousand dollars; to the coiner two thousand dollars; to two clerks the sum of twelve hundred dollars each; to the subordinate workmen and servants, not exceeding twenty in number, such wages and allowances as are customary and reasonable, according to their respective stations and services.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the officers and clerks to be appointed under this act, before entering upon the duties thereof, shall take an oath or affirmation, before one Judge of the United States, justices, and magistrates respectively therein mentioned, and shall each become bound to the United States of America, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the director of the mint and the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition for the faithful and diligent performance of the duties of their offices.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the general direction of the business of said branch of the mint of the United States shall be under the control and regulation of the director of the mint at Philadelphia, subject to the superintendence of the Secretary of the Treasury; and, for that purpose, it shall be the duty of the said director to prescribe such regulations and require such returns, periodically and occasionally, as shall appear to him to be necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the intention of this act in establishing the said branch; also, for the purpose of discriminating the coin which shall be stamped at said branch and at the mint itself; also, for the purpose of preserving uniformity of weight, form, and fineness in the coins struck at said branch; and, for that purpose, to require the transmission and delivery to him at the mint, from time to time, of such parcels of the coinage of said branch as he shall think proper, to be subjected to such assays and tests as he shall direct.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That all the laws and parts of laws made for the regulation of the mint of the United States, and for the government of the officers and persons employed thereat, and for the punishment of all offences connected with the mint or coinage of the United States, shall be, and the same are hereby declared to be, in full force in relation to the branch of the mint by this act established, so far as the same shall be applicable thereto.

Mr. BADGER.—I confess, for one, I have heard nothing which shows the existence of any particular necessity for the establishment of either of these branch mints. The Senator from New York assigns as a reason for the establishment of one in New York, that a large amount of foreign coin arrives there, which, for want of a branch mint, instead of being re-coined and put in circulation, is re-shipped. How far that is the fact, I am not able to determine. But as far as my observation extends, it seems to me that our own proceedings on the subject have tended to discourage the coinage of foreign gold. Congress has adopted as the circulating medium of this country, all the foreign coins of the world; and when they are received by the banks, they are retained, because they answer their purpose just as well—indeed, better than the coinage of the United States, inasmuch as this gold, passing by weight and not by tale, does not answer the ends of those who wish to convert the notes they hold into specie. It is proposed now to pass a bill and appropriate supplies, and authorize an outlay of about $125,000 for the purpose of providing suitable buildings for these branch mints, and I suppose it would not be an extravagant supposition, that quite as large additional appropriations will be required before the respective establishments are completed. That is the ordinary experience of legislative bodies with regard to all appropriations. I think it may be safely assumed, then, that we are about to incur an expenditure of a million of dollars for preparing the two establishments, and then we entail upon Congress a large annual expense for the purpose of keeping them up, which will not be less probably than $70,000 or $80,000. And what good, I ask, will it do for the country at large? If there be this large amount of foreign coin in the city of New York, and there be a necessity for its re-coinage, why are not those who hold it willing to have it re-coined at the principal mint at Philadelphia? The only obstacle is the expense of transportation and the insurance; but New York is now within four hours of Philadelphia, and the expense of transportation is trifling; and if Congress is desirous that this money shall be re-coined, would it not be better for us—would it not be cheaper and more advantageous to pass a law by which the United States should pay the expense of transportation, and ensure its safe deliverance. The transmission and return of fifteen millions of dollars, I apprehend would not cost half so much as the salaries of the officers of your branch mint. If the banks are not keeping foreign gold in preference to American gold, because it is less desirable to the holders of notes, they would undoubtedly be just as willing to send it to Philadelphia to be re-coined, if relieved of the expense, and sure of a safe return. It seems to me, then, that we are about to incur a very needless expense. I know it will serve to adorn the noble commercial metropolis with another splendid marble edifice, that will attract the attention of foreigners, add grace and dignity to the appearance of the city, and give it greater approximation to a "city of palaces;" and I for one could have no objection to all that, if there was an appropriate amount of good to be accomplished by it. I trust I am totally incapable of any feeling that would induce me to desire to do any thing to diminish the prosperity and beauty of that city, or to prevent its advancement; but the only effect, as I conceive, would be that a large and splendid building would be erected in the city of New York at a great outlay of public money, which will afford convenience to such officers as may be employed in it, and enlarge the patronage of the government now and forever, without any adequate return to the people of the United States. And these remarks apply also in their general scope and character to Charleston; but as far as that city is concerned, I would take even more pleasure than with regard to New York, in adopting a measure by which her prosperity might be advanced, for the reason that she has fewer natural advantages, and because of her locality in the neighborhood of my own State, which would make me glad to see a large city there built up. But the question arises, whether we will be justified in laying out this money? Where is the necessity for it? Where the general good to be promoted by it? I confess I have been unable to see it, with regard to either of these institutions. There are other matters connected with this subject, which, in my view, afford additional objections against both of these proposed establishments, and which I will very briefly advert to. In the first place, I believe, myself, that the establishment of any branch mint, was to say, the least of it, a measure of doubtful utility. My own impression is, that no branch mint should have been established, and I think that we are now receiving in these two propositions, proof that the adoption of the policy of establishing branch mints was wrong in itself, and if followed out, will produce most mischievous effects in the community. I suppose that Congress was, in the first place, led—or, as I think, misled—into their establishment by circumstances peculiar to those districts of country where the branch mints are situated, in Georgia for instance, and in my own State where they were located in order that they might be in the neighborhood of the gold region, on account of the want of easy and cheap modes of transmission from those regions to the great seat of coining in Philadelphia. These reasons were plausible, and were supposed at the time to be strong; at all events Congress was induced by them to establish branch mints there; but the same reason does not exist for the establishment of one in New York, so near to the principal mint, and having so ready and easy a communication with it. If this proposition prevails, where is this matter to end? I think we ought to look a little ahead. Does any gentleman believe that the establishment of branch mints will stop with these two? If he does, he reasons contrary to all precedent. We shall in a short time have applications from Boston, Norfolk, and all the seaboard towns for branch mints to be established in them, until the original institution is lost sight of, and instead of one great establishment, we shall have the business divided among little establishments, insufficiently supplied with work, and carrying on the business of coining at a disproportionate expense, and at great disadvantage to the country. I, for one, am not for advancing a step further, in what I believe to be a wrong course. But there are other reasons why Congress should not enter upon such a work at this time. I ask my honorable friend from New York, whether he has so soon forgotten the strong, the pressing recommendation of the President, that Congress, for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the war which has just closed, should abstain as far as possible from all measures demanding an expenditure of public money not absolutely necessary. I admit that this recommendation furnishes no reason why a really necessary expenditure should not be incurred, but I think that under the circumstances to which the President refers, it furnishes a very strong reason why there should be no expenditure, unless for some object which the condition of the country demands. And I should be glad to know what inconvenience the country is to suffer if there should be no branch mint at New York, or at Charleston, for the next six years. The country has gone on very well without them thus far, and I think it can go on very well for a few years longer, until we pay what we owe, and ascertain whether we can conveniently incur the large expenditure which this bill proposes. I hope the question will be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. DICKINSON.—The remarks of the honorable Senator in regard to the expense of establishing these mints, may be applied to any public structure. If the Senator draws his notions of the utility of branch mints from those which have already been established, I am not surprised at his opposition. The branch mints in Georgia and North Carolina, have, I believe, in no one year coined more than three or four hundred thousand dollars each. But the Senator says, that if the mint was to be placed in the neighborhood of the gold mines he would be in favor of it.

Mr. BADGER.—The Senator misunderstands me. I doubted the propriety of the policy of establishing branch mints any where, but I said there was some appearance of reason, if they were to be established at all, in having them placed near the mines.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I would like to know what better gold mine can be found than that which, in eleven months, produces $30,000,000?

Mr. BADGER.—We have a great deal better mine, because the thirty millions of dollars which the Senator speaks of, and which he assumes to be all in foreign coin, is received, I suppose, for its equivalent. But a gold mine that yields, with small labor, virgin gold from the soil is, I think, a better mine.

Mr. DICKINSON.—Well, gold is the representative of labor, and from this it derives its value. But the proposition of the Senator is directly against the course of events and against the laws of trade. He supposes that this coin can as well be received in Philadelphia as in New York; but the Senator must recollect that an individual having a small sum in foreign gold will not subject himself to the inconvenience of going to Philadelphia to get it coined—he would sooner part with it below its value; whereas, if there was a mint in New York, he could get it exchanged at once, and it would be received and go into circulation, instead of being reshipped, as a great portion of it is in the course of trade. If legislation would go along with commercial law, instead of undertaking to make commercial law go along with it, it would be much better. That a magnificent structure is to be erected is no argument for or against the establishment of a branch mint; the only question is, whether it will be for the public interest. And of this I think there can be no doubt.

Mr. NILES.—We have now several of these establishments, but not one of them situated at an important commercial point. That at New Orleans is the most important; but in respect to foreign coin brought by immigrants from abroad, it stands very far below the northern cities. New York is the great commercial point; in fact, it may be said, that the whole trade of the country centres there. Well, now, what is the advantage to be expected to result from the establishment of a mint there? Why, if it is the settled policy of this government to secure a specie currency, and that in our own coin the advantages of which perhaps some have over-estimated—but the advantages of such a currency I think were realized during the late war—it is important to inquire, whether we should not avail ourselves of those facilities which the establishment of a branch mint at so important a commercial point would furnish. It was evidently a great mistake to establish mints in the interior, because establishments of this kind are connected with the commerce of the country. At least one-third of your whole revenue is collected at New York; and collected almost entirely in specie—and that specie is, for the most part, of foreign coinage. I think, therefore, if we have a mint anywhere, it should be at New York.

Mr. BUTLER.—It is proper perhaps that I should say a word in regard to the amendment I have offered. The reasons that existed for the establishment of branch mints in the interior no longer operate, because railroads now penetrating that section of the country, and it is known that a great deal of gold and silver coin comes from the West Indies to Charleston in the course of the trade that is carried on between those places, as a great deal of Mexican gold comes to New Orleans. The same reasons, then, that exist for having a mint at New Orleans apply to Charleston. It is known also that those who work the mines of North and South Carolina and Georgia carry their gold to Charleston for commercial purposes—Charleston being the intermediate point between New Orleans and New York. The same reasons that apply to both New Orleans and New York apply to Charleston.

Mr. DIX.—I desire to say a few words in support of the bill and in answer to objections which have been raised on the other side, although what has already been stated by my colleague and by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] renders me to spare the Senate much, which I might otherwise have felt it necessary to say. With regard to the amendment, I regret that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER,] was not willing to allow the proposition for the mint at Charleston to stand upon its own independent ground. I confess that I have been strongly inclined at all times to vote for the establishment of a branch mint at Charleston, because I have no doubt it will become a place of great commercial importance when the connection by railroad with the Mississippi is completed; but it was my wish that the proposition should be considered separately. A bill was introduced last year for the establishment of a branch mint in the city of New York, and it was followed by the introduction of a bill to establish one in Charleston. The two propositions were considered independently of each other then; and I regret that they are not so considered now. I regret exceedingly that there should be any opposition to a branch mint in New York. A similar bill passed the House of Representatives last year on the day of the adjournment, so far as the establishment of a mint is concerned. But the bill contained some other provisions, and it was objected to and defeated upon a technical ground, which I supposed would not have been taken if the question of a mint had been unconnected with any other. The bill before the Senate was introduced by me and referred to the Committee on Finance, and I believe it was reported unanimously. The same bill, introduced by me, received the same sanction last year; the measure is demanded by the commercial wants of the country, by the banks, by the government, and I was not aware until recently that it had an opponent in any quarter.

The city of New York, as all know, is the great receptacle for the coins which come to the United States, whether they are imported in the way of commercial exchange or brought in by immigrants. These coins are chiefly foreign, and are for the most part wholly unfit for circulation—as much so as if they were medals or watch cases. This remark is particularly applicable to the gold coins. Foreign silver passes more readily by tale; a defect in weight makes little difference in value. It is not so with the more valuable metal. The same variation from the standard in weight makes a great difference in value, and few take the risk, excepting where the coinage is very familiar, like that of Great Britain. Sovereigns have a very limited circulation with us. But the whole gold coinage of the continent of Europe, and the greater portion of that of England finds it way into the vaults of the banks, the merchants, or the brokers, where it lies useless and unproductive. Nearly three quarters of the specie in bank in New York is foreign. At least, so I ascertained two years ago from a source which I deemed of unquestionable authority. I know of nothing in commerce or finance since, which is likely to have changed the relative quantity in reference to American coins. With a mint in the city of New York a large proportion of this imprisoned treasure would be liberated and after receiving the American impress it would enter into circulation.

Mr. BADGER.—What amount would seek coinage?

Mr. DIX.—I will speak of that subject presently. But I desire first to finish what I am saying on another point. I repeat, a mint in New York would liberate and convert into American coin a large amount of foreign gold and silver in the banks, which is as useless for the most part, as if it were in the form of bars or ingots. Even in the shape of coin it is inferior in value, though of the same weight and fineness, to American coin. Fitness or capacity for circulation is an element of value. The American coin is worth in the market from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ of one per cent. more than the foreign. It is its adaptation to perform the active uses of money that makes it so. The banks understand this. If a man asks for specie at their counters, they will, for his accommodation, give him American coin in case he wants a small quantity for a given purpose. But if he wants much, they offer him foreign coins, which are of no use to him, and it ends in his taking paper.

Why, it may be asked, is not this foreign coin sent to Philadelphia to be recoined? The answer is, that the expense is an insuperable impediment in most cases. I believe it may be said to average $\frac{3}{4}$ of one per cent., taking gold and silver together, and sent, as it often is, in small quantities; from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ of one per cent., more than the difference in the current value between foreign and domestic coin. The consequence is, it is only sent in limited quantities for special purposes, or under the impulse of an extraordinarily urgent demand. During the last year the coinage of foreign gold and silver has been very heavy, in consequence of the demand occasioned by the receipt and disbursement of the revenue in specie. This demand being supplied, we may expect that things will relapse into their former condition.

If we establish a mint at New York, foreign coin would, for the most part, be recoined, and much larger quantities would find their way into circulation. This would happen in two modes. 1st. The city banks rely little on the circulation of their own notes for their profits. The great mass of the city circulation consists of country bank paper. The city banks have no interest in keeping it out. To pay out specie would not interfere with their own interests, and they would do so freely, when its chief effect was to displace country bank paper, if they could convert their foreign into American coin without cost. With a full, copious, and ample recoinage of foreign gold and silver, I do not hesitate to say that through the medium of ordinary bank transactions, a much larger quantity of coin would be thrown into circulation. 2d. From four to five millions of dollars in foreign coin is brought into the country by immigrants. A part of this amount is exchanged by them in New York, for bank paper. They take paper because they do not wish to lose the difference in the exchange of foreign for American gold. The residue they take with them into Michigan or Illinois, or perhaps as far as Wisconsin and Iowa, since the "far west" has reached the Pacific. What is the consequence? Those foreign coins are not familiar to those among whom they are carried; their value is not known; they are parted with at a loss; they enter but slowly and but partially into circulation. If immigrants could exchange their foriegn for American gold at the place of debarkation without any discount, as they might do with a mint there, how different would be the result! They would be protected against loss, either on the foreign gold or on the paper, for which it is now exchanged, and they would introduce into the western States—the usual boundary of their migrations—our own coin, which all know, instead of foreign coin, with which none are familiar. The western States will, in this way, I verily believe, be more benefitted than we shall be.

Now, sir, let me say a word about the exportation of specie. I have already said that the difference in the market value between American and foreign coin is from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ of one per cent., the weight and purity being equal. I am not sure that this difference does not influence the point in the rate of exchange, at which specie begins to be exported—that the point of exportation is not reached, with this mass of foreign coin lying idle, at 1 to $\frac{3}{4}$ of one per cent. lower than it would be, if it were recoined at our mint. I do not mean that this circumstance will affect the ultimate payment of balances in the medium, which costs least to the persons making the payment. But those who are familiar with our commercial and money matters in New York, know that the rate of exchange often stands for weeks so near the point at which specie is exported, that a variation of $\frac{1}{4}$ of one per cent. will turn the scale between remittances and bills of exchange as remittances.

But there are other considerations arising out of the use of foreign and American coin as remittances for the payment of balances abroad. The demand for this purpose is always for foreign coin, for the reason that it is money the moment it reaches the place of payment. American coin is of no greater value for exportation than bullion. In France it costs about $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent seignorage to convert it into money. In England the expense is less. For example: an ounce of gold, in the form of British sovereigns, is worth £3 17s. 10½d. for the payment of a debt as soon as it arrives in England. It is money. An ounce of gold in the shape of American coin is worth nothing as money in England. It must be sent to the mint in London, where it is worth £3 17s. 9d., and it will be re-delivered to the owner, on the average, in a month's time, making a loss to the owner in interest, besides the difference in value between the two coins, of about one half of one per cent. It follows, that a recoinage of foreign gold will operate $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. against the export to France and something more than one half per cent. against the export to England. It may not be desirable, then, that the whole mass of foreign coin, which is imported, should be recoined. Nor is it likely to be so. The laws of trade regulate these matters better than legislation. All we can properly do is to provide the means of recoinage at the principal places of importation, so that foreign gold may be converted into American without being checked by extraneous causes, such as the expense of transportation to and from a distant mint. This is all we ask. We desire that the laws of trade may not be embarrassed in their operation as they now are. With a mint in New York, probably of eight millions of specie in that city at least from one-half to two-thirds, instead of one quarter, would be in the form of American coin. The proportion might run up to three-quarters. But the amount of foreign coin in the vaults of the banks is not to be taken as the measure of the annual recoinage. The specie brought in by immigrants, that which is kept in circulation to perform the ordinary offices of domestic exchange, and that which is imported for the adjustment of commercial balances, would all find their way to the mint for recoinage, if it could be done without loss. But as we all know the mint charges nothing to the depositor for recoinage, except for refining, when the metal is below the standard, or for alloy, when the metal is above it. With a mint in New York the currency would be improved, the movements of the banks would be facilitated, and a larger infusion of specie into the West would be secured.

I am happy to bear testimony, Mr. President, to a more correct tone of opinion on this subject than that which existed in New York a few years ago. Some of the gentlemen who advocate the establishment of a mint were formerly among the most strenuous opponents of everything which bore the most distant relation to what was denominated the "specie humbug." Though political opponents, they are gentlemen of fairness and high character, and they do not hesitate to advocate—and to advocate warmly—what they are now convinced will contribute to stability in the operations of commerce and finance. And, sir, I cannot forbear, in connexion with this subject, to congratulate my friend from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] on my left, and others who co-operated with him, on their good fortune in having outlived the prejudices of the times, and in having witnessed the practical justification and fulfillment of their theories.

Now, one word in regard to the expense. The Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] says that we must always calculate upon having the appropriation doubled. Sir, this has not been our experience in any case. I find that the appropriation for New Orleans was $200,000; and the whole expense was a little over $300,000: but it is very well known that there was, to say the least, a very unnecessary expenditure, although the expense of building is much greater in New Orleans than in New York. The appropriations for the mints in Georgia and North Carolina were $50,000 each, and they cost but $60,000. I am satisfied that the appropriation is sufficient, and that we shall not exceed that amount in the construction of buildings, and in the purchase of machinery, if the measure shall receive the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. I am almost sorry that I said any thing on the subject, because it makes it necessary that I should make some additional observations, which I shall confine, however, to the subject immediately before the Senate, and I shall therefore say nothing about the specie humbug which has been alluded to by the Senator from New York, or the convulsions in the monetary affairs of the country. We have at present before us an inquiry, not about the currency, nor about the specie humbug, but —the Senator will pardon me for saying—about the mint humbug. If I understand the reasons upon which the establishment of this branch mint is said to be founded, they are briefly these. New York is said to be the centre of commerce, all the coin of the country finding its way there, and the government of the United States receiving at least one-third of all its revenue from customs at that port; and a large amount of specie being brought there by emigrants, a great difficulty is experienced, because there is not a mint on the spot to re-coin this foreign specie. Now, if there be any real difficulty on the subject, I would suggest to the Senator from New York that it can be relieved at once, without the necessity of establishing this mint at all. As the government receives all its revenue in gold and silver, and as it receives at New York at least one-third of all its revenue derived from customs, there cannot be the least difficulty in the government directing their fiscal agent, upon receiving this foreign gold, to convey it to Philadelphia for re-coinage. This would involve a very trifling expense; and upon such a measure being adopted, it is obvious that the foreign coin would instantly be appreciated to the coin of the United States. Those having foreign coin in their possession would have nothing to do but to walk into the office of the government agent and receive American coin in exchange. The only expense incurred by the government would be in the transmission of this foreign coin as bullion. What would that cost? I understand that the whole expense of its transportation would not exceed one-tenth of what would have to be paid by the government in keeping up this branch mint. It is said, by having a branch mint at New York, all the foreign gold that is imported will be re-coined and kept in the country. How so? There is no prohibition against its exportation. If there is a call for it abroad it will go abroad; if there is a call for it at home, it will come here. The true way to remedy the difficulty is to make it the interest of those who hold foreign coin, to have it re-coined by repealing the law which makes foreign coin a tender for debts. So long as it is receivable for debts, and its value is unknown to the people, the banks will retain it, and it will not go into circulation at all. I will say in conclusion, that I shall vote for the amendment, not because I consider it necessary or right to establish branch mints, but because, if established at one place, I would do even handed justice, and establish them at others.

Mr. DIX.—A single word in regard to the difference of value between foreign and American gold. If a mint is established in New York this difference will cease. That is what I want, so that the banks will have no interest in keeping this foreign coin out of circulation.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that he hoped the amendment would prevail. Charleston had now an extensive trade with the West Indies, and that trade was continually increasing in consequence of the extension of the railroad from Charleston to the West. No small amount of coin coming from the West Indies to Charleston would be the result of this trade; and a branch mint at that place would be of immense advantage, not only to Charleston, but to a large region of country.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the question being on concurring in the amendment,

Mr. ATHERTON said, I think it admits of much doubt, whether we are not going too far in extending the expense of our mints by establishing one at Charleston. A branch mint at New York has been recommended several times in the messages of the President, and in the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the reasons for the establishment of a mint there have been forcibly stated by the Senator from Connecticut; but there is a branch mint in North Carolina, and another one in Georgia, and certainly it is worthy of consideration if a branch mint is also to be established at Charleston, whether it ought not to be connected with some provision for discontinuing the branch mints in Georgia and North Carolina, which are not any great importance to the community. I hope the question of a branch mint at Charleston may be considered separately.

Mr. ATHERTON demanded the yeas and nays on the question of concurring in the amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Mr. Badger, Bell, Benton, Bodisco, Bu——, Buch——, Calhoun, Cameron, Dix, of Mr. Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Doty, Fairfield, Huntington, Huntington, Hunter, Johnson, of Md., Johnson, of La., Johnson, of Ga., Lewis, Mason, Rich., Sebastian, Turney, Underwood, Wescott, Yulee—25.

NAYS—Mr. Allen, Atherton, Atherton, Bagby, Bright, Clarke, Clayton, Cowan, Dayton, Dickey, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, King, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Sturgeon, Walker—21.

So,

The amendment was concurred in.

On the question—"shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" the yeas and nays were demanded, and it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Mr. Badger, Bagby, Bell, Benton, Bodisco, Bu——, Buch——, Calhoun, Cameron, Dix, of Mr. Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Doty, Fairfield, Huntington, Huntington, Hunter, Johnson, of Md., Johnson, of La., Lewis, Mason, Niles, Rich., Sebastian—27.

NAYS—Mr. Allen, Atherton, Atherton, Bagby, Bell, Bright, Clarke, Clayton, Cowan, Dayton, Dickey, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Johnson, of Ga., King, Metcalfe, Miller, Phelps, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, Walker, Wescott, Yulee—25.

So,

The bill was rejected.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1849.

The amendment under consideration was that reported from the Committee on Finance, to strike out the appropriation for furnishing the Marine hospital building at New Orleans; which was not agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert at the close of the two hundredth line, on the ninth page, the following words: "for arrearages due to Jerrison and Foster, four thousand seven hundred and twenty seven dollars and eleven cents."

Mr. WESTCOTT moved to amend the amendment so as to read as follows: "for such arrearages as the Secretary of the Navy may in law and equity decide to be due to Jerrison and Foster, seven thousand dollars;" which was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was then agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out the words "and seventy-four" and "thirty-eight" from the 207th line, in the 9th page; (being a reduction of the appropriation for the Navy Yard at Memphis,) which was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out all from the 215th line to the 232d line, inclusive, in the 10th page, (being appropriations for Marine Hospitals.)

Mr. PHELPS.—I observe that there are three classes of appropriations providing for Marine Hospitals, embraced in this amendment, which I think it would be better to consider separately. The first class contemplates the completion of such as have been commenced; the second class is for the erection of hospitals not yet commenced; and the third is for the construction of hospitals whenever the sites shall be obtained. It strikes me that there is some difference in these appropriations, and that they should have a separate consideration. I ask for a division of the question.—The first class is embraced in lines 215 to 219, inclusive; the second in lines 220 to 225, inclusive; and the third in lines 226 to 232, inclusive.

Mr. BORLAND.—I desire an opportunity to assign the reasons for my opposition to this amendment, which proposes to strike out the appropriations for the hospitals at Pittsburg, Cleveland, and Louisville; and to show, as I think I shall easily be able to do, the gross injustice that would be done to that class of persons for whose benefit those hospitals were intended, if this appropriation be stricken out. I did not expect that the question would come up to day, and I am not at this moment prepared to present the views I entertain. I move, therefore, that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I would suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas, that no matter how the question is at present decided, it will be again brought up when the bill shall have been reported to the Senate; and the gentleman will then have an opportunity to present his views. Indeed, I suppose, from the decision already made, there is no doubt the Senate will retain the appropriations for the three hospitals to which the gentleman has referred, as they have been already commenced; but if the gentleman desires to be heard in regard to the subject, an opportunity will be afforded him when the subject comes up again. I hope, therefore, he will not press his motion.

Mr. BORLAND consented to withdraw his motion, all the amendments relating to the marine hospitals being passed over informally.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, submitted the following amendment intended to be offered by him, which was ordered to be printed:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the sum of fifty thousand dollars be, and hereby is, appropriated for indemnification for losses of necessary clothing, uniform, bedding, and other articles, incurred on board, or to the officers and crews of the sloop "Peacock," which was wrecked and lost at the mouth of the Columbia river, on the eighteenth day of July, eighteen hundred and forty-one; of the steam frigate "Missouri," burnt at Gibralta, in eighteen hundred and forty-three; the schooner "Grampus," lost at sea; the schooner "Shark," wrecked and lost at the mouth of the Columbia river, September tenth, eighteen hundred and forty-six; and the brig "Somers, lost in the Gulf of Mexico; the sloop of war "Boston," lost on Eleuthera, on November two, eighteen hundred and forty-six; and the steamer "Hunter," lost in the harbor of Vera Cruz, in eighteen hundred and forty-seven: Provided, That the amount of such losses in the case of each claimant shall be established, by affidavit or proof, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, and shall be paid only to the applicant himself, or his authorized agent, or, in case of his death, to his widow, or, if there be no widow, then to his surviving children, or, if there be neither widow nor children, then to the brothers and sisters now living, who are minors, or were minors at the time the loss occurred: And provided also, That no more than the actual amount of loss shall be paid in any case, nor shall the entire allowance or account of any individual in the respective grades exceed the following sums, viz: to a captain, eight hundred dollars; to a commander or lieutenant commanding, six hundred dollars; to a lieutenant, master, surgeon, assistant surgeon, purser, chaplain, professor, captain of marines, chief engineer, four hundred and fifty dollars; to a passed midshipman, first assistant engineer, or first lieutenant of marines, three hundred dollars; to a midshipman, second or third assistant engineer, second lieutenant of marines, secretary, clerk or master's mate, two hundred dollars; to a boatswain, gunner, carpenter, sailmaker, one hundred dollars: to a petty officer, or sergeant or corporal of marines, fifty dollars; to a seaman, ordinary seaman, marine or musician, forty dollars; to a landsman, boy, or fireman, thirty dollars.

The last amendment of the committee was to strike out the fifth section, on the 15th page; (relating to the spirit ration,) which was agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I would suggest that any gentlemen who have amendments to offer, will offer them now, and have them printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I desire to ask the consent of the chairman of the committee to move as an amendment a bill providing for the payment of the expenses incurred under an act of Congress authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to make various experiments in regard to the explosion of steam boilers. The service was rendered for the naval department, and I think, therefore, it is appropriate to this bill.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I shall certainly be under the necessity of opposing any such amendment. It is but a private claim, and if we incorporate this, we may, with the same propriety, incorporate all other private claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—As the gentleman objects, I shall of course not press the motion.

Mr. NILES gave notice that he should move to amend that part of the bill relating to the mail lines of steamships by striking out the clause authorizing advances to be made to the contractors, and inserting a proviso in relation to the contracts

Mr. ALLEN.—I do not design to say any thing upon this subject now, but I rise barely to give notice that at the proper time I wish to be heard in opposition to this whole system of ocean mail routes; and I make this declaration in order that the bill may not be taken up at a time when I shall not have an opportunity of being heard. I wish to oppose the whole system, not that I suppose any effort of mine will be sufficient to arrest it, but the effort may have the effect of calling the attention of the Senate and the country to the subject, and to prepare the public mind to put an end to the system when the present contracts shall expire.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed, this day, the following acts:

An act to extend an act entitled "An act granting to the [illegible] suspended pre-emption and claims in the several States and Territories," approved 4th of August, 1846.

An act to confirm to the legal representatives of Joseph Dubreuil and Gregoire [illegible] certain New Madrid certificate.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

On motion by Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the select committee, appointed on the 13th inst., have leave to sit while the Senate is in session.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

After the consideration of Executive business—

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JULY 18, 1848.

REPORT FROM THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, accompanied by a statement of imports of coal and iron from July 1, 1847, to May 1, 1848; which was read and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, inquired of the Chair if any answer had been received to a resolution submitted by him some weeks since, calling for a statement of the number of officers in the custom-house at Baltimore, &c.

The VICE PRESIDENT replied that the Journal did not show that any answer had been returned.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Then, if it be not received to-day or to-morrow, I shall renew the call.

CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE OF CLAIMS.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was read and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be authorized to employ a clerk annually, whose duties shall be the same as those now performed by the clerk of the Committee of Claims of the House of Representatives, and of the same grade, and to be paid quarterly by the Secretary of the Senate, out of the contingent fund, at a compensation to shall be fixed by the committee, not exceeding that allowed to a messenger of the Senate.

POST ROUTE IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. BREESE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Lebanon, in St. Clair county, through Maine town, in Madison county, and Stanton, in Montgomery county, to Carlinville, the county seat of said county.

J. C. FREMONT.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to pay to J. C. Fremont, for his services since he left the employ of the United States, in preparing and completing the map of Oregon and California, as ordered by the Senate on the 20th of February, 1845, and in drawing up a report explanatory thereof, and map, Provided, That the sum so paid shall not exceed that allowed to J. N. Nicolet, Esq., for similar labor and services in preparing and completing his hydrographical and topographical map of the basin of the Upper Mississippi.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—The memoir and map referred to in the resolution have been compiled and prepared by the gentleman mentioned therein, who was an officer in the army at the time when he performed the labor of exploration. But being now out of service, it could hardly be expected that he should prepare these works for the public without compensation. I am informed that he does not intend to take out a copy right, leaving the work to be the property of the federal government. The rate of compensation proposed, is the same, as that which was paid to Mr. Nicolet for the same description of labor in preparing a Topographical history of the upper Mississippi. The question being simply upon granting compensation for labor performed for the benefit of the country, I have not thought it necessary to move a reference of the resolution to any committee, but if any gentleman wishes its reference I have no objection, although I would prefer that it be now considered.

Mr. KING.—The resolution had better take the ordinary course perhaps, until we ascertain what was the rate of compensation paid to Mr. Nicolet.

The resolution lies over.

REPORT OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, from the committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill to amend an act entitled "An act supplemental to an act entitled 'An act providing for the prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the republic of Mexico, and for other purposes,'" reported that the committee of conference have agreed to recommend:

1. That the Senate recede from its amendment to the first section of the bill striking out the word "repealed," &c., and agree that the section stand as originally passed by the House, with a proviso herewith reported.

2. That the Senate recede from its amendment proposed as the second section of the bill, and agree to adopt in lieu thereof, the section herewith reported as the second, third and fourth sections of the bill.

3. That the House recede from its amendment proposed as the third section of the bill, and agree to adopt in lieu thereof, the section herewith reported as the fifth section of the bill.

4. That the two Houses do agree to adopt the bill herewith reported, embodying the agreements of their respective Committees of Conference in their disagreeing votes on House bill number 429.

On motion, by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the report be printed.

RESOLUTIONS OF LEGISLATURE OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. WALKER submitted resolutions passed by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of Wisconsin, in favor of a modification of the fourth clause, of the 7th section of an act of Congress to enable the people of Wisconsin to form a constitution and State government.

SCHOOL LANDS, ETC., IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. WALKER, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to modify the 4th clause of the 7th section of an act entitled "an act to enable the people of Wisconsin territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union," approved August 6, 1846.

The bill was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and, with the memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of Wisconsin, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SHIP ADMITTANCE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BADGER, respecting the seizure by a vessel of war of the United States, of the American ship Admittance; and the resolution was agreed to.

HALF-PAY TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill amending the act entitled "an act granting half pay to widows or orphans, where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States," in cases of deceased officers and soldiers of the militia and volunteers, passed July 4, 1836, reported thereon.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said amendments.

Mr. BADGER.—I would call the attention of the Senate to the phraseology of the last clause of the act:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all persons under this act shall be granted under such rules, regulations, restrictions, and limitations, as the Secretary of War, with the approbation of the President of the United States, may prescribe.

This, in effect authorizes the Department of War to determine not only who are to receive pensions, and under what circumstances they shall receive them, but what shall be the amount of such pensions. I cannot myself see the necessity for such a provision. It may have crept in by an oversight; for I believe there is no precedent for it. I do not wish to be captious about it, but it really seems to me that it is conferring a power upon an Executive officer which he ought not to possess.

Mr. DIX.—If I had drawn the section I should have omitted the words "limitation" and "restriction." At the same time, I do not think that it will have the effect of changing the course pursued by the department in relation to these pensions. As the Senator suggests, it may have crept in by inadvertence; but I certainly think there can be no danger that the power could be exercised unfavorably to persons entitled to pensions.

Mr. BADGER.—I do not wish to be understood as making any positive opposition, but I think it is unfortunate that those words should have been introduced. Although there may be no improper exercise of power under this clause in the first instance, yet it may hereafter be used as furnishing a reason why such power should be vested in the Department of War. The phraseology is remarkable. It is not that the pensions shall be ascertained and the pensions paid, but that persons shall be "granted" under such rules, regulations, limitations, and restrictions as the Secretary of War, with the approbation of the President, may impose. It is a power to restrict the granting of any claim, and not merely the power to prescribe the rule or evidence by which the fact shall be ascertained.

Mr. BORLAND.—I hope that the phraseology of this clause will be altered, and that no further discretion will be given to the officer whose duty it is to issue these pensions. I think the discretion that he has exercised already is too great—much too great—certainly too great for the interest of the persons entitled to pensions. The restrictions and limitations that are imposed amount almost to prohibition. Obstacles are thrown in the way which prevent the granting of these pensions for months, in some instances. I really think that so far from giving any more discretion, Congress ought to pass a bill defining explicitly the rules and regulations relating to the granting of pensions, and not leave anything to the discretion of the executive officers. In my short experience here I have had something to do with the pension office, and I have found, that whenever discretion is given, it is used with the utmost rigor. To persons residing at a distance the restrictions and delays amount almost to a denial of justice. The trouble and expense attending the process of procuring the pension absorbs the whole. The complete power which it gives to the pension agents throughout the country over the unfortunate persons for whose benefit the law was intended is a crying evil, and it is time that it should be remedied. I would like to see the bill amended by adding any number of sections to define the rules and regulations under which the law should be administered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana.—I think the phraseology is exceedingly unfortunate, but at the same time I do not think it will be construed so as to give to the officers of pensions any greater power than they exercise at present. The law as it at present stands, authorizes the War Department to adopt rules in relation to the taking of testimony, but it never was intended to empower the department to enlarge or diminish the pensions, or to reject cases which the law embraced by it. A different phraseology would be better, I admit, but I do not think any improper construction will be given to it. There is one thing I regret, however, and that is the omission to provide for the Florida cases. There are many strong cases arising there—just as strong as those in Mexico, and a general wish seemed to be expressed that they should be included; but although they have been omitted, I shall not move to refer the bill back on that account.

Mr. BRADBURY.—I am unwilling to allow the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas to pass without notice. He seems to reflect upon the public officers for standing between the applicants and the Treasury. I think for that course of conduct they are entitled to commendation instead of censure. And this applies not only to the Pension office, but to every other. These officers have an inducement to grant the allowances that are sought for in all cases where they can do so in accordance with their duty, for by that means they get rid of importunate applicants. But they stand as guardians of the Treasury, protecting the money of the people; and standing in this position, and acting upon an enlarged view in reference to questions presented to them, their rules may appear to be rigorous, but when the necessity is known it is generally found that those rules commend themselves to the judgment of all who consider the subject. I think these officers instead of being reproached should be commended. I am unwilling to believe that they impose upon any applicant trouble that is unnecessary. They establish general rules, and they do so from the necessity that arises from an enlarged view of the whole subject, and not from a disposition to give trouble. This is the view that I take of it, and I hope that they will not be exposed to censure for doing that which certainly must be in many cases an important duty.

Mr. BORLAND.—If the Senator supposes that I design to cast any censure upon the officers, he draws upon his imagination, for I do not think that my language will bear that interpretation. I am as desirous as the Senator that the public money of the government, or of the people, shall be disbursed in exact accordance with the law. I do not wish to see any thing like extravagance. It was not that I questioned the motives of these officers, but I complained of the effects of their course of proceeding, not doubting that they acted from conscientious motives; but I certainly think they act very much like feed attornies on the part of the government, and consider themselves bound to take advantage of every little technicality. They do not look at the case upon the side of the applicant, but they consider themselves bound to oppose every claim, and take advantage of every minute circumstance that can mitigate against it. This has been the case in regard to every claim I have presented. I will give a single instance of the interpretation of a law recently passed by Congress. It was found that a class of persons in the army in Mexico, in the volunteer service, were not provided for by the law granting bounty land. It was that meritorious class of volunteers who left their homes, and served for some time as privates, and were subsequently promoted by the voice of their respective companies. When they applied for bounty land, it was decided that they were not entitled to it under the law, although the propriety of their having it was recognized by every body. A bill was accordingly introduced, and passed through Congress, providing for this class of cases, and according to the phraseology of the bill, those persons who had been promoted in Mexico were embraced by it. But it appears that some of these persons had not been promoted upon the very soil of Mexico, and it was decided in the department, that such persons must be excluded; although such was certainly not the intent of the law. By this interpretation, three-fourths, if not nine-tenths of those who were intended to be provided for, were excluded. I have decided objection, therefore, to giving any more discretion to Executive officers.

Mr. BRADBURY.—I am happy to find that the honorable Senator in the very instance he has cited, has been constrained to admit, that the officers, in the construction of the law, confined themselves to its express terms. They did not feel at liberty to depart from the letter of the law, and to give to it a construction not warranted; and I understand it is a fact, that in the case referred to, Congress had to supply its omission, and pass a supplemental act. No blame then can attach to the officers, on the contrary, they are entitled to commendation, for not taking it upon themselves, in the interpretation of the law, to depart from its express terms.

Mr. BERRIEN.—Believing there is great force in the suggestions of the Senator from North Carolina, and considering also, as the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas, that too much discretion ought not to be vested in an officer who is delegated by law, to carry into execution the benevolent designs of Congress, I will move to strike out from the amendment proposed by the committee, the words "limitations and restrictions," and further to amend by inserting "shall be allowed and paid" instead of "shall be granted."

Mr. DIX.—I do not consider this matter of very great importance, for I am satisfied, that whether amended or not, it will make no difference in the course of proceeding in the Pension Office. Besides, if we strike out those words, we do not prescribe differently suggested by the Senator from Arkansas. The rules and regulations of the Pension Office will remain. Regarding the words as not affecting the provisions of the previous section, the committee were of opinion that we had better concur in the amendment, and not send the bill back to the House.

Mr. BERRIEN.—It certainly does not meet the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, because we do not prescribe the rules and regulations under which pensions shall be allowed; but the Senator will see, that by divesting the Executive officer of the power to prescribe limitations and restrictions, the matter will be left as it stands under the existing law. No new power will be conferred. In regard to sending the bill back to the House, I suppose there need be no apprehension entertained that they will not readily concur in the proposed amendment. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas, that the view taken by most of the accounting officers of the government, is that they represent the government, and that they are bound to interpose every feasible objection to the allowance of all claims. I hope, therefore, the amendment will prevail.

Mr. BORLAND.—The amendment proposed meets my views precisely, and it was only to show my objection to the allowance of any further discretion to the Executive officers, that I made the observations that I did. I do think, that it would be well, that specific rules and regulations should be prescribed by Congress; for I think the interests of all parties would be promoted by it. While up, I will call attention to one other instance of interpretation of a law where the intention of Congress has been defeated.

Mr. BORLAND referred to the provision of the law granting an allowance to volunteer companies of cavalry for the use of their horses.

Mr. HALE.—I do not desire to mingle in this debate, but it appears to me that the reflections cast upon the Executive officers are altogether undeserved. As far as relates to the Commissioner of Pensions, they do that gentleman great injustice. I believe him to be one of the most faithful and vigilant officers of the government.

Mr. BORLAND.—I said I intended no censure upon any officer of the government. I believe they are actuated by conscientious motives.

Mr. HALE.—I am glad to hear the Senator say so. I observed the tone of remark indulged in by the Senator implied a censure. And permit me to say that I have known something of that officer, and of what he has had to contend against. I believe he has been imposed upon, with all his vigilance, ten times where one pension has been withheld when it was due. He is a man who works early and late, and the greatest injustice that was ever done, was when in a spasmodic fit of economy, Congress reduced the salary of that officer five hundred dollars.

The amendment of the Senate from Georgia was disagreed to, and the question being on concurring with the amendments of the House, they were, without a division, concurred in.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

LIGHT HOUSES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution "extending the time for the erection of certain light houses," and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said resolution was read a third time.

Resolved, That it pass, &c.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have appointed the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill to amend an act

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1849.

The VICE PRESIDENT stated the question to be upon agreeing to that part of the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance, which proposed striking out the 215 to the 219th line inclusive.

Mr. BORLAND.—I see no necessity for dividing the question.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—The division was asked for on a former day by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PHELPS.—The reason why I asked for a division of the question was this. It will be perceived that certain appropriations are designed for the completion of hospitals already commenced, others for the erection of new ones, and a third class of appropriations for the establishment of hospitals in cases where the site has not yet been procured. I have no objection to the completion of such as have been commenced; but I must confess that I am somewhat surprised at the numerous appropriations that are proposed for marine hospitals in the interior, when considered in comparison with the number upon the Atlantic coast. I believe there are but six marine hospitals on the Atlantic coast exclusive of the one at New Orleans, while this bill contains appropriations for nine upon the western waters. It is true, I have not given much attention to the subject, but it strikes me as somewhat extraordinary, that if six hospitals are sufficient for a range of coast extending from the extremity of Maine to the Gulf of Mexico, as many as nine are required for the interior. I feel no great anxiety on the subject, but I must be permitted to say, that I should be surprised if by any statistics it can be made out, that a larger is required upon the western waters, than upon the Atlantic coast.

The question being taken upon concurring in the amendment, it was determined in the negative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER stated the next question to be on concurring in that part of the amendment reported by the committee striking out lines 220 to 225 inclusive.

Mr. BORLAND addressed the Senate in a speech of considerable length, occupying about one hour and a half. A report of the honorable Senator's remarks will be given in the Appendix.

The question being taken upon concurring in the amendment, it was determined in the negative.

The next question was on concurring in that part of the amendment reported by the committee, striking out lines 226 to 232, inclusive; and it was determined in the negative.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, it was Ordered, That the bill lie on the table.

ORDER TO PRINT.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of R. R. Gurley, presented the 10th instant, be printed.

REPORT OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

On motion by Mr. BENTON,

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the the bill to amend an act entitled "an act supplemental to an act entitled an act providing for the prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the republic of Mexico, and for other purposes;" and it was [redacted]

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after several hours spent therein, the doors were again opened.

THE COMPROMISE BILL.

Mr. CLAYTON from the Select Committee to whom was referred, the 12th instant, the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon; and to whom was also referred, so much of the message of the President of the United States, as relates to New Mexico and California, reported a bill to establish the Territorial Governments of Oregon, California, and New Mexico; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. CLAYTON said the subjects referred to this committee were of infinite difficulty. The territories for which temporary civil governments were to be organized embraced an area of 1,044,392 square miles—about as large as that of one-third of all Europe, and capable of sustaining, sooner or later, the population of a mighty empire. The intrinsic difficulties necessarily belonging to such an organization were increased by the various and conflicting local population now existing there, as well as of that hereafter to be introduced by the extension of the constitution and laws of the United States over so vast a country.

The committee had entered upon the discharge of their duties, under all these embarassments with untiring industry, with a zealous resolution, and an indefatigable spirit which he had never known surpassed. He felt it due in justice to each and every one of his colleagues to say, that amidst all their long conferences, and laborious discussions on the various topics necessarily considered by them, the most conciliatory spirit had been evinced by them, each endeavoring to maintain the honor and interest not merely of his own section of country, but that of the whole nation, and each endeavoring to yield so much as he felt could be properly and honorably conceded, without the sacrifice of what was essentially due to his own constituents and the people of all the States. The conferences of the committee were in this spirit—attended with free and ample discussion—and after a full interchange of views, a vote was taken on a proposition moved by the Senator from Missouri. [Mr. ATCHISON,] "that the spirit of the Missouri compromise be adopted to govern the settlement of all the territories of the United States." On this question the committee divided, five for and three against the motion. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] then moved the proposition, notice of which had been previously given in the Senate, containing the words of the Missouri compromise. As the condition of the territory was now said to be different from that to which that compromise applied in 1820, a motion was made by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] to amend that proposition by providing that "all the territory in New Mexico and California, south of the parallel of 36° 30′ shall be placed on the same footing in all respects as to slavery that existed in Louisiana while it was a territory." On this question the committee divided, four for the motion and four against it. After the failure of this motion, the question was taken on the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, and with a like result—the committee being again equally divided.

At this stage of the proceedings all compromise appeared to be impossible. But the committee proceeded afterwards to consider a proposition to endeavor to adjust the great question, at least so far as to enable Congress to extend the laws over, and provide for the administration of justice in the territories, leaving for the present the settlement of it to the laws of population, or the adaptation of soil, climate, and all circumstances to the various kinds of labor. While it was admitted on all sides that by far the greatest portion of the territories was properly adapted to free labor, and would necessarily be free soil forever; yet it was also with equal unanimity conceded that there was a portion of it where free labor never could be introduced, owing to the climate and the peculiar productions of that portion. It was thought that if Oregon, which no one imagines can ever be slaveholding, could be organized as the people of that territory desired, by the temporary adoption of their present laws, interdicting or prohibiting slavery till the territorial legislature proposed to be organized, by a popular vote under the bill referred to us, could enact some law on the subject, most of the objections which had been urged in debate to the 12th section, would be obviated without any sacrifice of principle by those who urged them; and that after thus disposing of the question so far as relates to Oregon, the territories of California and New Mexico could be organized in the same bill by the appointment of a governor, Senator, and judges to compose, according to the old precedents, a temporary legislature for each of these territories, but without the power to legislate on the subject of slavery, thus placing that question beyond the power of the territorial legislature, and ceding the right to introduce or prohibit slavery in these two territories on the constitution, as the same should be expounded by the judiciary, with a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It was thought that by this means Congress would avoid the decision of this distracting question, leaving it to be settled by the silent operation of the constitution itself, and that in case Congress should refuse to touch the subject, the country would be slaveholding only where, by the laws of nature, slave labor was effective and free labor could not maintain itself. On the other hand, in case Congress should hereafter choose to adopt the compromise line of 36° 30′, (north of which I suppose it is not expected that slavelabor can be introduced,) or any other rule of settlement, it will be free to act as to its wisdom and patriotism shall seem fit.

After many conflicts of opinion, these views thus generally expressed, were substantially agreed upon with great unanimity, all the members of the committee agreeing to make the report, and but two of them (one from the North and the other from the South,) disapproving any of the material features as they understand it. By order of the committee, I have prepared a bill in accordance with these views. It contains some important amendments to the Oregon bill, particularly so far as it corrects the defective description of the boundaries in that bill.

I do not expect, sir, that this or any other proposition which the wit of man can possibly suggest will prevent agitation on this subject, which is now daily spreading through the country, and I fear dividing it into geographical parties. If the Missouri compromise of 36° 30' should be adopted, the agitators would immediately raise the standard of repeal and agitate as fiercely as ever. We know that, sir. They will agitate after the passage of any bill. But this bill resolves the whole question between the North and South into a constitutional and a judicial question. It only asks of men of all sections to stand by the constitution and suffer that to settle the difference by its own tranquil operation. If the constitution settles the question either way, let those who rail at the decision vent their indignation against their ancestors who adopted it. We offered no bill to introduce slavery by congressional enactment into any free territory. If, as the South contends, the constitution gives the right to carry their slaves there, they will maintain that right. If, as the North contends, the constitution confers no such right, they will vindicate their claim. And Oregon will be at once organized as a territory, with power to elect their own legislature—a power which the committee think cannot now, with any propriety, be conferred upon the population of the two other territories.

30TH CONG.—1ST SESSION—No. 113.

I now, sir, have the honor to report, as an amendment and a substitute for the bill referred to the select committee, "A bill to establish the territorial governments of Oregon, California, and New Mexico." The committee, with all becoming modesty, desire to say that they do not view their work as perfect; but it is the very best which under all the embarrassing circumstances of their position they have been able to propose. To the Senate they appeal for assistance to correct any errors into which they may have inadvertently fallen. But it is the honest opinion of a large majority of the committee, that by the passag of this bill the safety of the Union will be placed beyond the reach of agitation; and that the question, and the only question which now threatens to endanger it may be, not immediately, but ultimately, put at rest forever.

The bill was then read a first time and unanimously ordered to be printed.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 19, 1848.

PETITION.

Mr. DICKINSON presented the memorial of A. B. Johnson, praying that there may be no interruption of the mails on the Sabbath; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

THE COMPROMISE BILL.

Mr. CLAYTON.—There may possibly be some misapprehension in regard to a portion of the remarks made by me yesterday, in introducing the bill for the organization of territorial governments in Oregon, New Mexico, and California, and I desire to correct it, if any such exist. The select committee desired, and in that desire I fully concur, that the bill should speak for itself, and that it should be regarded as the exponent of their views and opinions. It was not my purpose to submit the remarks which I made yesterday in lieu of a report, nor were they to be regarded as tantamount to a report. The bill, I repeat, is to speak for itself. It fully reveals the sentiments of the committee, and for that very reason a formal report was deemed unnecessary. I do not know that it is now necessary for me to say any thing more than to add that a large majority of the committee decidedly expressed the wish that this measure might become a law, with the expectation and design of that it would prove to be an adjustment of the great question now in controversy between the North and the South. I shall, if there be no objection, call up that bill to-morrow, and then every member of the committee will have an opportunity of expressing his views upon the subject—an opportunity of which I design to avail myself.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I am exceedingly gratified by the explanation of the Senator from Delaware. Had it not been made, it might have been supposed in some quarters that the whole committee had concurred in all the particular views which he for himself had expressed. I agree with him in testifying that it was the unanimous understanding of the committee that the bill should speak for itself; and I may add, that it was also understood that this was to be a permanent and not a temporary settlement of the whole question.

Mr. KING inquired whether the remarks of the honorable Senator from Delaware had been regarded in the light of a report from the committee, and were so recorded on the Journal of the Secretary?

The PRESIDING OFFICER replied in the negative.

Mr. PHELPS.—I refrained yesterday from making any remarks in reference to what fell from the honorable chairman of the select committee, because I understood it was not be regarded as a report, for which, in all its particulars, the committee was responsible.

Mr. CLAYTON, (in his seat.)—Of course not.

Mr. PHELPS.—I am willing to say, however, that I concurred in the action of the committee. In my judgment, the only mode for the adjustment of this question has been adopted, and I think I can sustain that opinion before the country and my constituents, by reasons which I shall take the opportunity of stating hereafter.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I never spoke for any man in my life, except at the bar in my professional character; never in any public body have I attempted to speak for any one but myself; and I suppose all understood that my remarks yesterday were intended as my speech, and that no man would claim it as his. I insist upon it, sir, that it was my speech!

EMORY'S REPORT.

Mr. HANNEGAN submitted the following resolution for consideration.

Resolved, That eight thousand additional copies of Emory's report and illustrations be printed and bound for the use of the Senate.

Mr. HANNEGAN in presenting this said, that a large number of Colonel Fremont's report had been printed, and he thought it would be well not to make any invidious distinction between these officers.

Mr. BENTON said that the gentleman could have an hundred thousand copies if he pleased, but if he printed one hundred thousand millions, it only amounted to this, that Emory went along an old path conducted by one of Fremont's guides to show him every step of the way. Fremont was an explorer.

Mr. HANNEGAN remarked that there was no conflict whatever between the two reports. Col. Emory had not trespassed in a single instance on Col. Fremont's rights. The expeditions were entirely independent and distinct. Both reports were exceedingly valuable. The work of Col. Fremont met with unbounded popularity, and he was satisfied after a thorough examination of Col. Emory's report, that it would meet with equal favor.

Mr. BENTON.—The only difference between the two is, that Fremont was an explorer.

PALMER'S MEMOIR.

Mr. DAYTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed two hundred and fifty additional copies of Senate document No. 30, prepared by Aaron H. Palmer, Esq. and that the same be delivered to the said Palmer for his own use.

TERRITORY OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to enquire whether the [illegible] organization of the Territory of Wisconsin are not justified in existence and force over that portion of the said territory not embraced within the organic limits of the State of Wisconsin; and if they are, to inquire, further, into the expediency of making appropriations at the present session of Congress for defraying the expenses of said territory of Wisconsin, and to report to the Senate at as early a day as practicable, by bill or otherwise.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of Mehitable Gibb, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Coleman, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

SAULT ST. MARIE.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of certain citizens of Michigan, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill providing for the examination and settlement of claims for land at the Sault St. Marie in Michigan.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

J. C. FREMONT.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, for the compensating of J. C. Fremont for compiling a map of Oregon and California, and the resolution was agreed to.

NAVAL PENSIONS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill renewing certain naval pensions for the term of five years, and extending the benefits of existing laws respecting naval pensions, to engineers, firemen, and coal heavers; and it was Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

FORT WINNEBAGO.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. WALKER asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to grant to the State of Wisconsin, the military reservation at Fort Winnebago, in said State: which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish the Senate with the official returns of each of the ships of the line, the frigates and the sloops of war, now in commission, of the punishments inflicted, and vessels, as appears by the returns in each.

DONIPHAN'S EXPEDITION.

The joint resolution relinquishing to the State of Missouri certain trophies of Doniphan's victorious expedition, was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BENTON said that he would merely remark, that these were the cannon among the number taken from the former capital of the internal provinces of Mexico, and brought out by the gallant column of Missourians, led by Colonel Doniphan.—Every cannon was taken, the position in which they were placed being turned. All the munitions of war, and every thing that the enemy had upon the field of battle were taken, except a small quantity of ammunition which an officer's servant had somewhere in a gorge of the mountain. The cannon were carried around to the Rio Grande frontier, after Colonel Doniphan had heard of the battle of Buena Vista, which, coming to the Missourians through Mexican intelligence, was of course reported as a great victory on their part. Our Missourians, like good Americans, refused to believe a word of the defeat of General Taylor, but like good soldiers, they thought it best to go and see. They immediately started off with these ten cannon, in addition to all their own, and made that marvellous expedition through an almost unknown country, to General Taylor's camp. When they arrived there, as their Colonel very properly said, "rough, ready, and ragged," with scarcely nothing but their arms brought from home, and those taken from the enemy, General Taylor directed them to carry these cannon home. They brought them home, and we had the proud satisfaction of seeing those cannon, which had been rolled out of Chihuahua, placed in the capital of Missouri. The House of Representatives had unanimously passed this resolution yesterday, and he hoped the Senate would pass it with equal unanimity.

Mr. HANNEGAN said he did not know a more appropriate occasion than the present to inquire into the fate of a certain resolution submitted by him some three months since in relation to a medal to Col. D. and swords to the gallant officers who had participated with him in his glorious achievements.

Mr. BENTON replied that the resolution was in his hands.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—It has been kept there a long time.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said resolution was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this resolution pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June 1849.

Mr. NILES moved to amend the bill by striking out lines 92 to 105, the following words:

"And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to advance to the contractors for said service, or their assignees for the purpose of enabling them to furnish the vessels contracted for under their respective contracts, the sum of $25,000 per month on each of said ships, after such ship shall have been contracted, but the money so advanced under any one of said contracts, shall not exceed the amount of one year's compensation stipulated for in the contract, to be used, in all cases, by a crew on and for board of such a number as the Secretary of the Navy may require, and the money so advanced shall be faithfully expended in finishing said ships to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. NILES said that he thought this a very extraordinary proposition, and he had been very much surprised that it had received the sanction of the committee of the other House with the concurrence of that House. It introduced a principle never before acted upon in my case whatever. If they ever sanctioned this principle, that a contractor could come forward and ask the Government to furnish him capital to carry out his contract, there would be no end to it; and it would be a source of infinite trouble and difficulty. Already the effect of this proposition, having received the sanction of one branch of Congress, had been to induce a similar effort on the part of another of these lines.

The parties interested in the Bremen line were now pressing their claims, and if the principle were applied in the one case, Congress would be obliged to extend it to others. He did not believe that any argument was necessary in order to show that this measure was dangerous on the part of the government, and unjust towards other contractors; could any one believe that these contracts would not have been taken at a very reduced price, if the understanding had been that the government would give the capital to convey them out to taking a lien upon the ships or any other security? What reason could be assigned for this extraordinary proposition? Was it believed that these were hard contracts—that these men had underrated the expense and found themselves in difficulty by entering into these engagements? He believed that two of these contracts had been sold out as a speculation. Indeed they were taken as a speculation as he was informed, the men who became contractors were totally unacquainted with steam navigation, and probably never expected to carry out the contracts themselves, but entered into them with a view to speculate out of the government. They had sold out their contracts and the men who asked this advance were their assignees—speculators, who had given, he believed, some fifty thousand dollars for the contract. It was true that he had concurred in the law authorizing these contracts. It came from the House at the very close of the last session—two hours before the adjournment, when there was no opportunity of examining it. In his judgment it was a very unfavorable law for the government. It excluded competition in regard to two of the lines. It gave an express authority to the Secretary of the Navy to contract with the persons named in the bill at the prices which they had previously asked, thus withholding the whole subject from competition, and taking all discretion from the Secretary. He then went on to express his apprehension that in relation to one of the contracts there had been collusion between the bidders, although he was satisfied that the Secretary of the Navy had done what he considered best in the circumstances. He objected to the continuance of the contracts for so long a period as ten years. The expenditure was already very large, and the income would probably always be very small. It was imprudent to incur the heavy expenditure of a million and a half annually for ten years. He never could consent to that. Five years was long enough for the contract to run—one year longer than the ordinary mail contracts.

Mr. HALE replied in support of the proposition which the Senator from Connecticut desired to strike out of the bill. He conceived that it was peculiarly entitled to favorable consideration. He could not conceive how it was possible for any detriment to the public interests to arise in consequence of giving a month's pay in advance. It could not be unjust towards any other contractors. If they desired the same indulgence, let it be given them. What possible advantage was their in retaining this small amount for thirty dollars in the public Treasury? It seemed to him that the policy heretofore pursued, which was intended to encourage such an enterprise, should be continued in the present case.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, it was Ordered. That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1849.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. NILES—

Mr. NILES.—With regard to making payment in advance instead of paying when the money becomes due, I have a decided objection to it. I am told that it will require twelve, and sometimes fifteen, months for the completion of one of these ships, and suppose the ship be lost or burnt, what security have we for the repayment of the money? It is going beyond the contract, and giving to the contractors a loan which they have no right to expect at our hands.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, which is now before the Senate, and the amendment of which he has given notice, seem to involve three points. In the first place he objects to the advance which the Secretary of the Navy is authorized by the bill to make to these contractors, to commence immediately after the ships shall have been launched, which advance is to be secured, so that the government shall run no risk of being a loser by such advance, by a lien upon the ships. The Senator next objects to the duration of these contracts, and proposes to reduce the time for which they shall continue from ten to five years. His next objection is to the time of the commencement of pay upon the Panama and Astoria route, the bill providing that the pay shall commence upon the contract for that route from the time that the ships are placed at the disposal of the government. From the tenor of the remarks made by the Senator, I infer that he objects to this scheme of mail steamers in general as a system. I do not know whether I understood the Senator correctly, but I was under the impression that on former occasions the Senator from Connecticut was favorable to this mode of increasing the available force of the navy of the United States; but, sir, it seems to me that the questions that come up in this discussion of the bill do not involve the continuance of the system. So far as regards the present contracts, those contracts are made.—We may consider it imprudent hereafter to embark in other contracts of this sort, but any remarks that go to show the imprudence and improvidence of the system, it seems to me, do not touch the question that is now before us. If this scheme of employing steamers to transport the mail, and having them built in such a manner that they can be converted into vessels of war, be improvident, we ought to take the blame on ourselves and not find fault with the Navy Department, which has done nothing more than to execute the contracts according to the terms in which they were directed by Congress to be executed. That is the state of the case. The Senator says that the granting of these contracts does injustice to other contractors, who, if they had supposed that advances would be made by the government, would have taken the contracts at a lower rate. How does this comport with the circumstances under which the contracts with Sloo were made, and the contract for the route to Chagres? Sir, the law was absolute in its terms—the Secretary had no discretion; he was directed to contract with certain persons upon certain terms prescribed by Congress, and Congress also prescribed the time the contracts were to run. And what right have we, after we have directed the Secretary to make a contract with an individual, and he has made that contract according to our direction, what right have we, I say, to annul, or even to alter it? We have none. We have placed it out of our power. And shall we find fault with the department, because we consider the contract now to be improvident, although I do not think it is so? That would be a strange mode of proceeding? With regard to the contract for the route of Panama and Astoria, the Secretary had some discretion permitted him. The individual with whom he is to contract was not named, and he was not even obliged to advertise for proposals, but he did do it, and accepted the proposal that was most favorable to the government. But before I proceed to this point, I will speak a little more particularly in regard to these advances. If I understand the subject, the reasons that operated with the government in authorising the advances were these: The contractors are building vessels of larger size than they were required to do by the terms of their contract, and the Secretary thought it not unreasonable that this advance should be authorized for the sake of securing a class of vessels that will be the most serviceable in the event of being converted into vessels of war. For what is the main object which has induced Congress to authorize these lines of mail steamers? It is that the vessels may be built under the inspection of the Navy Department, and built in such a manner that they may be converted, upon short notice, into vessels of war. The whole object is lost, unless these vessels shall be built in a proper and suitable manner, so that they may be used for war steamers.—This has induced the Secretary, as I have said, to recommend these advances, in order to afford the contractors every facility for constructing the vessels in the best possible way, and that their construction may not be too long delayed. Upon this point he asked the attention of the Senate to a letter of the Secretary of the Navy, dated March 13th, 1848, addressed to the honorable T. Butler King, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the House of Representatives, in which he expressed his concurrence with the views of the committee.

As regards the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, that the term of five years would be sufficiently long for the duration of these contracts, if there be any fault any where it certainly seems to me that it must be imputed to Congress. I will read one of the sections of the act which directs the Secretary to contract with Mr. Collins in the Liverpool line.

[Mr. A. here read the section.]

These proposals contain the term of ten years as a part of the contract. And in pursuance of specific directions also, the contract with Sloo was made for the period of ten years. And in making this contract, the Secretary of the Navy did not suppose that he was departing from the intention of the government by contracting in the same manner, and for the same period as he had done with Collins and Sloo, although in regard to the Panama and Astoria route, neither the individuals with whom he should contract, nor the period of time for which the contracts should continue, were specified. The Secretary then using discretion in this case to some extent, determined not to take away the power over this contract altogether from Congress. He reserved to Congress the power, if they should think proper, to amend the contract at the ensuing session, upon yielding such fair compensation as should be due to the contractors.

Now, sir, it may admit of great doubt, whether, having reserved in this contract the power to amend it under such terms as might be consistent with equity and fairness, we have the right to alter it. I certainly think we have no right to say to the contractor that they shall go on and perform their part for a less time than they contracted for, and which no doubt formed an inducement with them to enter into the contract at the price agreed upon. If we were to alter the contract in point of duration, the contractors would have a claim for damages, and therefore I say, that if there is any improvidence in the making of such contracts, we should not throw the blame upon the departments, but upon Congress, by whom the Secretary was authorized and directed. It seems that the principal hostility of the Senator from Connecticut is directed against the Panama and Astoria line, but it appears to me that if we should direct the duration of this contract to be limited, varying its terms from those originally agreed upon, the contractors would not be bound to go on, and we should destroy the usefulness of the other lines. This forms part of a system. What would be the use of a line from Havana to Chagres, unless we have one from Panama to Astoria? It strikes me, aside from these considerations, that if any part of the line ought to be preserved more than another, it is this very Panama and Astoria line. It will be more beneficial to the commerce of the country that this should be preserved.

Before I proceed to some further remarks upon this Panama and Astoria line, I will advert to a point made by the Senator from Connecticut, as it regards the time of commencement of the payments on this Panama and Astoria route.

Now, sir, I think it is right that if the payments shall commence, as they ought to do, at the time the ships are placed at the service of the United States, there should be an amendment adopted, which I will offer to this clause, providing, that in their route from New York throughout the line reaching to Astoria, they shall convey the freight, stores, or passengers of the government free of expense, setting aside the subsistence of the passengers. I think this would be but fair; and in connection with this subject, I ask leave to have read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, and also a letter from William H. Aspinwall, the assignee of the Liverpool contract, to Mr. Vinton, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

[They were read by the Secretary.]

Mr. ALLEN.—Before the Senator proceeds in his speech, I desire that he would state what will be the expenses for this year arising out of the now existing system of ocean mail routes, including the expense which this bill will add. I want the aggregate amount.

Mr. NILES.—In reply to the honorable Senator from Ohio——

Mr. ATHERTON.—I have not yet concluded my remarks. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs can probably inform the Senator as to the expense of the other lines. I have not the data by me at present. The proposed advance, however, does not increase the expense. Under that arrangement the money is paid sooner than it otherwise would be. That is all. But some fault has been found with the Secretary of the Navy, or some implied censure has been cast upon him in regard to the Panama and Astoria route, as if the contract had not been given to the lowest bidder. Some hints have been thrown out that it was given to the highest bidder, upon terms detrimental to the interests of the government. I believe that no one who has read the papers upon the files can come to any such conclusion. On the contrary, he must conclude that the Secretary has acted with great sagacity and prudence. In the first place, the law did not require the Secretary to issue proposals, and there were two individuals who applied together for the contract, at the rate of $250,000 a year. The Secretary did not think proper to give the contract to those individuals, but issued an advertisement for proposals. Proposals came in—one at $150,000 a year, and one as low as $83,000 and a fraction per vessel. Mr. Harris proposed to take the contract at $199,000, as this was the bill which was finally accepted under these circumstances. Mr. Todd offered to perform the service in propellers, an inferior sort of vessel, and altogether unfitted for the main purpose for which the line was established—that is, for the conversion of the steamers into war steamers. His bid being the lowest, notwithstanding Commodore Morris's opinion that Mr. Harris's bid was in effect the lowest bid, the Secretary determined that he would accept Mr. Todd's bid, that being, in a pecuniary point of view, the lowest. But, in the course of the negotiation, Todd objected to the terms of the contract in reference to the inspection which the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to make, thereby showing that he intended to put upon the route vessels of an inferior description.

The Senator also objects to the Secretary reserving the right to Congress to annul the contract. The Secretary did insist upon that reservation in the contracet which he made with Harris, but he confined it to the coming session. An appropriation of money being necessary, if the appropriation should be made, the contract would be considered as confirmed. Well, these bids having been laid before the Navy Department, after some correspondence, I believe about the 20th of July, Todd refused to take the contract. Previous to this, Woodward, who had originally offered proposals with Todd for $250,000 a year, got an assignment of Harris's contract, agreeing to furnish securities, which he neglected to do until an injunction was obtained against Harris for not producing his securities; and, in the mean time, Woodward claimed that the contract should be given to him, Todd having declined, and Harris not having furnished his securities. But Harris afterwards procured the requisite security, and the contract was given to him. Thus we see that a combination evidently existed between Todd and Woodward to get the control of Harris's bid, and to obtain the contract at an advanced price. But they were defeated, and the government was saved an expense which, for the ten years, would not be less than $510,000. There can be no pretence by those who have examined the matter that Todd ever intended to take the contract and perform the service at the lower sum of $150,000 a year. And, sir, if we examine the rates at which steamers have been furnished upon these lines, both at home and abroad, we shall find that the rates on the Panama and Astoria route, considering the difficulties and expenses to which the contractors upon that route must necessarily be subjected, are most favorable to the government. And it may be doubted that any one not so well acquainted with the route as Mr. Aspinwall would undertake it at so low a rate.

The only line that is nominally cheaper is the New Orleans line. The line from Panama to Astoria costs $199,000 a year, or for each ship $66,000. This is the lowest of all except that between New York and New Orleans; and every one must see how much profit may be expected to be made by the other lines from passengers and freight, and the comparative facility with which coal may be obtained.

I have thus briefly noticed some of the positions taken by the Senator from Connecticut, and I certainly think that the Senator, upon a view of all the facts, must conclude that the advance of compensation in regard to this route will be proper. It is probable—nay, I beleive it is certain—that the government will have occasion to send troops upon that route, and that it will be of great advantage that there should be no interruption. But as it regards the limitation proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, it deserves the serious consideration of the Senate, whether, if we undertake any such limitation, we shall not be called upon for damages which would be far worse than any evil that can result from the continuance of the line for ten years. But it seems to me that the Secretary having had specific directions, we cannot now find fault with a contract made in pursuance of those directions.

Mr. NILES.—In reply to the interrogatory of the Senator from Ohio, I will say that the aggregate expense of the several lines when completed will amount, as near as I can gather, to $750,000 a year.

I have a very few words to say in reply to the various points adverted to by the Senator from New Hampshire, who is chairman of the Committee on Finance. I had supposed, that in the performance of his duty as chairman of that committee, I should have met the cooperation of that Senator, whose especial charge it is to take care of the interests of the Treasury; but instead of that, I find him attempting to sustain the claims of the contractors; and such is his zeal in their interests, that in one part of his argument he tells us that we are bound by the strict terms of those contracts, and that we cannot modify them in the slightest degree. But when these men come here and ask for additional advantages, why, then, according to the Senator, the law does not apply; we must let them have what they ask. Sir, I have seen a different course of action on the part of Senators occupying the position which the Senator from New Hampshire now occupies. I have always supposed that it was the duty of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to stand as a sentinel over the Treasury, and not to become the advocate of contractors. Now, in regard to this point, viz: that we are restricted by the law, whatever the provisions of the law may be, these contractors are subject to the action of Congress. Congress is not without power over the subject. All these contractors are subject to the provisions of the act of 1845, which is the first act authorizing this kind of service; and although these contracts were made under the authority of subsequent acts, these acts were intended to carry out the act of 1845. If the Senate think it prudent and wise to confirm these contracts for ten years, they will so decide. But as to their being advantageous, I know they are not. I know a contract could be made with a gentleman of New York on far more advantageous terms for the government. He has a ship already completed, the best that has been built in this country; he is seeking service at our hands, and we might have this service performed by him probably, although I am not authorized to say so, at one half the price we are paying for it. In regard to the other contracts, the one with Mr. Collins was made to be sure, in pursuance of the express terms of the law which came to us from the House at the last hour of the session, and was passed under the supposition that it had received due attention there, and that they were carrying out the views of the House in the service performed by him probably, although I am not authorized to say so, at one half the price we are paying for it. In regard to the other contracts, the one with Mr. Collins was made to be sure, in pursuance of the express terms of the law which came to us from the House at the last hour of the session, and was passed under the supposition that it had received due attention there, and that they were carrying out the views of the House in the service. It was upon commercial grounds. We believed that inasmuch as England was lending the aid of government to sustain her mail lines, giving them an advantage beyond the reach of private competition, and as she by that means was likely to monopolize all the commerce between this country and Europe, that was of such a description as would naturally fall into these lines, it was necessary that we should do something to counteract it. That was mainly upon this ground, that I favored the establishment of the ocean mail routes. I never advocated them as a quasi public service. Their whole character, as I have said, has been changed in the other wing of the capitol, and it is now to be controlled by the Secretary of the Navy, making it. I might almost say, an addition to the naval establishment of the country. But, whatever I might think in regard to these mail lines, I wish the government would hold itself as far as it can in its present relation to them; I wish that these contracts, which I think are not advantageous to the government, should be limited to a reasonable term, as the subject is now submitted to us, and I think if we are to be held to the contracts on our part, we should hold the contractors to them on theirs. They have engaged to perform certain service, and they now ask us to furnish the capital to enable them to do it. Does not every one see, that this changes the nature of the transaction? The capital is the principal thing, and if the contracts had been proposed for with the understanding that the government should furnish the capital, can any one doubt that they would have been obtained on more liberal terms?

Now, the Senator proposes to give them their pay four or five months before they are entitled to it. Why, it is idle to talk about their having any claim on account of these ships being delivered to the government. They are not government ships, they are private ships, and cannot belong to the government. The Senator says that this is a very advantageous contract, and that Mr. Todd did not intend to perform the service for $150,000 a year. The Senator will recollect that a bill was introduced by me to authorize a contract for this service at $150,000. Mr. Todd requested me to put his name in the bill. I told him I could not do so, that it must be open to competition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—Will the Senator allow me to ask him what the government receives back for this outlay? Is it any more than the transportation of the mail, or do the officers of these vessels account to the government for the passage money?

Mr. NILES.—In answer to the Senator I can only state, that in regard to the Bremen line, the government has no interest whatever, except what they derive from the carriage of letters. An inquiry has been made as to the amount received by the government from those mail lines. I believe, so far, there has been very little received. Some time ago I was informed that the receipts amounted to $11,000, and I believe they have made one or two trips since. I am not sure, but that in some of these other lines, other rights are secured to the government, as the conveyance of public stores, or something of that sort, but there is no substantial or direct interest, except that which the government has in the conveyance of the mail, and it was never supposed that that would amount to a sum at all commensurate. These lines are sustained mainly on commercial grounds, as being necessary to place us on an equality with our great rival in this line of trade.

Mr. ALLEN.—The act under which this system arises passed in 1845, and the first contract made under it was, I believe, about the middle of that year. When the matter was first introduced here I opposed it on various grounds. In the first place I doubted its constitutionality. In the second place, I knew it was bad policy for the government to go into partnership with individuals or companies in the transaction of any business. In the third place, I knew likewise that the system, if it once got into being would be very apt to find the means of perpetuating its own existence, and that from a small beginning it would run into one of the heaviest burthens that can be, or ever has been imposed upon the public Treasury. Sir, at that time the friends of this system refused to consider it as a system. They spoke of the great profits derived by Great Britain from the transmission of letters between New York and Liverpool both ways; and the plea was that the people of the United States ought to participate in this profit. And the other argument was, that in order, that not only the people, but the government should participate in the advantages of this peculiar system—that like the British government our government should form contracts with individuals or companies to transport our mails in steam vessels of a particular construction, which would admit of their being suddenly converted from business vessels into vessels of war. It was upon these two arguments that this system was originally commenced. It was said, that in this line of communication large profits would accrue to our government and people, because profits had largely accrued to Great Britain. It was said that the government ought to adopt the British policy of employing mail steamers in order indirectly to augment its naval power. This was the argument. But the constitutionality of the act was not a thing materially insisted on. It was a matter of extreme inconvenience to the advocates of this law, to lay their finger upon that part of the constitution from which the power to pass the law could be legitimately deduced. I know that this system having been commenced, it is not in my power to break it down by a single blow. I know that all I can say upon this occasion will effect nothing whatever, save possibly to fix more earnestly the attention of government upon this pauper vocation. But I know likewise, that if the pernicious system be not assailed again and again—and especially a system that contains within itself the elements of perpetuating its own life—if it be not assailed in time, and vigorously assailed, it will soon grow beyond the power of assault. I asked for the constitutional authority for the passage of this act, and I now demand the constitutional authority for its continuance. There are but two parts to the constitution to which I presume my friends of this measure will resort. The one is the power to establish post routes and post offices. Until I hear whether it be upon that clause that the constitutionality of this act is rested, I will not go into an examination of the question, farther than to say that the clause is necessarily confined to the interior of the country over which that constitution prevails. The other clause is that which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce between the United States and foreign nations, and between one state and the Indian tribes. Until I know that it is upon that clause that the power is rested, I need only say that I deny its application to any such case. Here is not a question of regulating commerce, unless the transmission of articles is a means of regulating commerce. The idea of regulating commerce negatives that of the government engaging as a merchant in the transportation of articles. The constitution provides that Congress may regulate commerce, that is to say, it may make all needful rules and regulations, to give security and efficiency to, and promote the interests of our people in their trade with foreign countries. If Congress has authority under the plea of interest, or any other plea, to establish post routes between our continent and all the other countries of the globe, and to transmit the mail, or in other words, to transmit pieces of paper called letters, they have an equal right to transport beeswax, furs, and pork, and all the products of the country. What is the right that the government has to transport letters, or to organize a system of mail transportation? Where do they get the power? They get it expressly from the constitution. It is not a power that belongs to the government, as a government, any more than a power to transport flour. Our government derives its power from an express clause in the constitution. Without that clause, the government would have had no such right. It is derived solely from express grant. It was granted to the government for this single reason, that the mail and post office system was one so necessarily removed in its extent, so complex, extending over so vast an area, as to render it utterly impossible for any one individual, or any combination of individuals, to give that security, that unity, that uniformity to the transmission of letters through the mails which the public authority could give to it. And upon that ground the authority was vested as a tax upon the people for the transportation of the mails and, as a necessary consequence, to establish post offices and post routes. Without that Congress would have had no more right to send wagons, freighted with documents, across the Alleghanies than they would have had to send wagons freighted with flour. Nor have they any more right to transport letters across the Atlantic, under the sanction of public authority, than to transport any of the productions of the country. But, sir, as to the matter of profit, the answer given by the Senator from Connecticut to the question of the Senator from Kentucky is the most potent argument that reason admits of. It is the argument of fact. The profit thus far has been a mere bagatelle. But we have to establish this system—and the law contemplates it upon its face—in order to augment our naval force. For what? I do not know what the appropriation for the naval establishment will be this year. When I first came here, it was a fraction under three millions of dollars.

A SENATOR.—It is now four millions.

Mr. ALLEN.—This establishment, that originated in the post office, has now contrived to shift itself into the Navy Department, and to give itself a new character—throwing off its character of mail service, and taking on the character of the military defence of the country. Well, sir, where are the uses of this vast augmentation of the naval establishment? Great Britain was taken as the pattern by which we were to guide and shape our legislation. Unfortunately nine-tenths of the bad legislation which we have ever enacted has originated in the spirit of British imitation, when, in point of truth, considering the different internal condition of the two countries, and the different structure of the governments of the two countries, that which is politic in Great Britain is impolitic with us, for the very reason that it is politic there. Our conditions are reversed. Our constitutions are not only dissimilar, but ours is an exact inversion of the British constitution; and the true mode of reasoning is to reason on the assumption that that which is true in regard to the British system is false with regard to ours; because the systems are opposite—the one being the inverse-ion of the other. What is the fact in regard to her? Great Britain is a central power, in the immediate vicinity of the continent of Europe, a small island, not a twentieth part so large as the acquisitions which we have made within the last four years. She has sixty-odd colonies, stretched all around the globe, and occupying those points which give to Great Britain the greatest facility in monopolizing the commerce of the carrying-trade of the globe. Her empire spread over the world's surface, and comprehending about fifty-four separate and distinct parts of the earth, separated from the other portions of the globe by intervening waters—in such an empire, founded upon commerce, sustained by commerce, living and breathing by commerce, and that commerce dependent on maintaining unimpaired the integrity of her empire in all its extremities—in this state of things it is wisdom, the very perfection of wisdom for Great Britain to augment her navy. She has given commercial law to the world. She has done the manufacturing for the world, until within the last thirty years—since which time other European States, and, above all America, have become her great rivals, not only in manufactures, but likewise in tonnage and navigation. This circumstance exposes the distant parts of her empire to all the assaults which the jealousy and rivalry of distant and hostile governments may suggest to them as their best policy to make. Canada lies within the vicinity of a power which has but to stretch forth its hand and wrest it from her when it pleases, and when it becomes important that it should be done, threatened by the double ambition of France and Russia, and her possessions everywhere subject to be seized upon by the rapacity of rival nations. Nothing could be more politic with Great Britain than to unite her naval force, to unite defence with trade, to make it the interest of every merchant, if that were possible, to transport the products of the country, or his goods, wares, and merchandize in armed vessels. It is for these reasons that Great Britain has encouraged this thing. Does any man suppose that it was for the petty consideration of a little postage, that Great Britain adopted the system? Can any man be weak enough to suppose that it was ever a question in the British cabinet, how many pennies could be made by carrying letters between New York and Liverpool? Never such a thought occurred there. It was but a disguised mode of keeping a floating armed power in the vicinity of all nations. How is it with us? Where are our distant possessions? Where are our sixty odd colonies placed in the vicinity of great and powerful nations, and subject to be seized upon unless closely guarded? Where are they? There are but eight millions of tonnage in the world, of which Great Britain has three and a half millions; the United States one million and a half; France less than a million; and the other nations of the world the balance divided between them. No man dreams of such a thing in this country. How is it with Great Britain? Sir, British statesmen have sense enough to know that a conflict with the United States would end in the dissolution of her empire. There is no prospect of a war. Yet we are indirectly to augment the expenses of our naval establishment, under the name of mail facilities to one million and a half dollars per annum, and about this already vastly increased expenditure. That is the sum total of it. When this system was begun it provided but for one line, and it was expected to pay for itself. Our whole post office establishment originated with the idea that the income should defray the expenses; and it was not until a few years ago that that idea was abandoned. After a while the two systems were blended, the Treasury and the post office. The income of the post office was treated as so much revenue, and the payments to sustain the establishment went out as so many appropriations from the common Treasury. That has occurred within my day. It was a forced result—forced upon the government and the necessities of the country. The people of the West demanded, as they had a right to demand in their sparse settlements, mail accommodations. The post office had to yield to the demand, relying upon the revenues accruing to the Post Office Department from these post offices and routes to meet the additional, which the establishment of other routes and offices imposed upon the Treasury. This the government did in order to accommodate the widely expanded settlements of the interior of the western country. It was found that the income of the general establishment was insufficient to meet the expenses, and therefore they had to resort to the public Treasury for aid. Sir, this is of all periods the most auspicious for increase in our public expenditure. We have recently come out of a war, and although it has been ably conducted financially, the first war ever conducted in such a manner as to leave undisturbed the business and credit of the people and the government, yet it is a war which leaves some little debt behind it. But above all the reasons I have advanced, sir, is the one that we have made a vast acquisition of territory. We have doubled the size of our original limits within the last four years—so that we now reach to the Pacific and extend along its coast several degrees. All this region is to some extent peopled. With every part of the country this government must hold some kind of communication. You will have to have a post office at the mouth of the Columbia river as well as a custom-house. You will have to have them up the Columbia river and along the coast of the Pacific; in the interior of California and upon the eastern side of the Rocky mountains, at least to New Mexico, and in that country. Hence it will be impossible to avoid the necessity of imposing upon the interior post office establishment the expense that will arise from establishing mail facilities in these acquisitions. It cannot be avoided; government must keep open communications with its constituents. You cannot, then, by any device avoid the necessity of increasing the expenses of the interior post office establishment very considerably—much beyond its income. Is it, then, a time, when our internal expenses in the administration of the Post Office Department are about to be so greatly increased, by extending throughout this extensive region of country mail accommodations—to expand this ocean post office system that comprehends the whole human race? This same necessity which makes it important to establish this ocean steamer mail route between Liverpool and New York, can be plead for establishing a mail route between any one point in the United States, and any other commercial point on the face of our globe. Our Yankee friends, whose enterprise and genius was celebrated more than half a century ago by British statesmen and writers, and who were spoken of as having made England ashamed of her want of enterprise and sagacity, from the extent to which they had carried the maritime researches of our country—our Yankee friends, I say, have already their sails [illegible] many American flags to every portion of our globe, wherever there is a man to purchase and money to pay with. Well, sir, they have opened communications with all these places. They have communication by letter, and the argument which makes you carry one man's letter to his correspondent in Liverpool or London, enforces the necessity of carrying another man's letter to his correspondent in China. If the reason is good in the one case it is good in the other. In this case the reason given for action upon the matter is the augmentation of the navy. It cannot be pretended that we are to do it for the sake of the trifling profit accruing from the operation of the system. If there is to be any profit, I am in favor of its going to the people. Do not let the government become a trader or trafficker, a copartner with the merchant on the seaboard—it may be salt fish and beef, and pork as well as letters and papers. If there be any profit, let it reward the services and enterprise of our people.

My answer to this argument of "augmenting the navy," is that our public means of defence should never depend upon private individuals or companies of men. If it be necessary to augment the navy, do it through the ordinary channels—by appropriations for the use of the navy, under the administration of laws which require our ships to be built under the eye of our superintendence, and commanded by men responsible to you, and submitted to the commands of these ships by the voice of the Senate. Sir, the whole system is a system of humbug. Sir, there never will be a ship called for in the service of the country, but that there will be a knocking at the doors of Congress, session after session, of augmenting, numbers of men coming forward with memorials to Congress setting forth many plausible reasons for the establishment of this line of steamers, and asking for allowance of money to secure their establishment. Shakspeare illustrates a very prevalent trait of human nature in the long repetition of the word "opportunity." I might illustrate the facility with which bills pass the two Houses of Congress by the word "importunity." Why, in this very case, according to the showing of the chairman of the committee, one of the parties who bid for these contracts, retired from the department because he had been most successful in getting the act through—that is by begging and coaxing members of the two Houses, and by importunity in extorting from those who would not vote for his bill, a promise that they would not vote it all. And thus it is, sir, bills are passed here, and their passage is considered as an act of the concentrated will and reason of Congress. Sir, they have no will or reasoning whatever but the private claims of the individual at whose solicitude the bill was passed. It is the case with all legislative bodies, and in the nature of things must forever be the case. It cannot be avoided.—Men who want to make fortunes out of the public treasury can always devise plausible arguments in favor of certain schemes, and present them to legislators, and by their importunity succeed in attaining their desired end. Half of the vicious legislation in the world has originated that way. Sir, this system will get to be one of the finest fields for speculations imaginable, if it goes on. It will be equal to the "South Sea Company" project, or the Mississippi scheme. Men come here and obtain contracts amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, and go away into the great market of monied men, and trade them off as a matter of speculation. That, I understand, has been the case with one of these contracts. What inducement does this not hold out to keen, sharp-sighted men, who desire to speculate and make money at the expense of the public treasury, to come here and get other contracts? It is better than roulette or the gaming table, because if a man does not get a contract, he loses nothing. The hazard is altogether with the government. He loses nothing, and becomes acquainted with the leading and most influential spirits of the land.

Sir, a million and a half of per annum expenditure now accrues, and this is only the fourth year this system has been in existence—an augmentation of nearly a fourth of a million a year since the commencement of this kind of expenditure. According to this rate of increase, what will be the burden of debt that in twenty years this system will impose upon the treasury? Why, at that rate, the revenue of our entire custom-house will not defray the annual expenditure necessary to keep up this system. Sir, there are from fifteen to eighteen thousand post offices in this country under the general administration of the department. The mail arrives at every one of these offices once a week, some twice a week, and a large number once a day; and the whole newspaper publications of this Union are thus transported and scattered among the people as well as the letters, for less than five millions of dollars per annum. But this system of transporting letters from one merchant to another in foreign countries, in the fourth year of its life, costs our country annually one million and a half dollars, with a prospect of its augmentation in three or four years, to some four or five millions. Sir, if a man should move the establishment of a post office on a piece of land within twenty miles of which there are twenty American citizens residing, I would vote for it, but I cannot vote to spend a million and a half of the people's money in carrying letters between the bankers and importing merchants of New York and Liverpool. I am opposed, sir, to all these government copartnerships. This system is a forcible illustration of the infallible tendency of even the best regulated government in the world, to meddle in other people's business, and undertaking to supersede the enterprise of private individuals with their own superior means. We have commenced to send letters. Can we not put the public ships of the navy into service, to be commanded by private men, to transport the produce of this country across the Atlantic with as much propriety as we can build up a disguised navy, under the plea that it is private property, resting in a contract the right to call it ours when necessary? All the money spent to arm this country should be administered by the public, and responsible agents of the country. But, I repeat, this is not the time to swell our expenditures in any form. We have no pretext of colonial possessions to defend. We have none of the reasons, domestic or foreign, that Great Britain has for keeping up a navy that stretches over the globe. The English government has plenty of reasons for keeping up her navy and colonial system. She has to augment her income proportionate to the demands of the younger members of the nobility, and those who desire commissions in the navy and appointments to the administration of the provinces. We have no reason that exist for increasing our navy. Sir, the more we expend in sending letters to England, the less we have left to pay for sending letters to our constituents. If we are to spend a million and a half of dollars, let us spend it in establishing post offices in the interior of our own country, for mail facilities rather than for the benefit of the British, Chinese, or any other people. Sir, let this system of expenditure expand and increase—let the apex of this pyramid rise within the public view, and it will be struck down. Whenever the people find that their petitions and memorials for new mail routes are passed by unnoticed, whilst millions of the public money are voted to send letters to China and Great Britain, they will soon legislate this law from the statute book, and annul the contracts. Sir, I array the internal country against the outer world in this competition for post offices? I claim for America the facilities and mail accommodations which this government can afford to give. I put up the claims of the American people in rivalry to and against the claims of the whole human race on the other side of the globe for the expenditure of the public money of this country in the transportation of the mails. Sir, for one, I must say, that this job-giving legislation of ours is doing the treasury of this country more harm, so far as the financial action of the government is considered, than any other branch of its legislation.

There are two sources of revenue, one source is derived from the public lands. In the administration of the public land recently acquired—where the expense of surveying will equal the income to be derived from the sale of the lands—the fund or revenue will be diminished rather than increased. The other source from which revenue is derived, is the custom house; and who wants the old fashioned discriminating, bounty giving system of the tariff restored? Who desires to see a resort to that exploded and nation-condemned system of tariff duties by which it costs ninety millions of dollars to get thirty millions into the Treasury? Whoever desires to see such a spectacle is the man, and the only man who is justified in voting for such an appropriation as this. Who is it that wants to see this government expending money with one hand while it borrows with the other? Who is it that wishes to see this government commencing a system of public debt—a system which has brought England within a step of her utter downfall, and under which she will sink during the present generation of her people—predicated upon the idea that so long as government can borrow money, people may importune and hold out inducements for them to spend it? If there be any man who is desirous of looking upon the spectacle, then there is another person justified in voting to sustain this corrupting system. Or if there be a man who is anxious to resort to the only human means left to replenish the Treasury—direct taxation upon the people, let that man stand up and proclaim it, and he will be justified also in sustaining this system; but no other man is. Sir, you have a mighty interest banded together to sustain this system, including all the stock jobbers and contract getters in the land. You are offering your bounty to sharp-sighted keen-witted men, to get together and devise schemes to rob the public Treasury in the form of establishing these routes, so as to make them as numberless as the lines on the surface of our globe. Sir, mark the progress you are likely to make in this system of expenditure, and compare it with the progress you have made during the four years of time. You commenced it in the form of a small favor to facilitate the transportation of a single mail, and in four years time there is a demand of thirteen hundred thousand dollars upon the Treasury to sustain a system which threatens an enormous and a dangerous increase through all future time. This system must be stopped, otherwise it will compel us to borrow money to keep it up, while at the same time from this expenditure of means, we will have to keep down our own post offices. Sir, this day I make an issue between the internal and external post offices of this country, as between the American people on the one side, and the external world on the other—and claim that this one million and a half of money shall be expended for the accommodation of the people of the United States, and not for the accommodation of the world at large.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—Inasmuch as the passage of the bills establishing these lines of mail steamers in the other branch of Congress, was owing in some degree to the strenuous support which I gave to the measure, there may be some propriety perhaps in my offering a few remarks in reply to the statements of the honorable gentleman from Ohio. He appears to have demonstrated to his own satisfaction—but I trust not to the satisfaction of the Senate or the country—that this whole system of ocean mail steamers is a gross violation of the constitution. He has made an appeal to the great West, and announced that he has made an issue to be even "internal America and the external world." Of course he takes the side of America. But I am not exactly willing to admit that in voting for these lines of mail steamers, and in taking a deep and abiding interest in their success I was arraying myself against the interests of my own country; and I confess I am not altogether able to comprehend the force of his constitutional objection. The gentleman asserts that there are but two clauses of the constitution upon which we could predicate this bill. He then quotes the provision authorizing the establishing of post routes, and the other giving Congress the authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations. He says he will not enter into a detail of his views to show the unconstitutionality of this system, but he denies emphatically that either of these clauses confers the power to establish it. Now the first clause conveys the power in express many words, and he himself reading the constitution was arrested by it—was obliged to quote it, and then found it convenient to refrain from any attempt to disprove the existence of the power. After quoting these two clauses, he informed us that in his opinion, this power could not be exercised under the authority of the Post Office Department, because the government was induced to adopt the system, not from any paltry consideration of dollars and cents, but from a great leading principle of policy, with a view to the creation of a navy. Ah! So, then, he has discovered that this is a bill to establish a navy. It seems to me he might have read another clause of the constitution which says, that Congress shall have power to establish a navy, and his constitutional objections, might, in that way, have been entirely removed. I supported this system upon the three grounds to which he has alluded—first, as a measure for the purpose of increasing our mail facilities between America and all other parts of the civilized globe; secondly, for the purpose of extending our commerce, our tonnage, and our commercial intercourse throughout the whole world, making us the first maritime power of the globe; and, thirdly, for the purpose of creating the most powerful navy, with the most economical expenditure of money. I firmly believe, that all these important objects may be effectually accomplished by this system, which the gentleman from Ohio has so vehemently denounced. By the expenditure of the money called for by these bills, you set afloat ten steam ships, ready for the defence of this country in the time of war—for the extension of our commerce in time of peace—for the transportation of passengers and mails throughout the globe. Your navy is thus increased by the addition of these ten vessels, fitted for all these useful purposes, whereas, in the old mode of building up your navy, only one ship of war could have been added by the same expenditure.

But the gentleman says, that if the object be to create a navy, he wishes no partnership of the government with individuals. He entertains a great horror of these "contracts," and "stock-jobbing affairs." He sees fraud in every contract. Does the gentleman mean to say that there were no contracts under the old system of ship building by the Navy Department? Were there no "fat jobs" then dealt out to the contractors who returned around your halls? Were there no persons appealing to you for permission to build your national ships as an improved model? I wonder if the gentleman himself was not then as much besieged by contractors looking for "fat jobs" and expecting to make fortunes out of the government, as under the present system. Have we not had in this war all the private establishments for the manufacture of munitions of war, in the employment of the government at enormous prices? How many private ships have been chartered by the government for the purpose of carrying supplies and acting as transports, at an expenditure of each trip of nearly as much as the vessel originally cost? In all this, has there been no speculating out of the government, which might have been avoided if there had been thirty or forty mail steamers, of which the government could have availed itself without increasing this immense extra expenditure, and have saved millions in this war, if the system of ocean mail steamers had been in operation when the war commenced? But the gentleman goes on to say, that in adopting this system we are aping Great Britain, and that nine-tenths of all our bad laws were borrowed from some sort of British precedent. He might have gone further and said that nine-tenths of all our good laws came from the same source. Just look at the gentleman's argument? Because some of the laws of Great Britain are not adapted to our system of government, we must reject every thing that is good in her policy; because the political principles of Great Britain are in a great measure antagonistic to ours, it therefore follows, that the great principles of commerce and trade which are universally recognized throughout the globe, are to be reversed by us, because, adopted by Great Britain! To carry out his views consistently, the gentleman should refuse to speak the same language which prevails in Great Britain; he should call upon us to repudiate any system of religion professed in Great Britain; he should direct our sailors to abandon the nautical instruments which may be used in Great Britain, and refuse sail by the same compass. The gentleman could hardly have been serious in using such an argument. One of the most forcible reasons which can be urged in favor of these steam lines is to be found in the fact that Great Britain has adopted the system and has prosecuted it with so much energy and success. It is only a branch of that sagacious policy which has extended the commerce of Great Britain to every part of the habitable globe. She well knows the value of these steamships, afloat on every sea. They constitute a most formidable addition to that power which she possesses on the ocean, by which she is prepared to resist any aggressive policy, or to assail any who attempt to thwart her views. Are we to remain blind to the advantages of such a system, and by which we may be enabled to defend our commerce and our coasts? I doubt much whether "internal America" would like very well, to see her coasts surrounded by this network of British steamships, guarding British possessions on all sides of us—hemming us in—monopolizing the trade, and diminishing the tonnage of our own country, whilst we stood by with folded arms, destitute of any power of resistance. Great Britain has possessions all around our borders—the Canadas on the north, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick on the northeast, the Bahamas, Jamaica, and other West India Islands on the south, and with numerous lines of mail steamers, she connects them all together. Yet the gentleman says that in following this policy in order to resist encroachments and maintain our independence, we are merely aping Great Britain. No, sir! We are engaging in the great struggle for the mastery of the seas—for the empire of the ocean. And as for internal American—as a representative of the people from the great West, where the gentleman is afraid all the forts are to be broken down if this system is sustained—I feel too much indignation when I behold these attempts on the part of Great Britain to monopolize trade and commerce, to remain quiescent. We have demonstrated that we are the first power upon the land—that upon this continent we can conquer the whole world if they will come here to fight us. Our superiority on the land is settled; it now remains to be established upon the ocean. But as long as Great Britain possesses superior steam power upon the ocean, she will be mistress of the seas. The wonderful progress of science and the arts in our day, has wrought mighty changes in the means of offence and defence possessed by the great powers of the earth. Your old sailing vessels—your old ships of war, built for an age gone by—have become comparatively useless. Steam is now the great element, not only in your manufactories, but it is the controlling agency which regulates your commerce, and gives victory in any contest upon the seas. Therefore, we must aim to excel in this great element of prosperity, and strength upon the sea.

I feel peculiar satisfaction in being able to say that I have supported this system from the beginning. I have given it an energetic and zealous, though, perhaps, inefficient support. I have been its steady and unshrinking friend, and nothing which has fallen from the Senator from Ohio has in the least degree shaken my confidence in it. The gentleman tells us that there will never be occasion to call for one of these steam vessels, to be employed in carrying the mail, though at the same time subject to our command the day that war is declared, or sooner if the President gives the order. I trust in God there never will be such a necessity. But if we really desire that state of things, we can secure it only by being prepared for war at any instant, and by satisfying the European world that, whilst they coalesce and intrigue in order to regulate the balance of power on that continent, they must mind their own business and let America alone. We can only secure honorable peace, by convincing others that it is their interest to refrain from encroachments or any aggressive policy upon us—by satisfying them that we have the power of avenging the first insult—that we have the means at hand, not merely to resist, but to chastise the first invasion of our rights. That, I repeat, can be done only by the possession of a steam navy.

But the Senator from Connecticut insists that in this case we build the vessels ourselves, whereas they should have been built by the private contractors. I do not admit this proposition. By these contracts the contractors were bound to construct the vessels at their own expense; but in accordance with the mode prescribed by the Navy Department when constructed and put afloat, a naval was officer to be received on board with instructions in his pocket from the head of the Navy Department, authorizing him to take command whenever the interests of the country might demand it and the contingency pointed out in his instructions presented itself. A double advantage is secured by this arrangement. Vessels are always ready and fit for sea; whereas, if built at your own expense, and laid up in your docks, when the period arrives when they are needed, you find that they have rotted down, that officers and crews must be procured, and months elapse before the vessels can be fitted for sea and put afloat. But these steam vessels are always afloat—with the crews aboard—ammunition and fuel stored—steam up—ready for use at any moment. Again: as steam has now become a substitute for sailing power, it becomes necessary to educate your naval officers anew. Your old commodores, post captains, and captains who have commanded during their lives upon the briny ocean the old fashioned vessels, know nothing of the steam vessels. You must educate your naval officers in the principles of steam navigation. These steam lines afford the means of giving these officers that experience in the management of steam ships, which is now absolutely necessary.

There was a strange incongruity in his argument—if I may be allowed to say so with perfect respect to the Senator from Ohio. He went on to prove in the first place, that if the object of this system was to make money in carrying the mails, the whole plan was wrong, because this government had no right to enter into competition with private individuals in carrying papers and mails, any more than in conveying flour, beef or pork. He said it was a sort of trade, trading business on the part of the government, and he was entirely opposed to the government becoming a money making machine. The most efficient part of the gentleman's argument was based upon that assumption. After proving conclusively that it was wrong to go into that system of money making, the gentleman with great ingenuity, took another tack, and made a calculation that the system would cost the government a million and a half per annum, without a dollar of income. These propositions destroy each other—both can not be true, and, as I firmly believe, neither of them can be sustained. No friend of this system ever expects that it will be a source of money making. But directly in the face of his denunciation of this system, as a money-making one, in which the government should not engage, the gentleman made a gloomy allusion to the public debt of England, and remarked that if we wished to create a similar debt, it was necessary only to adopt the same system which had produced it there. Does the gentleman need to be informed that this system of steam ocean navigation never produced a dollar of debt in England, and that the public debt of that country was created by very different causes? Here, however, is the incongruity in the argument of the gentleman to which I alluded, in one breath he denounces the system as a money making one, and in the next he assures us that it will involve us in a public debt. The friends of the system do not anticipate that it will do more than pay its way, and that is all they desire. They do not seek to make it a source of revenue. They wish it to be managed as the Post Office Department is managed—as the revenue increases, the rates of postage are to be reduced, and the system made merely to support itself.

The gentleman is entirely mistaken when he represents this as a stock jobbing system. It is precisely analagous to the employment of a stage, steamboat, or railroad car for the transportation of the mail. We pay so much to the contractor for the service, and receive the proceeds of the mails. Is not the Senator aware that England has been endeavoring to secure a monopoly in the transportation of letters across the Atlantic? Does he desire that she should succeed in that effort? Our self-respect, our feeling of national pride, justice to our fellow citizens—the plainest principles of public policy, all demand the continuance of this system. Borrowing a favorite expression of the Senator from Ohio, I would say that destiny demands it. If we are to become that ocean bound republic—extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, of which we have heard so much, if we are to blot out the red lines from the maps, and obtain the mastery of this entire continent, realizing that glorious future which has formed the theme of some of the most eloquent speeches of the Senator from Ohio, I can assure him that all this is to be attained, only by acquiring that ascendency on the seas which we have secured upon the land. If, on the other hand, we remain with folded arms, and suffer England to go on extending her maratime power with her one hundred or two hundred steamers, and we should happen to come into collision with her, what, I ask, then becomes of your eight hundred whale ships in the Pacific ocean, your forty thousand American citizens there, and your twenty millions of American capital afloat upon those seas? How is the gentleman to carry out his favorite views of progress and extension, in which I most cordially concur, unless we should be able to cope with any power on the high seas? That equality can be obtained only by fostering and extending our steam marine; and that great object can be obtained under this system of mail steamers, at one tenth the cost of any other system which can be proposed. Every consideration then, of national policy and self-interest, our pride as American citizens, and our obligation to extend and perpetuate our glorious institutions, requires us to bestow a sustaining and fostering care upon this system of ocean steam navigation. I do not desire its abuses to be sustained or tolerated; but its great inherent merits, I desire to be acknowledged and sustained. If experience discovers abuses, let them be removed: let exorescences be lopped off as they present themseves, but do not because of them, destroy this system. As a western man coming from the prairies, where the population is spare, and we have just ground of complaint on account of insufficient mail service, I must declare that I am not to be rallied under an internal banner, against the Atlantic States, on a question of so great national importance. In this system, sir, the western States have really more interest than those upon our Atlantic border. The West is a great producing country. We raise from the teeming earth provision enough to feed the world. Of course we want a market, and unless that be opened to us, our productions are of comparatively little value. Extend your commerce—your tonnage—your marine power, and you open to us a market. Steam is the great agency by which your commerce is to be extended, and therefore the people of the West are, of all others in this land, interested in the extension of our trade and commerce by means of this great element of commercial power in modern times.

I did not intend to say a word on this bill, but it so happened—as I have already remarked—that when a member of the House of Representatives, it was my fortune to take some part in the support of the measure when first presented to the consideration of Congress. In the efforts which I then made to establish the system, I acted, amongst others, with a Senator whom I have now the pleasure to see here. I, therefore, felt it to be my duty to oppose any attempt to cripple the system until it had a fair trial. If it prove a failure, I shall be among the first to acknowledge my error; but now that the system has been commenced, I demand for it a fair trial, believing that a short time will demonstrate who have been right and who have been wrong in regard to its importance in every point of view.

Mr. CALHOUN said that when the bill first came before Congress he opposed its passage; but as it had become a law, and as he maintained the principle that encouragement should be extended to contractors in the faithful performance of their contracts, he felt disposed to vote in favor of the proposition now before the Senate. In this determination he was strengthened by the fact that the proposition had met with the approbation of the head of the department. He would, therefore, vote in favor of giving this advance to the contractors.

Mr. BENTON remarked that his opinions with respect to the system had not been changed. He was in favor, however, of going on and perfecting the contracts which had been made. He was the more disposed to do so from the consideration, that if this experiment were successful, great facilities of communication with a vast territory belonging to the United States, three thousand miles off by land, would be afforded. He would, therefore, vote in favor of the advance.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, supported the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. He would execute the contract with fidelity—carry it out to the letter; but according to his present information, he was not prepared to give the advance which was asked. It was desirable, he thought, to have a little more light upon the subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he would vote for the amendment.—He was opposed to giving the advance, the interest on which would be equivalent to an hundred dollars a month. He presented a statement of the various laws which had been passed upon this subject, and spoke of the very great increase in the appropriation required for the support of these steam lines. He thought that the packets advertised to sail daily and weekly from New Orleans and New York might be employed in the transportation of the mails at a much smaller expenditure than that now required. He hoped that the expectations of his friend from Illinois might be realized, but it seemed to him that the enterprize had commenced under very unfavorable auspices.

Mr. HALE strenuously supported the proposition to allow an advance to the contractors, in order to enable them to carry out their contract with the greatest possible advantage to the government. As to the amount of expenditure necessary to sustain these steam lines, he regarded it as applied to a most useful purpose. It was taking a part of the immense expenditure of the government and applying it to the useful purposes of progress—the extension of commerce and the cultivation of the arts of peace, which tended to elevate instead of degrading mankind. The advance had been recommended by the department itself, and he should like to know wherein the inequality or impropriety in making that advance consisted.

Mr. NILES said that he was somewhat surprised that his two friends on that side of the chamber, who had been so decidedly opposed to the whole system when it was first presented a few years ago, and one of whom, he believed, had denounced it as a humbug, should have become so signally converted to it that they were willing to sanction a principle unknown in this government, now proposed to be applied to it. His friend from New Hampshire must have got a little out of his reckoning, for here there were neither free soil nor free territory, no, free trade, but there was a monopoly to be sanctioned by this government. There was no precedent for this proposed advance; and he saw nothing whatever to justify it in the present case.

He had another amendment which he intended to offer, whether the one then before the Senate prevailed or not, limiting all these contracts to a period of five years. The contract had been made originally for ten years, because the contractors would consent to no other terms; and a sort of compromise had been made that the extension to ten years would be subject to the action of Congress at the present session. If the appropriation were made without action on that, it would be confirmation of the terms of the contract.

Mr. YULEE said that in some of the views of the Senator from Connecticut he fully concurred, while there were others to which he could not give his assent. It was in the power of Congress to reduce the term of the contract, but he did not think it expedient to exercise the power. The parties had discovered great fidelity, and built fine vessels, which were now nearly ready for the service. But he did concur in the amendment to strike out the allowance of an advance. Such an advance would be in violation of that sound policy which had been observed by the government with great carefulness from the earliest period. He referred to the special provisions made in 1823, prohibiting advances upon contracts. There was no tightness in the money market now, and, therefore, the reason urged in the early part of the session for making the advance did not now exist. He thought it would be very bad policy in the government, at a time when it was paying a high rate of interest for money, to borrow money for these gentlemen.

It was alleged that because of the enlargement in the size of these vessels, Congress should make the advancement proposed. Now, this enlargement had not only been made without the concurrence of the officers of the government in the Navy Department, but in one of the cases it was made in direct violation of the purpose and spirit of the act of Congress. This was the case with the line from New York to Liverpool, where enlargements had already been made to an enormous extent. The Great Britain had been found to be altogether too cumbersome for the advantageous navigation of the ocean. These steamers were intended to furnish an addition to the means of coast defence—were intended to be useful on our coast as war-steamers. Yet these vessels had been made of such a size as that it rendered it impossible to apply them to that purpose. There were not not more than two or three ports upon the Atlantic coast that could be entered by these vessels. Charleston harbor could not be entered at low water, and Savannah harbor might be touched at but could not be entered. It was the intention of Congress that both of these ports should be entered by these vessels. He had noticed, since the suggestion of this proposition of mail steamers, that several of the leading newspapers in the United States had taken ground against it as an interference with private enterprise by Congress. He hazarded nothing in saying that if the original terms of the contract were to be departed from, that the government owed it to itself, the Treasury, and the people of the country, from whose pockets the money was to be derived, that in making these advances, they should be made on terms that would be advantageous to the public Treasury. If we were to make these advances, he would undertake to say that the service could and would be undertaken by competent men for a sum less than three-fourths of that now proposed. If we were to alter the terms of the original contract and make advances, he would say again throw open the contract to competition, and let these parties come in upon more equal terms. These contractors had it in their power to have revoked these proposals if they were not found to be advantageous. They were entered into by the contractors with a full knowledge of their ability to carry them on or not; and therefore neither of them had any right to come to Congress and ask relief from the binding responsibility, which was on their part voluntarily assumed, after deliberate consideration.

Mr. CLAYTON.—A matter of grave consideration in the discussion of this question is, whether we shall not, by abandoning this system of mail steamers—which I apprehend, from the non-payment of these advances, there is some danger—give up the carrying trade of this country to England. We can compete with the British steamers, in steamers, if we choose, for the carrying trade, but not with packet ships. England is thus getting up a steam navy at our expense, and at the expense of the great carrying trade of the country. They have already made the expenses of their steamers and some five millions over. I know no other way of maintaining the carrying trade of the country than by a system of mail steamers. It is objected that we contracted for steamers of 1,800 tons, and that they have been increased to twenty-seven hundred tons in size.

Mr. YULEE.—The increase in the size of these ships has not been made at the instance of the Navy Department.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Well, it has been done at the instance of persons in the interest of the government. Either formally or informally the influence of the government has increased the size; and I think it was highly proper that the size should be increased. Steamers of fifteen hundred tons are not sufficient in size to enter into competition with British steamers. If we can only make up our minds to cooperate with the energies of our own countrymen, as the English government do with theirs, I have no doubt we can successfully compete with these British steamers in the carrying trade.

Mr. BUTLER.—I would ask what security or lien this government has on these ships; and what prevents the selling of these ships in foreign ports?

Mr. ATHERTON.—I suppose the Secretary will make all the necessary provisions with the contractors for the entire security of the government. There is a provision in the contract which provides that the money advanced shall be secured to the government by a lien upon the ships, according as the Secretary of the Navy shall require. The twenty-five thousand dollars per month also is to be advanced until the ships are launched. So that there can be no doubt of the safety of making these advances.

Mr. BRADBURY.—I am in favor of observing the most scrupulous good faith on the part of this government, in carrying out all contracts that have been made under its authority. The motion of the Senator from Connecticut, as I understand it, is to strike out that part of the bill which provides for advances being made, these advances to constitute one part of the contract. Now, sir, these advances are not necessary to preserve our good faith; neither is it alleged that there are any unnecessary hardships growing out of this contract—that it is a hard one, or that the government has had an undue advantage in the transaction. On the contrary, it appears that the contract is a liberal one; and yet we are asked to make advances. Now, these advances are to be made to whom? Why, to the assignees of the contract. It appears that when the government made this contract it contracted with parties that were responsible. These responsible parties have transferred their contract to other individuals, who now apply to us saying they need advances. If we do not make them, what follows? Why, the original contractors will have to make them, and they are the ones who should do it. It is a mere question, then, whether the government shall make these advances, or the original contracting parties. Sir, if we make these advances, we will violate a sound principle; and we may rest assured if we begin it in this case, we shall have to do it in others where the claims are much stronger upon the liberality of the government. Again, we not only violate a sound principle, but we expose ourselves to a loss on account of the security. The language of the act, to be sure, is, that the advances are to be secured by a lien on the ships. But what security is that? Suppose they are burnt up, the government will not only have to lose the interest on the advances, but stand as insurers upon the ships for the amount of the advances. But the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy has been presented, that the money market was in such a state that there was danger that the contract could not be continued, from the inability of the contractors to obtain funds. Since that opinion was given the state of the money market has changed. The danger so much feared has passed away, and, therefore, the main reason on which the recommendation for advances is placed, has ceased to exist. I hope we shall preserve these contracts in good faith, and carry them out as they were originally made and understood.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I can assure gentlemen that I had no idea of perverting or misconstruing the tone of the debate. The whole object of my remarks was, to bring out the true state of the case, inasmuch as my understanding of it heretofore was picked up informally. I now understand this subject before us to involve three contracts. For one, sir, I must say that I am altogether opposed to making the advances asked for. If the credit of the individuals asking for advances is good in ordinary times, they will have no difficulty in having the money they require loaned them. The application for these advances has been based mainly upon the ground of the tightness of the money market. That state of things has passed away.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I would state to the honorable Senator from South Carolina that, so far from the money market being easy, the rate of interest on money in New York is from twelve to eighteen per cent. Within a few days past, also, the government stock has fallen from three-quarters to one per cent.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I do not think at any rate that the state of the money market should be the great consideration in this matter. Nothing is a good consideration but what is a quid pro quo. As to this whole affair my impressions from the beginning have been against it. I believe now, as I have ever believed, that it would be better to leave the matter open to private enterprise. I shall vote in favor of the motion made by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DIX.—My position is directly the reverse of my friend from Missouri on my left. I am in favor of the establishment of these mail lines, and opposed to making the advances asked for. In 1846 when this same subject of mail steamers was up from the other House, I then said, as I now reiterate, that this government, by this system, may be provided with a navy of steamers without making any advances whatever; and that these vessels ought to be but by private capitalists, and the government only required to pay a specific sum for a specific service. Contracts made on such a principle I would stand by, and as the contracts were thus made, I cannot consent to the allowance of these advances. The Senator from Delaware appears to think that if these advances are not made, these lines will be broken up, or as equivalent to the abandonment of the scheme. I do not so consider it. I have no doubt whether we make advances or not, that the contractors will go on and complete the vessels. With regard to the size of the vessels, the same remarks that apply to this line are applicable to the Bremen line. That line has in fact constructed two vessels and put them in operation without a single dollar of advance from this government. It is the only line that has done so. The third vessel now upon the stocks is as much larger in size than the first two constructed as those in the present case are larger than the original size contemplated. This increased size in the Bremen line has been found to be necessary; a larger vessel being found to be better adapted to the service.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I understood that this Bremen line was established for the purpose of having the vessels to use when necessary in our navy. I would ask whether these ships are not now owned principally by the foreign authorities of Bremen?

Mr. DIX.—I believe such is the case. The city of Bremen has advanced several hundred thousand dollars to the proprietors of this line. What security they have given I know not; though I think it has some lien upon the stock, that it is hypothecated to their city. I do not know the amount. With regard to competition I think it may be questioned whether this system of mail lines under the care of the government does not interfere with private enterprise, and destroy competition from private companies or individuals in the United States. Sometime since I was in conversation with one of the largest commercial firms in the United States. They told me that they were very desirous of establishing a steam mail line to the West Indies. Why do you not, I asked? Why, they replied, the government may make a contract with some other parties and break us down by contributing to the maintenance of this mail service. I have no doubt that the money required by these men may be had at any time. They can easily enter into an arrangement with some one of the monied men in New York, all the drawback consisting in the fact that they would of course have to give the parties making the advances a share in the advantages of the contract.

Mr. CLARKE.—Do you not think the assignees in this case are responsible men?

Mr. DIX.—I have made no enquiry into the matter. I suppose they are.

Mr. CLARKE.—I have no doubt of the fact. I know them to be responsible men.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I voted originally against the establishment of the Bremen, and all these schemes of ocean mail steamers, because I believed then, as I believe now, that there was considerable humbug about them. But we have got into the system, and I am for getting out of it as soon as I can, in the meantime doing what the interests of the country, and justice to the contractors requires. I shall vote for the advances which the honorable Senator from Connecticut moves to strike out. I am told that all, or nearly all of the stock of the Bremen line immediately after it was got up, was pledged in some way or other to the city of Bremen; so that to-morrow, if a maratime war were to be commenced, and we were to call upon the proprietors of this line to fulfil their contract to this government, by furnishing the steamers for the use of the navy, they would not be able to do it if opposed by the city of Bremen. I believe in these advances in order that the United States may have their liens upon these steamboats; for not having them, what is to prevent these companies from hypothecating these steamboats to foreign governments, thereby disabling themselves from fulfilling the contracts they have entered into? Sir, I voted for the Chagres, Panama, and Astoria line, because more beneficial to the people of the United States, particularly than the foreign lines, and because of the representation of the contracting parties, that they would build steamboats of a certain class. I should not have voted for it, had I understood that they intended building steamers of twenty-seven hundred tons burthen. It is an objection with me that their size has been increased.

As the bill progresses, some other amendments will be offered, and among them, I propose to present one. I shall vote for this amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and against the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to strike out. If these amendments are not adopted on the ultimate consideration of the bill, I shall vote against the whole concern.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I have never favored, never intended to favor, any of these systems that look to the competition by government with private enterprise. I expect to see the day when the whole post office establishment will be abolished, and the whole matter conducted by private individuals, with more economy and efficiency than it can be done by this goverament. That time has not yet arrived, however, inasmuch as the new States in the West desire the privileges conferred upon them as regards mail facilities that have hitherto been enjoyed by their eastern neighbors. Inasmuch, too, as we have entered upon this system, I say, for one, it should be carried out in good faith, until the West have become equal recipients of its benefits with the East, when I trust to see the whole system abolished. Now, in regard to the objection raised by the Senator from Connecticut, which is to strike out all the proposed advances to these mails, the advances being three months, two months, and one month before the regular payment, I would say, that as we have entered upon this system, and made contracts for carrying the mails, inasmuch as the steamers are building, and in process of building, let us make the advances asked. I believe it is just and proper so to do under the circumstances. In addition, one line of these steamers will give facilities to emigrants and settlers going west to communicate with their friends in the eastern and Atlantic States. Therefore, I feel it is incumbent upon me not only to give facilities for going there, but to give good facilities for holding communication with them after they get there. I do not assume to know more about this matter than the Secretary of the Navy, who made the original contracts, who has been witness of the assignment, and whose integrity, ability, and fidelity is vouched for by Senators on this floor. I say I do not undertake to know more than he does, and he says it is safe, and just, and proper. It is also said the money market then was in a precarious State—money difficult to be obtained—but that it is not so now. I apprehend that that has very little to do with the question one way or the other. The money market is fully as stringent now as then, and it fully as difficult for individuals to raise money on this kind of security now as then. It is a very little matter, it seems to me, to advance, for a short time prior to its necessary payment, money that will be due. Why, the matter is discussed as if it were a question of the appropriation of so much money. The money must be appropriated, and when the contracts come due the Secretary of the Navy must meet the demands lawfully passed. It is suggested that these steamers may be taken away or burned. The Senator from Maine inquires what will be the security if the vessels burn, and we are to turn insurers? Does not the Senator perceive that it becomes the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to attend to the matter, and that he will take care of the matter in the same way that every reasonable tradesman or merchant takes care of his property, requiring the contractors to have the vessels insured in proper offices, and the insurances transferred to the keeping of the government, to be held by it as security? Suppose these insurance companies should fail, as is suggested by a Senator near me, we might as well go one step further and suppose the Union to be dissolved, when, of course, there would be a general break up. It seems to me proper to make these advances.

The question being taken upon the amendment proposed by Mr. NILES, it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Baldwin, Borland, Bradbury, Butler, Clifford, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dix, Dodge, Uebb, Hunter, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Metcalfe, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Sebastian, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Walker, Yulee—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Benton, Bertien, Bresse, Bright, Clarke, Clayton, Dayton, Dickinson, Douglas, Fitzgerald, Foote, Greene, Hale, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Spruance, Westcott—24.

Mr. CLAYTON.—At this late hour of the day, inasmuch as it is hardly possible that the bill can be got through, I would beg leave to move that it be laid informally by and taken up to-morrow. I wish to do so, because I desire to give notice of another important bill which I desire taken up to-morrow.

Mr. YULEE.—I desire to read a single paragraph from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, wherein he states the reason for recommending these advances. [Mr. Y. here read the paragraph which gave as the reason for his recommendation of the advances the tightness of the money market at that time.]

Mr. CLAYTON.—I move to lay this on the table for the present, in order to give notice by general consent, of a motion to take up another bill to-morrow.

Mr. DIX.—If the Senator will allow me, I desire simply to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads whether this contract is capable of an amendment? The route, as I understand it, is to run from Panama to the mouth of the Columbia river. Now, as we have acquired California, it is very desirable to stop at Santiago, San Francisco, and other ports on that coast. I merely ask the question.

Mr. LEWIS.—Before the bill is laid on the table, I have been requested by one or two friends to move the reconsideration of the vote just taken, for the purpose of changing my vote.

Mr. CLAYTON said that he would have called up the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon, New Mexico, and California, to-day, but Senators had complained that they did not receive their copies of the bill in time to give them an opportunity of examining it in detail. He now desired to give notice that to-morrow at 12 o'clock, he would call up this bill. There were several errors in the printing of the bill, one in particular in the 12th section. [Mr. C. here read the bill as corrected.] If honorable gentlemen would deliver their copies of the bill at the table of the Secretary, they could have them corrected.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I understand it is the intention of the honorable Senator from Delaware, to call up the territorial bill to-morrow at 12 o'clock; the Senate of course, can dispose of that motion as it thinks proper. As we seem to be in full tide upon this Naval Appropriation Bill, had we not better settle it to-morrow, so that we may not have to repeat at some future time, the discussions which has already taken place.

Mr. HALE asked that a resolution of inquiry to the Navy Department for certain information be taken up and considered.

Mr. YULEE objected to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HALE requested that the resolution be read so that the Senate could see the ground of the objection.

Mr. BADGER.—I move the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DIX.—I hope the Senator from North Carolina will withdraw his motion; as I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business to-day, that cannot be done to-morrow.

On motion,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The four bills this day received from the House of Representatives, were severally read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, JULY 21, 1848.

PETITIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the memorial of Amos Kendall and John E. Kendall, praying that provision may be made for securing the payment of their claim against the western Cherokee Indians, out of the money due by the United States to those Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PEARCE presented the memorial of Louisa Catherine Adams, and the other heirs of Joshua Johnson, deceased, praying the settlement of the accounts of the deceased, as Consul and Commercial agent of the United States, at London, upon principles of equity, and the payment of any balance which may be found due for his services; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

VOLUNTEERS IN THE WAR WITH MEXICO.

Mr. DICKINSON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of giving to the volunteers who have served in the late war in Mexico, the arms and accoutrements with which they have performed said service.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate, what extra public documents, and what number of each, the Senate have ordered to be printed this session, what number of each has been printed and delivered, and when the remainder are likely to be printed and delivered.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. TURNEY submitted the following motion, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary have leave to send to the Committee on Patents of the House of Representatives, agreeably to the request of said committee, the original manuscript copy of the Patent Office report presented at the present session.

RELIEF FOR THE INSANE.

Mr. DIX, from the Select Committee appointed the 27th June, to whom was referred the memorial of Dorothea L. Dix, reported a bill making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union for certain purposes; which was read and passed to the second reading.

CHRIST CHURCH, WASHINGTON.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill to authorize the sale of a part of public reservation, numbered thirteen in the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

Resolved, That they concur therein.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill from the Senate for the relief of the heirs of Moses White.

They have also passed a bill for the relief of certain surviving widows of officers of the revolutionary army, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HALE, relative to punishments in the navy, and agreed thereto.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1849.

THE VICE PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the motion of Mr. LEWIS to reconsider the vote of yesterday on the amendment proposed by Mr. NILES.

Mr. PHELPS.—I voted in favor of the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to strike out the provision for the advancement of money upon these contracts. I was induced to vote in favor of that proposition by the very serious doubts which I entertained as to the results of this whole policy. I fear we are very much mistaken in our estimate of the advantages which we are to derive from this system of steam navigation. But, sir, finding that the sense of the Senate, as it appears to me, is decidedly in favor of the policy, I am determined to forego my purpose of resisting it further. And I came to this conclusion from a conviction that the sense of the Senate was rather in favor of retaining the provision. Upon reflection, therefore, I am prepared to change my vote upon that proposition, and I will state, in a very few words, the reasons which have induced me to come to that determination.

Since the adjournment of the Senate yesterday, I have been informed that the change in the construction of these vessels has been brought about by the government itself. I suppose that in the outset it was considered that steamers of about 1,500 tons burthen would ensure the great object the government had in view, and that it was the purpose of the contractors to construct the vessels, but the Navy Department, as I understand, interfered, and pronounced these light steamers unsuitable for the service, because they were not of sufficient capacity to sustain an armament with the necessary ammunition and fuel; in short, that they would not answer the purpose of the war steamers.

Mr. YULEE.—The Senator is under a misapprehension if he supposes that the plan of constructing the larger sized steamers originated with the Navy Department. Such is not the case. In respect to the size of the vessels the government have had no inclination to control the contractors. The only solicitude of the Navy Department was in respect to the suitableness of them for war purposes.

Mr. PHELPS.—Well, I may have been misinformed in regard to that, but I believe I am right in supposing that the original purpose has been changed, and that vessels of a larger capacity are now contemplated than those originally proposed. I am right thus far, am I not?

Mr. YULEE.—The vessels that are being constructed are not of the size originally proposed, but the change did not originate with the department.

Mr. PHELPS.—If it be the purpose of the government to adapt the steamers to war purposes—if they are to be made subservient to purposes of national defence, then it becomes a question of expediency at all events, whether they shall be constructed according to one grade or another. And supposing the department had no agency at all in the change, it being admitted that vessels of greater capacity are now considered to be necessary, it is a matter for our consideration, whether in the construction of these vessels we do, or do not, provide for a species of vessel which will answer war purposes.

Mr. NILES.—It is an important principle that is involved in this proposition, and if it should prevail in regard to this contract, it will be followed by similar applications in other cases; indeed, there are now petitions before the committee for that very purpose. It will be opening the door to very extensive abuses.

Mr. FOOTE.—I understand this to be the case of a contract solemnly made by the government with an individual; and the proposition now is, simply to exercise a little liberality on the part of the government with the view of facilitating the execution of the contract, the government being thoroughly secure in the premises. I cannot see any fraud in the proposition. I cannot see any illicit desire to make money out of the government. I can see no reason for Senators indulging in remarks about contrivances. No man can undertake to assert that it is an unfair contrivance. I think the proposition is such a one as we should sanction; and no argument can shake my conviction. The contract having been made, I am prepared to afford, to a moderate extent, the means of facilitating its execution.

Mr. BENTON.—I am entirely opposed to the system of running steamers to the old world. Great Britain may properly run steamers to the new world, because she has possessions on this continent; but we are undertaking to run them where we have no possessions. We have now extensive possessions on the other side of this continent, and in respect to them we are situated as Great Britain is in respect to her distant possessions. Arrangements are in progress for facilitating our communication with those distant possessions of ours, and the question comes up whether, by making some temporary advances, we will give ourselves the benefit of our own law, or whether we will compel the contractor to give up his contract or else to execute his work imperfectly. What is to be the advantage to the United States if the contractor, for want of means, should do his work in an imperfect manner with unsafe materials, or with a delay of time? Would not a wise policy induce us to help him out? Why should we run the risk of being deprived of this service, or of having it performed in an insecure manner? I am decidedly in favor of carrying out the understanding, although I was utterly opposed to entering into it originally. Great mischief has already happened to this country on account of the tedious communication between the two sides of the continent. We are now on the point of establishing a line of communication that will bring the two sides of the continent within about thirty days of each other, and I think we ought not to hesitate. We all know that it requires immense sums of money to carry into operation an undertaking of this kind; and it is but reasonable, therefore, that the government should contribute its aid in the manner proposed.

There is also in this bill an appropriation for a dry dock at New York. I was there about a month ago, and visited several places where labor was going on, and among the rest this dry dock. God gave me a heart to feel for the laboring man. I remember to have read that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and in another place, that "the sun should not go down without the reward of his labor being rendered to him." What was my astonishment, then, to hear that these men had been without their pay for half a year! The people's money has been paid into the Treasury, but it has not been applied to its proper use for want of legislation. I desire to see this bill, containing these appropriations, passed as speedily as possible.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—I need not say that I have given my support to the law which established this line of steamers; and I need scarcely say that I wish to see it prosperous and successful; but I concur most fully with the Senator from Connecticut, that the only way to make it so, is to take care that no abuses creep into its management. Does any gentleman come here and say to Congress that he is unable to carry out his contract? Does any gentleman come here and represent to us that he is unable to raise the funds that are required to carry his contract into execution? Why, sir, if there be any such statement it has escaped my observation. I do not understand that this application is placed upon any such ground as that. I understand it to be simply a proposition made to Congress to change the mode of payment, by making earlier advances than was stipulated in the contract; and I understand the proposition as being supported upon the ground that there has been a change in the system of building—an enlargement of the dimensions of the vessels—since the plan was originally entered upon. I do not think there is any gentleman who will say that he is authorized to state to the Senate that this change in the plan of construction was demanded or asked for by the United States. I do not understand it so at all; on the contrary, I understand the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs explicitly to disavow this charge. When the Cunard line of steamers was put in operation, they built ships of some 1400 tons burthen. It was found, however, that when they came, to make arrangements for the extensive machinery employed, together with storage for coal and accommodation for passengers, there was very little room left in those vessels for freight. They, therefore, after they commenced their experiments and found that the system had operated favorably, found it expedient to enlarge their vessels. Those, therefore, that have been subsequently made, are greatly larger than the first, and the individuals engaged in that enterprise have found it good policy to enlarge them, because they can engage in the carrying of freight. The Senator from Illinois has already has stated this something like ten millions of dollars worth of goods had been brought into the port of Boston by those steamers. It has thus become a money-making business. I believe it is perfectly notorious, that so long ago as a year at least, after this Collins line had been taken into consideration, the contractors went into a consultation as to the size of the vessels which it was expedient for the company to build, and they decided that the most suitable size for money-making was about 3,000 tons. And that is in exact accordance with experience. Those who mean to make money construct large vessels, and they are then suitable for commercial purposes. Under these circumstances, can these gentlemen turn and claim from this government this anticipated advance of money, on the ground that they have benefitted the government by enlarging the size of their vessels? I know, that for many kinds of service, a vessel of 3,000 tons is more efficient and suitable for war purposes than smaller vessels; but is it not equally obvious that for most of the ordinary services of war, a vessel of 1,500 tons is the more suitable of the two? A vessel of 3,000 tons could enter very few of the ports of the United States. The draught would be about how much?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I should like some information upon this point. The very object of increasing the tonnage of these vessels, or at least one object I understand, was to give these vessels greater breadth, and less draught of water in proportion to the tonnage.

Mr. DAVIS.—I leave it to the Senator to demonstrate how you can make vessels larger and yet draw less water. Ordinarily in naval experience, the larger the vessel the greater the draught of water. It is to be remembered that a vessel of 1,500 tons is a very large ship, as large as our first class frigates. Unless I mistake, our frigates are less than 1,500 tons measurement. So far as they are applicable to purposes of defence, vessels of 1,500 tons are as serviceable as larger ones. I do not see, then, any motive that the government can have in making the change. I do not see any substantial benefit that the government is to derive from the change, and therefore it seems to me that whoever will look at the subject with any degree of candor, will see at once that this consideration is without any real substantial value. It is not asked for by the government. If the parties then are able to go on with their contract, why do they not go on? They do not come here and say they cannot go on; it is not put upon the ground that the system must be put an end to unless we make these advances. I shall adhere, then, to the vote which I gave yesterday to strike out that portion of the bill which proposes to make the advances at an earlier day than the contract requires, and I do it on the ground that I assumed yesterday, that I think it an unsafe course of proceeding, and that the experience of the government has proved it to be so. It is impossible for me to anticipate in what way the government is to be reimbursed by merely taking the security of a bottomry bond, but I can see a hundred ways in which the property may slip out of their hands. I think he is a good paymaster who pays when the work is done, and unless some more cogent and sufficient reason be assigned than I have yet heard, it seems to me that the friends of this policy, instead of lending a favorable ear to this application, which will throw distrust over it, ought to adhere to the terms of the contract.

Mr. YULEE.—I feel it my duty to make some remarks upon this subject, but as the hour has arrived for the consideration of the bill reported from the Select Committee on Territories, if the Senator from Delaware desires to proceed, I will defer what I have to say for the present.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I will move, then, that this subject be passed by informally.

Mr. KING.—I would much rather, if it meets the approbation of the Senator from Delaware, that this subject be proceeded with and concluded. The subject has been fully discussed, and unless there be some specific information which it is desirable to obtain, I hope that the Senator from Florida will proceed to make the statement which he proposes to make, and that instead of passing the bill by, we shall proceed to vote upon it, or at least upon this proposition, which I am very sorry to see reconsidered.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I will yield to the wishes which seem to be entertained by Senators, that this subject shall be disposed of, but I very much fear that a "few remarks" of Senators will extend into long speeches, and that "single suggestions" will occupy whole hours.

Mr. YULEE.—A principal ground upon which this advance seems to be urged is the circumstance that the steamers are of much larger size than the minimum tonnage specified in the contract. So far from the government being responsible for this, the contractors, especially under the Sloo contract, peremptorily refused to permit the Secretary of the Navy to prescribe the dimensions and description of the steamers. The Secretary did not feel himself authorized to claim more than a right to be satisfied that the vessels would be suitable for our purposes, and the extremest concession which Mr. Sloo consented, was to adopt the model of the Missouri steamer as the general basis of his plan of construction. Nor is the government the party benefitted by the large size. Perhaps the great size of the Collins line may prove advantageous, as these steamers have reference to foreign service, though the experiment of the Great Britain is not encouraging. But as regards the other line, the enlargement of the vessels defeats one of the leading objects of the line, to wit: to furnish vessels suitable for coast defence. There are very few harbors south of the Chesepeake which these vessels can enter. Nay, I am inclined to think that they will not even be able to enter Charleston and Savannah, which was one of the direct stipulations of the law.

Mr. BERRIEN.—The Senator is mistaken as to the depth of water upon the bar at Savannah. It is twenty-one feet at low water.

Mr. YULEE.—It is certain, at all events, they cannot go up to the city of Savannah. Large vessels are found most profitable for conveyance, and this was doubtless the consideration that operated upon the contractors. Smaller steamers, with a few large guns, answer the best auxilliaries for defence in war.

But my chief ground of hostility to this measure has regard to the mischievous system it introduces into the legislation of the country. Ever since 1823, a law has existed upon your statute book expressly inhibiting advances to contractors. This may be regarded as the settled policy of the government; and I learn from the Secretary of the Navy, that in his opinion the policy of the rule is wise, and has operated most beneficially. I can perceive no special reason or excuse for a departure from the rule in this case. The contract is not a hard one; so far from it, the original contractor sold it for a profitable advance. Nor are there any difficulties in procuring capital that ought not to have been anticipated by the parties concerned, when they undertook the contract. Besides, how can you decline to make the same advances to all other contractors who apply for aid? And thus you will soon practically transfer the whole list of public works to mere speculators, who will drive substantial men out of competition.

There prevails in the Senate an impression that this advance has been recommended by the Secretary of the Navy. This is not the case, in the sense in which it is understood. I have taken occasion to see the Secretary of the Navy upon the subject, and I learn from him that it is not a measure originated by him, nor one which he would have originated. The naval committee of the House enclosed to him an application from the assignees of the Sloo line for the advance, and informed him that the committee had decided favorably upon his request. The Secretary replied, yielding his concurrence, but this concurrence rested upon the impression derived from the communication of the committee, and its enclosure, that without the aid desired, the parties would be unable to prosecute the work in a manner, and under circumstances advantageous to the public.

Mr. FOOTE.—Is the Secretary now opposed to the plan?

Mr. YULEE.—I have said that the Secretary did not originate it. He does not intend, I presume, to oppose or sustain it.

Mr. FOOTE.—Do I understand the Senator to say that the Secretary regrets having made the recommendation, and has authorized the Senator to do it?

Mr. YULEE.—The Secretary recommends nothing. The suggestion of this measure came from the naval committee of the House. My purpose is to deny the responsibility of the Secretary for it, and to insist that its passage ought not to be vested in this body, upon the ground that it is a recommendation of the department. The Congress may take upon itself to order this departure from the policy of the act of 1823, but in doing so, the responsibility ought not to be thrown upon the department. Besides, the measure, as found in the bill, goes much beyond the contemplation of the Secretary's letter. He assented to the advance to Law, and only suggested a discretionary authority as to the rest. This act provides imperatively for an advance under each of the three contracts.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I merely wish to make one or two remarks, and to read a portion of a letter in reply to what I consider the very extraordinary remarks of the Senator from Florida. If I understand the statement of the Senator, it is that the Secretary has not recommended these advances.

Mr. YULEE.—I say that the Secretary does not intend that this measure shall rest upon his recommendation for its support. His connexion with the matter is not of an active, but of an acquiescent character.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I suppose that no measure before Congress rests entirely upon Executive recommendation. We pay proper attention to the opinions of heads of departments, having charge of particular subjects, but we are not entirely governed by their opinions. It makes no difference, it seems to me, whether this recommendation was made by the Secretary in consequence of the suggestions of the committee or not. It is the expression of his opinion as to the propriety of the proposed measure. I understand the Senator to say the recommendation applied to only one contract.

Mr. YULEE.—The recommedation of the Secretary related to one only, and he proposed a discretion in regard to the others.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The Senator is entirely mistaken. I hold in my hand a communication from the Navy Department, dated May 29, 1848, addressed to Mr. VINTON, which I will read, showing that the recommendation applies to three contracts:

[Mr. A. read the letter.]

Mr. YULEE.—The Senater is mistaken. The letter to which he refers is to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, with a view to an ample provision in the appropriation bill for all contingencies that might arise under his suggestions in the letter to the naval committee, formerly referred to.

Mr. DICKINSON.—It seems to me that the zeal of the Senator from Florida has led him to assume a very singular position, which, if it be made a rule of action in this body hereafter, in relation to the Executive departments, will be much more honored in the breach than the observance. The letter of the Secretary of the Navy explains itself, but the Senator from Florida has called upon him, and has got his permission to retract the recommendation contained in that letter. If the Secretary designs to give any different interpretation to a letter which he has sent to Congress than that which it bears upon its face, he ought to put it in writing. If any different meaning is intended, let it be specified authoritatively. I protest against this mode of obtaining information from the Executive department, designed to color a communication which has been been made. That communication every one can understand. I do not mean to insinuate, for I do not believe, that the Senator from Florida would intentionally misrepresent the Secretary, but we all know how liable language is to be misunderstood, and if we are to have a new opinion of the Secretary we should have have it in the same way in which we have the original. And in reference to making these vessels larger I have to say, that the official communication was made to Congress long after the facts had transpired.

Mr. ATHERTON read the letter of the Secretary.

Mr. YULEE.—It is proper that I should make myself distinctly understood. A communication was made by the assignees of Sloo, asking for an advance of money upon the contract. The Committee on Naval Affairs informed the Secretary that they had agreed to make the advance, and he had expressed his concurrence upon the presumption created by that correspondence, that the parties were not able to pursue their contract in a manner required by the interests of the government. That is the whole matter.

Mr. BREESE.—I understood the Senator from Florida to say, that the Secretary was influenced mainly in making his recommendation by the State of the money market. Well, if the money market were in the same condition now as then, the argument of the Senator would have some force. I hold in my hand a recent newspaper, which contains the following:

[Mr. B. read an article from a newspaper in support of his assertion that the money market was now as stringent as it was at the time the application for an advance was recommended on the ground of the scarcity of money.]

So that the facts are now precisely as they were when the recommendation was made:

The question being taken on the motion the motion to reconsider it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Baldwin, Benton, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Clayton, Dawson, Dickinson, Dodge, Douglas, Fitzgerald, Foote, Greene, Hale, Hannegan, Houston, Jernegan of Louisiana, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Phelps, Rusk, Spruance, Sturgeon, Westcott—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Barrow, Bradbury, Butler, Cameron, Dix, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dix, Downs, Hamlin, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Metcalfe, Moor, Niles, Pearce, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Walker, Yulee—20.

So the question was taken on agreeing to the amendment, and it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bradbury, Cameron, Dix, of Massachusetts, Dix, Downs, Hamlin, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Metcalfe, Moor, Niles, Pearce, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Walker, Yulee—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Baldwin, Benton, Berrien, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Clayton, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dawson, Dickinson, Dodge, Douglas, Fitzgerald, Foote, Greene, Hale, Hannegan, Houston, Jernegan of Louisiana, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Phelps, Rusk, Spruance, Sturgeon, Westcott—24.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. NILES rose to offer an amendment.

Mr. KING.—I hope the gentleman will now consent to let the bill be passed by informally, otherwise I must move to lay it upon the table.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I hope the chairman of the Committee on Finance will agree to let the bill be passed by informally.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The subject is at the disposal of the Senate.

Mr. BADGER.—I think the Senator from Delaware is mistaken, if he supposes that he will expedite the action of the Senate upon the territorial bill by taking it up while this naval appropriation bill is pending. By devoting an hour or two to this bill now, we shall be able to get through with it.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I rise to a question of order. The Senator from Alabama, I believe, submitted a motion to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. KING.—I stated that if there was any objection to pass the bill by, I should be compelled to move that it be laid upon the table. I understand there are several amendments to be offered that will give rise to debate.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I hope the Senator from Alabama will withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. KING.—Certainly, if the Senator will renew it.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I concur with the Senator from North Carolina, in the hope that the Senate will proceed with this bill until it is completed, as I understand that there are appropriations contained in it which are immediately required for the public service. This session has been remarkable for doing business by shreds and patches. Subjects are taken up, discussed partly, passed over; the next day again taken up, and the debate of the previous day gone over again. Every Senator I believe is aware that there will be a very heavy debate upon the territorial bill. Let us attend to one thing at a time.

Mr. KING.—I am as desirous as the Senator himself to bring this matter to a close, but I see from what has already taken place, that we need hardly expect to get through with this bill today; I am willing however, that we should make the attempt, and I will, therefore, withdraw the motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. NILES proposed to amend the bill by inserting before the word "ships," in the 107th line, the words "shall commence from the time the service shall commence."

Mr. ATHERTON briefly opposed the amendment, and said that if it should not prevail he would himself introduce an amendment that freight and passengers should be carried for the government, for one voyage, free of charge.

The amendment was disagreed to, on a division. Ayes 12, noes 18.

Mr. NILES moved further to amend the bill by adding at page 5, line 110, the following:

Provided, That this appropriation shall not be construed to give any sanction to any existing any of said contracts for mail lines for a longer period than five years.

The question being taken upon agreeing to this amendment, it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Borland, Carwin, Dix, Johnson of Ga. Mangum, Niles, Pearce, Turney, and Walker—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Baldwin, Benton, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Clayton, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawson, Dickinson, Dodge, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hale, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson of Louisiana, King, Lewis, Mason, Metcalfe, Miller, Rusk, Spruance, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham, Westcott, and Yulee—38.

Mr. RUSK submitted the following:

"SEC. . And be it further enacted, That whenever, in his opinion, it shall be expedient, the Postmaster General shall, with the consent of the Department, make requisition upon the Navy Department for such vessels, boats, and other vessels of said department as may be needed for the service of carrying the mail along the sea-board coasts, or rivers of the United States; and the said Department shall promptly comply with such requisition, and such steamers shall be employed in carrying the mails aforesaid as may be directed by the Postmaster General, and under such regulations as may be made by said Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That no steamers shall be chartered by any one commissioned officer, or master or part owner of any of the navy of the United States, without the Navy Department first direct and the emergency arising; and two of said steamers shall also be furnished by said department; and said vessels shall be supplied and kept in repair by said department: Provided, however, The Postmaster General may appoint one or more agents on board of each of said vessels, with such reasonable compensation as he may prescribe, who shall be accommodated and provided for on board said steamers as may be prescribed in said regulations.

"SEC. . And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Navy may adopt and prescribe such regulations as they may deem proper, under which said steamers may convey mails, officers and other passengers, and carry public and other freight from point to point while carrying such mails: Provided, that the transportation of passengers and freight, other than public officers and freight, shall not improperly interfere with regular lines established for such purpose by individuals or associations, and shall not interfere with the carrying of said mails with certainty, regularity, and despatch: And provided also, That no account shall be kept of the proceeds received for said service, and the same shall be applied to paying the expenses of subsisting and navigating said vessels.

"SEC. . And be it further enacted, That whenever any steamer of the United States in the employment of the navy, or the Quartermaster's service, can be dispensed with for army service, and such steamer is suitable for the naval service directed by this act, the President of the United States may order such steamers to be transferred to the Navy Department, and retained by it, and used as a vessel of the navy of the United States: Provided, The President may order a re-transfer of such vessel when the public interests may demand the same."

Mr. BUTLER moved to amend the bill by adding after the 110th line the following :

Provided, That in consideration of the foregoing advance the line of steamers provided in the contract with A. G. Sloo, shall stop, going and returning, at Charleston and Savannah.

Mr. ATHERTON said that it he understood the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] it provided that the mail steam line should touch at Charleston and Savannah, whether practical or not.

Mr. BUTLER had said not a word about stopping at Savannah; it was Charleston he spoke of more particularly.

The question being taken on concurring in the amendment, it was decided in the affirmative. Ayes 17, Noes 17. The PRESIDING OFFICER voted in the affirmative.

Mr. WESTCOTT moved to add at the close of the amendment just adopted the following :

"And shall, if the Secretary of the Navy shall deem it practicable, touch at Key West going and returning, under such equitable arrangements as said Secretary may make with said parties for so doing. And said Secretary of the Navy, if he deems it practicable and expedient, may make arrangements by which said steamers or others to connect therewith shall convey the mails by water to post offices that are or may be established within the United States, on or near the Gulf or Atlantic coasts: Provided said arrangements are concurred in by the Postmaster General, and the sum of five thousand dollars is hereby appropriated for such object."

Mr. WESTCOTT would inform the Senate that the amendment was as near as possible in the same phraseology as the amendment adopted in the Post Office bill with reference to the Charleston route. The object of it was to enable the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Navy together, to secure the use of the two routes for the local mails. The Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Navy, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and the gentleman who was the assignee of the contractors, Mr. Sloo, had no objection to its being adopted.

Mr. ATHERTON said that it seemed to him that the way the amendment now read, it made it imperative upon the line to touch at Key West; and that it left no discretion to the Secretary in the matter. He would prefer that the amendment be made to read that they should touch at Key West, provided equitable arrangements to that effect could be made by the Secretary.

Mr. WESTCOTT having no objection to the alteration proposed, modified his amendment accordingly.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. NILES moved to amend the bill by adding the following :

Provided, That the contractor for the line from Panama to Astoria, as the condition of this advance, be required to stop and deliver and take mails at San Deogo, San Francisco, and Monterey in California.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to amend the amendment by adding :

"If required so to do by the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. ALLEN proposed to substitute the Postmaster General for the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WESTCOTT would suggest to his honorable friend from Ohio, that his objection could be obviated by altering the phraseology of the amendment, and making it read "if required to do so by the Secretary of the Navy with the concurrence of the Postmaster General."

Mr. ATHERTON had no objection to the modification, if it met the views of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. ALLEN acquiesced.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was then agreed to.

Mr. NILES moved further to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "ships" in the 107th line to the word "States" in 108th line, and insert the words "service commences."

The amendment was disagreed to. Ayes 15, Noes 18.

Mr. ALLEN moved to amend the bill by inserting the following after the 285th line :

"SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That no other or new contract or contracts for the transportation of the mail to any foreign country shall hereafter be made or entered into on the part of the United States; and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provision, are hereby repealed.

Mr. MILLER could not see what the amendment had to do with the appropriation bill before the Senate. He did not think the Senate prepared to discuss, in connection with this bill, the general question that all contracts were to cease after a certain day.

Mr. BREESE would ask his friend from Ohio how it was possible for the present Congress to bind the action of future Congresses in respect to contracts, as this amendment would appear to indicate?

Mr. ATHERTON would simply remark that he hoped the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio would not prevail. The provisions of the appropriation bill before the Senate were made in order to carry out existing contracts, made by laws of Congress. It seemed to him dangerous, then, to encumber an appropriation bill with the expression of their opinions upon the subject of these contracts. They might have one opinion and the House of Representatives another. If there was to be any repeal of a law now existing on the statute book, which authorized the contracts, it should be done separately, in the form of another law, and acted upon solely with reference to its own merits. If the doctrine of his friend from Ohio were true, that contracts were now so easily carried through by lobbying members, he (the Senator from Ohio) was defeating the end he had in view, by giving to Congress the administration of the matter. They had better be taken charge of, to secure the Senator's object, by some other body or person. He did not know that there was any danger of improvident contracts being made under the existing laws as they now stood; for it would be recollected that these very contracts were made by express direction of Congress. Congress had directed the Secretary of the Navy to make them.

Mr. ALLEN said that yesterday the argument had been offered that they should grant the indulgences or advances asked for by certain contractors, because they had entered into the contracts. Now, he wanted to do away with that argument in future—he wanted to do away with the argument that they were obliged to appropriate large sums of money in advance, simply because they had contracted with parties that we should appropriate it, and for that reason he had offered his amendment.

Mr. WESTCOTT inquired of the Senator from Ohio if the Oregon route was included within the term "foreign country?"

Mr. ALLEN observed that nothing was foreign that touched the soil of the United States.

Mr. ATHERTON perceived no necessity for an amendment to any bill, particularly to the one before them, in order to present the views of the Senator from Ohio. The law gave the Postmaster General the authority to make contracts for foreign mail service, but it was not pretended under this law that he had ever made contracts without first submitting them to Congress. As these contracts were under the direction of Congress, he thought there could be no danger of improvident legislation.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the amendment of Mr. ALLEN, it was determined in the negative, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Borland, Bright, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Mississippi, Dix, Dodge, Pitch, Foote, Hale, Houston, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Metcalfe, Niles, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, and Yulee—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Baldwin, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Butler, Dayton, Dickinson, Douglass, Downs, Fitzgerald, Hamlin, Hannegan, Johnson, of Louisiana, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Rusk, Sturgeon, Upham, Walker, and Westcott—25.

Mr. DIX moved to amend the bill by inserting :

"SEC. . And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to advance on the contracts heretofore made with Edward Mills for the transportation of the United States mail, from New York to Bremen, the sum of eighteen thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars per month for each of the steam ships hereafter to be constructed or employed under said contract, to commence from the time either of such vessels shall be launched or so employed; but the amount so advanced shall not exceed the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to be secured by a lien on said ships, in such manner as the Postmaster General shall require; and the money so advanced shall be faithfully expended in finishing said ships to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General: Provided, that the money hereby authorized to be advanced on said contract with Edward Mills be paid on the express condition that the two steam ships to be employed in the transportation of the United States mail from New York to Havre, shall be placed on said line on the terms specified in said contract, in respect to the transportation of said mail between the cities abovementioned.

Mr. DIX was opposed to the system of making advances, but as it had received the sanction of the Senate, he thought that the application of the principle was very proper to the Bremen line. They had already constructed two steamers which ran to Bremen by way of Southampton. Under the contract with this government, the owners of the line had the alternative of sending two of their vessels to Havre. This amendment proposed to allow advances to be made upon the fourth steamboat that should be built upon the condition, that they were to transfer two of the line to Havre. This arrangement might not be satisfactory to the city of Bremen, but doubtless would be so to the company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER here stated that there were two other amendments in order before the amendment of the Senator from New York could be taken up.

The question being about to be put upon agreeing to Mr. RUSK's amendment—

Mr. RUSK apprehended that this amendment was not clearly understood. It only authorized the Postmaster General to take any vessel which belonged to the United States, and apply it to this mail service, whenever he chose to do so. The result would be the saving of several hundred thousand dollars to the department. When a new route was established for carrying the mail, as there would be to the Rio Grande, new companies of individuals would offer to take the contract of the department for carrying such mails, at four or five times the amount it would cost if any authority of this description existed in the Postmaster General, by direction of the President, to use temporarily any of the vessels belonging to the United States, and would thus prevent exorbitant contracts being forced upon the department. These vessels had been built by the government of the United States, and their officers were receiving pay from the government, so that if we were to use the vessels in the manner proposed, an immense amount of money would be saved to the government; no injury resulting, unless in requiring from the naval officers, sometimes, a little extra duty. This measure was recommended by the Postmaster General in his annual report, and as he was informed, was approved by the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BERRIEN thought it very probable that an arrangement of the kind proposed might be advantageously made, but considered a bill for the establishment of regulations of this character, should be separately reported.

Mr. ALLEN was opposed to the governments's using the armed vessels of the country, to go into competition with private citizens as common carriers of freight and passengers. He moved to amend by striking out that part conferring authority upon the government, to become a common carrier.

Mr. WESTCOTT said that if the honorable Senator from Ohio had looked at the phraseology of the bill, he would see that his objection did not exist. It expressly prohibited interfering with any regular line in carrying freight or passengers. But it was provided, that inasmuch as the agent of this bill was to have small steamers to ply between ports when there was no regular mode of conveyance under authority of the Secretary of the Navy and Postmaster General, the vessels might be authorized to carry freight and passengers.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, was of opinion from his knowledge of the failure and delay upon some of the southern mail routes, that this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. YULEE regarded the amendment as a proper one. It did not authorize the Secretary of the Navy to add anything to the present material of the mail service; and it would secure by combined action on the part of the three departments, several objects which were important to be obtained by these departments. It was necessary for the Navy Department to keep up along the gulf coast, a surveillance, with reference to the protection of live oak and timber; again the United States were carrying on works at Key West, which would probably cost some three or four millions before completed, and it was necessary to land supplies at this place and other points necessary for the government use; and also along the Atlantic coast there were many different points which it was necessary to supply with mail facilities. These several objects could be accomplished by these mail steamers with great saving to the government. The proposition came to them concurred in by the three Secretaries of the several departments, and the Post Office Committee.

Mr. BADGER agreed with the Senator from Georgia, that possibly a system of the kind proposed might be established in connection with the naval establishment of the United States, but he was satisfied that the amendment proposed would not answer the purpose intended. He concurred with the Senator from Ohio in the idea, that they were entering upon a new and strange system in employing public naval vessels for the carriage of freight and passengers. How were these ships in the service of the United States, if put to this use, to go to sea? Were they to go with their full complement of men as war ships? If so, where would be the room for freight or passengers? If they were to send it out without this complement as a public vessel of the United States under command of a naval officer, it was liable to be captured by any petty force that might be brought against it, and thus the honor of the American flag would be tarnished. This was a great objection in his mind to the amendment, which it was apparent to him did not present a plan that had been carefully matured.

Mr. HOUSTON was in favor of the adoption of the amendment. For years past there had been the greatest irregularity existing in the carriage of the mails from New Orleans to Galveston. They had been dependent upon the mercy of a contractor, who ran the mail just whenever he saw proper. For weeks they had had to do without mails, in consequence of his employing his vessels where he could be more profitably paid than he was for the carriage of the mail. The carriage of the mail upon the plan proposed in the amendment would remedy the evil, and as he understood it, without any additional expense to the Treasury, inasmuch as it would employ a portion of the naval force for the specific purpose of general intercourse. He did not want the United States to enter upon the carrying business, but he thought that any service for the diffusion of intelligence throughout the United States was worthy being undertaken by the highest officer in the navy. There was nothing discreditable in it. Many gallant young officers would take pride in commanding the vessels to be used for this particular service. It was not a matter of favor or grace that Texas asked for these mail facilities, but as a matter of right that she should have regular and constant communication with the older States. Sometimes one, two, three, and even six weeks would elapse before Texas could have communication with other parts of the United States, because of the contractor withdrawing his vessels to carry troops for the United States—a far more profitable service than that of carrying the mails.

Mr. RUSK said, that as there seemed to to be some objection to that part of the amendment which provided for carrying freight and passengers, he would modify it by striking out altogether the third section, which provided for it. The amendment would now have no reference to the carriage of passengers or freight. He considered that the objection of the Senator from North Carolina had no weight in reference to the case before them. If the President of the United States choose to send out public vessels unarmed for specific purposes he had the power to do so, without any reference to the contingency of their capture. The question simply was, whether Congress should require the officers of the navy to perform such duty as the President and the heads of the departments might deem proper that they should perform.

Mr. UNDERWOOD remarked that the bill provided that an account of the expenditures and receipts should be kept, and that whatever profits should be made should go towards liquidating the expense of the service. What reasonable objection could be made to carrying freight or passengers? And, again, was it degrading the officers of the navy to employ them in this kind of service? If so, they had already been degraded. For this very service, in fulfillment of the great contracts for ocean mail steamers, officers of the navy had been employed to command the vessels. These ships made profit for the contractors, and these naval officers had been placed where they made profit, not for the government, but for contractors. Would it be degrading if an officer were to get a furlough to command a merchant vessel? If so, then very many officers had been degraded. If these vessels were not employed in the way proposed in the amendment, they would be laid up in dry docks to rot—perfectly useless to any one; while the pay of their officers would go perhaps nearly as high as if they were employed in the way suggested.

The gentleman from North Carol na had supposed, that if these vessels were to go unarmed, they might be captured by some foreign vessel, and thus that the American flag would be disgraced. He regarded that as a proposition which should not give the least alarm, especially in a time of profound peace. Supposing they were to send a vessel from Boston around to Portsmouth to receive the government, and she was captured at sea, would that capture bring with it national degradation? If that vessel was furnished with arms when ordered into service, then it would be a disgrace if the officers were not prepared for action at all times. In the case before them, they would be rendering a service that would not require them to meet an enemy. He was in favor of the amendment as it originally stood.

Mr. RUSK would renew his amendment as it originally stood if the gentleman from Kentucky desired it. It did appear to him that the arrangement providing for the carriage of freight and passengers, where there was no regular line for that purpose, would be a great accommodation to individuals desirous of going to the points where the mail was carried, and would also pay a large portion of the expenses. He would call the attention of the Senator to another fact while up, which was, that the last section of the amendment provided that all the vessels now in the service of the army employed for transportation were to be turned over to the navy or be sold. The result would be, if they were sold, that they would bring little or nothing in comparison with the return they would bring to the government if employed in the manner proposed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was very happy that the Senator from Texas had assented to let the amendment stand as it was. He would say to the Senator from Ohio that he would object to making the government a common carrier, as he called it, as much as any one, if that was to be the business of the government. But in this case it was a necessary means in order to accomplish a particular object of the government. They had entered into competition with various trades in the employment of the prisoners in the penitentiary at the Point in mechanical pursuit; but it was a necessary incident in carrying out the system of punishment for crime. The only way in his opinion to carry on successfully and economically the various objects of internal improvements in the country, was by a coalition of the government with private enterprise. There were various contracts going on upon this principle. There was one at Louisville, in his own State, where the government had realized some eighteen per cent. for the money invested. It had been tried to be broken up, but the government had found it too profitable a business to dispense with it. If this incident of carrying freight and passengers was not attached to the bill, they would have to bear the whole expense of the proposed plan. He would notice an objection made, which was a very common one, that the amendment was not in the proper place. It was said by some that they would like very much to carry out a system of this sort. If it were engrafted in a bill and left to be acted upon deliberately by itself, then they would adopt it. He had some experience on the subject. He had seen year after year, efforts made to introduce the most salutary provisions, that had failed, when made in behalf of a bill that was to stand separately upon its merits. And why? Because they had never reached them. If they were to be carried through, they must be affixed to some appropriation bill upon which it was imperatively necessary they should act.

Mr. ALLEN said that there was a good deal of reason in the concluding observations of the Senator from Kentucky, in regard to the efforts of Congress in rectifying abuses. They never could reach an abuse or evil when it had once got the start of them, except by attaching the remedial measure proposed to some important bill necessary for the government to act upon. There was some reason in another one of his remarks—for he took it that the Senator spoke somewhat in objection to the practice of States in making crime compete with honest industry—a system he (Mr. A.) had always condemned, but thought that there was a want of due consideration on the part of his friend from Kentucky in putting their naval officers upon a par, in sustaining his position, with convicts. Now, because a State penitentiary employed its convicts in making shoes and clothes, should they hire out their naval officers as captains to merchant vessels because they were propelled by steam, or as captains of their own war vessels, to carry on the coasting trade, to ply from point to point, and pick up a barrel of flour here or a cask of molasses there? Were those officers to stand upon the beach waiting for passengers? It was, in his opinion, a petty larceny employment for them to be engaged in, and would destroy the spirit of the navy. To commence employing the officers of the navy—a profession which claimed to stand, as it had through all past history, upon the high principles of honor—according to the system proposed, would be to make them the slaves of government—to be sure, not to till plantations, but as navigators—under the orders of government. Not as an independent navigator, with a right to go where he would, like a freeman, acting for himself, but as a man who, under the orders of his government, with his epaulettes on, was to roll out a barrel of flour or fish. The whole system showed that they were mixing up the action of the government with the rightful and legitimate action of the people. By this plan we were going to employ private steamers for their mails and public steamers to carry passengers and freight. It was a system that should be arrested. He did not think the officers of the navy would like it. It was not the private vocation that constituted the stigma—it was to have a master to order them to their vocation—that master being the government. Nothing could be more honorable than the course of the gallant tar, who washed the decks of the forecastle, and who, for his daily bread, perilled his life in the service of his country. It was honorable because he willed to do it. The whole of this system was based upon the principle of the protective tariff, that it was the duty of the government to assist one set of men to the detriment of another.

Mr. RUSK was a little astonished at the remarks of the Senator from Ohio. The gentleman was introducing aristocracy with a vengeance. He thought that the rolling of a fish barrel was honorable even by a commander in the navy. There was no class of men above the necessity of labor. No labor which served the interests of the community and extended the bonds of intelligence throughout the country, in his estimation, should be called a petty larceny business. He had seen the highest officers of our army helping to roll wagons out of the mud, and they had not considered themselves degraded by so doing. Was it a petty larceny business to save a half million of dollars to the country? When a man entered into the navy he entered into the service of the government to do its service, to perform whatever was required of him. He did not think that the officers of the navy desired this aristocratic distinction to be made in their favor. In regard to the charge made against the Senator from Kentucky, of assimilating the labor of the naval officer to the labor of convicts, he could not understand for himself how the remark was intended to apply to the case at issue, and would leave it to the honorable Senator, who was perfectly able to relieve himself from the imputation to answer it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD stated, that when up before, he had admitted a general principle laid down by the Senator from Ohio, that the government ought not, upon general principles, to enter into competition with its citizens in private life. He said that there were exceptions to this principle—that whenever the gentleman had a great object to accomplish, it might become necessary to interfere somewhat with private enterprise. Then he had introduced his penitentiary labor illustration. He trusted that his friend from Ohio had no idea of charging him with any intention of disgracing the officers of the navy.

Mr. ALLEN replied that he had none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that he would, while up, give his friend from Ohio an illustration of the fact that it was not degrading to give one's attention to the rolling of fish barrels or any other manual labor. They had custom-houses over the country, and gaugers, inspectors, and measurers, in their employ whose duty it was to attend to fish barrels and flour barrels. And again, did these officers in command of these seventy-four's, with epaulettes on their shoulders, never pay the least attention as to how these vessels were loaded? as to the manner in which the provisions and armament were stored? Was it degrading to them to attend to these duties? But it did not follow, because they sent naval officers to command these ships, that they were to look after fish or flour barrels. If it was beneath their dignity to do business of this kind, it could be taken charge of by underlings or agents. It was in fact so provided for in the bill.

Mr. ALLEN should not have his language perverted or misconstrued. He had declared that no condition in life was more honorable than that of the laborer, and every man in the Senate knew he had so expressed himself. What made the degradation he had said was in laboring under the orders of a master, instead of their own free will. He would say that if these officers desired to become captains of coasting vessels let them leave the navy. It was not desirable that these officers should roll barrels; and who believed that they voluntarily entered the service of the government and acquired a naval education to perform such labor. There was no vocation in life that was not honorable, provided it was done with a free will. He had said nothing in disparagement of labor; it was the voluntary or co-ercive circumstances that gave honor to labor. He spoke entirely in reference to free labor, and with reference to no other class or kind of labor.

Mr. ATHERTON said that this might be a very good provision, and might come to them recommended by three Secretaries and the Postmaster General, still it seemed to him a new system, which if important to be passed, should be presented in a bill by itself.

The question was then taken upon the amendment proposed by Mr. RUSK, and determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Borland, Corwin, Douglas, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, of Louisiana, Lewis, Metcalfe, Rusk, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Woodbridge, Yulee—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Badger, Baldwin, Benton, Bermen, Bradbury, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Greene, Hamlin, Johnson, of Georgia, Mason, Miller, Niles, Sturgeon—22

Mr. BORLAND remarked that the appropriations in the naval bill seemed to be made upon the condition that they were connected with interests that were located upon salt water. We were engaged in appropriating millions for the establishment of mail routes along our whole country and coast, where the water was salt, while our fresh water rivers such as the Ohio and Mississippi, were left unprovided with them. If we had a right to establish mail routes along the coast, and ask for appropriations for them in this bill, he had an amendment to offer to it providing for the establishment of a mail route of equal importance. He offered, therefore, an amendment that the Postmaster General be required to advertise for proposals for carrying the mail daily from Louisville, Kentucky, to New Orleans."

Mr. BORLAND stated that there was no mail route from Louisville to New Orleans, a distance of some fifteen hundred miles. It was true, that there was mail matter carried from Louisville to New Orleans, but not by any regular mail line. It was carried the same as freight; and subject to all the delays and irregularities that freight was subject to. It had been objected that the expense to be incurred by the establishment and support of this mail route would greatly exceed the amount of revenue to be derived from the receipts of the mail. By the present mode of carrying the mail on these routes, not one tenth part of the mailable matter that would be sent, if a regular system of transmission were adopted, was sent. If regular routes were established between the two points, on account of the regularity and speed of the mails, the government would derive a very large amount of revenue, more than enough to pay the expenses of the route. The introduction of a regular route, and a regular period for the transmission of mails, would soon give rise to competition for the transmission of the mails, which competition would of course lead to a reduction in the expenditures. As it was now under the present system, there was not a sufficient amount received to pay the necessary expenses.

Mr. HALE wished that the Senator from Arkansas could show what effect his amendment had upon the navy. He would simply give notice that if the Senator's amendment was adopted, he would immediately move an amendment to the bill to raise the salary of the district judge of New Hampshire. This proposition had been before the committee, and was as fully germain to the bill as was the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HAMLIN considered that the Senator from Arkansas was mistaken in his statement that there was no mail route established between Louisville and New Orleans. By reference to the statute book it would be seen that all navigable streams within the Union were made post routes.

Mr. BORLAND knew very well that that was the law; but it was equally true that there was no mail route between Louisville and New Orleans, as he had before stated.

Mr. HAMLIN replied that the law had established a mail route between Louisville and New Orleans. But he was opposed to the adoption of this amendment for another reason. The law having already established a post route between these two points, this amendment, if adopted, would take from the Post Office Department the power to control this mail route, and would give to the government the power to say in what way our mails should be transported. It was objectionable, because it was usurping in this body duties which appropriately belonged to the Postmaster General. If it was appropriate in this case for Congress to decide how the mail should be carried between these two points, it would be appropriate in all similar cases.

The question being taken upon Mr. BORLAND's amendment, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then stated to be upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. DIX.

Mr. NILES could not but think, as the principle of advances had been adopted, that this was a case deserving of greater consideration even than the one upon which the principle had been decided. Here it was evident that the contractors had exhausted their means, and were laboring under very great difficulties. If we adopted this amendment, we would gain something; in the other case we would gain nothing. The contract with the parties in this case gave them the option to run two of their vessels to Havre. We had no right to compel them to do it; but if we made these advances, they would do it, making it more beneficial to the government and the contractors than the present arrangement. Unless we made the advances, the Bremen interest would probably control the action of the contractors, and keep all the vessels upon the regular route.

Mr. DICKINSON inquired whether these advances had been asked for by the contractors or the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. RUSK understood that it had not been asked for by either of these parties.

Mr. NILES remarked that it had been asked for and recommended by the Postmaster General.

Mr. RUSK knew of no such recommendation. There was a controversy now going on between the Postmaster General and the assignees about the subject of the contracts, and testimony had been exhibited before the Postmaster General of such a nature as satisfied him that the stock of the line belonged in reality to individuals residing in Bremen, represented here by citizens of the United States.

Mr. DIX believed that there was a controversy between the original contractors and the assignees, but that would not effect the transportation of the mails. It was a question with sole reference to the interests of those parties in these contracts. The city of Bremen, as he had stated yesterday, had loaned some money —not to the company, but to individuals who had hypothecated their stock in the line for that loan—but he did not see what influence that had upon this question. These vessels were employed in this service under contract by the United States. The company was now engaged in building a vessel nearly a thousand tons larger than the other two, and were very much in need of funds. All the observations made with respect to other lines applied to this. Upon the principle of equal justice, advances should be made in this as in the other cases.

Mr. NILES stated that the communication from the Postmaster General had been laid before the Committee on Finance. The application made in that communication in behalf of these steamboats was offered contingently. if advances were made, to the other lines. He was, of course, in hopes that the Senate would not have granted the advances on any of the lines. But as they had been made, he thought the great importance of having two lines, where there was now one, demanded that advances should be made to these parties also.

Mr. DIX would state another fact in connection with this amendment. Last year the government had paid this line one hundred thousand dollars for mail facilities to Bremen, and had received for postage only fourteen thousand dollars, thus paying eighty-six thousand dollars more than the amount they had received for postage. If the division in the line was made, the amount to be charged the government for carrying the mails would be only seventy-five thousand dollars per year for each line, saving some fifty thousand dollars to the government.

Mr. RUSK desired to say that the communication of the PostmasterGeneral was not laid before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, so that he was relieved from any responsibility in the matter, when he had stated that he knew nothing of any such communication. The contract for this line was originally made with a Mr. Mills. It was then transferred to the present owners; the most of the capital being furnished by individuals in Bremen. Mills, in making the transfer, reserved to himself the right to build these vessels and put them on the line, if the present owners failed within a reasonable time to complete the vessels. The parties were now failing to comply with the contract, and Mills in consequence, was anxious to carry out the terms of the transfer, but the other parties had refused to allow him. He thought it highly improper then for government to make advances to complete the line when individuals were anxious, if the present contracting parties would allow them, to finish them without appealing to government for aid. This amendment proceeded on the principle that there were two wrongs to a right.

Mr. NILES wanted to see, in this matter, if gentleman would carry out the principle they had established; whether they had before voted in reference to the particular interests of those who petioned for advances, or whether they voted in regard to the fairness of the principle. This application for advances came here with the same recommendation that the other did; and was a much stronger case in every point of view.

Mr. BADGER had voted against striking out the appropriation in this bill for advances, because that appropriation was recommended by the committee of the House of Representatives, had the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, was adopted by the House of Representatives, and the bill containing it was reported to the Senate with the entire approbation of the Committee on Finance. That being the ground upon which he had voted, he should carry out his principles upon the subject hereafter by voting against the amendment proposed, because it had none of these sanctions.

Mr. BREESE coincided in the reasons which the Senator from North Carolina had just stated, for his vote in favor of the former appropriation for advances, and against the present proposition for advances to another line. He would simply ask for the reading of that portion of the amendment that defined the nature of the securities to be given to the government.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the amendment of Mr DIX, it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dix, Hale, Hannegan, Jenness, Lumpkin, Niles, Pennybacker, Rusk, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Turney, Walker, Woodbridge, Woodbury, Yulee—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bagby, Benton, Berrien, Borland, Breese, Bright, Calhoun, Clarke, Corwin, Crittenden, Dayton, Dickinson, Douglas, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foster, Greene, Huntington, Johnson of Georgia, Johnson of Maryland, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Rusk, Sebastian, Spruance, Upham, Webster—31.

Mr. YULEE moved to amend the bill by striking out at line 41, "and $1,200,000 for completing four first class steamers," and add it at end of line 44, so as to read:

"For the repair, armament, and equipment of vessels, including arrearages on account of vessels in commission, and for steamers, the hire of which, $2,537,471, and $1,200,000 for completing four first class steamers."

Mr. YULEE explained that this was a mere transposition to conform to the estimates.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE moved further to amend the bill by adding the following section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That no part of the money appropriated by the act of March 3d, 1845, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the first half calendar year, beginning the first of January and ending the thirteenth of June, 1846, and for other purposes," approved February [illegible], and entitled "An act for the gradual increase of the navy," shall be used or applied for the purchase of any vessel or vessels, other than those now owned by the United States, or which may be under contract for construction at the time of the passage of this act, unless such purchase or contract shall be required, from time to time as the service requires, for a period not exceeding four years, and in making such purchases or contracts, the Secretary of the Navy shall be governed by the provisions of the act aforesaid, and the interests of the service will be thereby promoted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE moved further to amend the bill by adding the following section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the number of professors of mathematics in the navy shall not exceed [illegible], that they shall be appointed from such persons as may be approved by the President of the United States, and with the consent of the Senate, and shall perform such duties as may be assigned them by order of the Secretary of the Navy, at the Naval School, Observatory, and on board ships of war, in instructing the midshipmen of the navy or otherwise; that, when on duty, the pay of a professor of mathematics shall be at the rate of fifteen hundred dollars per annum, and when on leave of absence or waiting orders, the pay shall be at the rate of eight hundred dollars per annum.

Mr. YULEE stated that the object of this amendment was to reduce the number of professors to the actual number required. At present, constant employment could not be given to all of them; and it was desirable that the number of them should be reduced to the number actually required.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE moved further to amend the bill by adding the following section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy shall be hereby, authorized to cause persons in the naval service or marine corps who shall become insane while in the service to be placed in such lunatic hospitals as in his opinion will be most convenient and best calculated to promote a restoration of reason; and that, in addition to the pay [illegible] of such persons, he may, from the annual appropriation for the naval service, under the head of contingent, unprovided, pay such additional allowance, not exceeding [illegible] each case it does not exceed one hundred dollars per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE moved further to amend the bill by adding the following section:

SECTION — And be it further enacted, That the proviso of the act of August 4th, 1842, limiting the number of officers of the Navy of the grade of midshipman, to the number that were in service on the first day of January, 1841, and confining appointments to the appointment of officers to supply the deficiency of four hundred and sixty-four: Provided, That the appointments shall be made according to the directions of the 5th section of the act, approved March 3d, 1845, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Naval service for the year ending 30th of June, 1846."

Mr. YULEE explained the nature of the amendment, stating that it was designed to do away with a difficulty which had arisen in regard to the rank of passed midshipmen in the navy.

Mr. KING could not but think that the honorable Senator from Florida was mistaken as to the nature and effect of the amendment. It certainly had no earthly bearing upon the rank of passed midshipmen. It provided, as he understood, for an additional number of midshipmen so as to correspond with the increased number of the States.

Mr. YULEE acknowledged that he had offered the wrong amendment. He had an amendment prepared relating to passed midshipmen, and thought that was the one he had sent up. On looking over his papers he found that it had been mislaid, and he moved therefore to proceed with the one he had submitted. This was an amendment providing for an increase in the number of midshipmen, to make an equal division of appointments among the States.

Mr. HALE did not see why the number of midshipmen at present was not sufficient; and why the department could not easily divide the present number of them by thirty, as to come to the Senate and ask for an addition of thirty more. He found by the Navy Register that there were 208 passed midshipmen, and 228 midshipmen in the service, making 434 in all. This number could be divided by 30 quite as readily as 464.

Mr. YULEE explained that the number of midshipmen now authorized was 260, and it was proposed to add four for Wisconsin and Iowa, leaving 200 as the number of passed midshipmen.

Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays on the question to agree to this amendment, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Berrien, Borland, Davis, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Mississippi, Hannegan, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Miller, Westcott, Yulee—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Baldwin, Benton, Bradbury, Bresse, Bright, Dickinson, Dodge, Edieh, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, King, Mecalfe, Rusk, Spruance, Turney—22.

Mr. YULEE moved further to amend the bill by adding the following section:

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of the act the principal pay of boatswains, gunners, carpenters, and sail makers at the navy yard, Pensacola, shall be the same as now allowed by law to the forward warrant officers at the navy yards Boston, New York, and Norfolk.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved the following amendment, notice of which had been given by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland at a former day.

SEC. . Be it further enacted, That the sum of fifty thousand dollars be and hereby is appropriated for indemnification for losses of necessary clothing, uniform, bedand table furniture, instruments, to the officers and crews of the sloop "Peacock," which was wrecked and lost at the mouth of the Columbia river, on the eighteenth day of July, eighteen hundred and forty-one; of the steam frigate "Missouri," burnt at Gibraltar in eighteen hundred and forty three; the schooner "Grampus," lost at sea; the schooner "Shark," wrecked and lost at the mouth of the Columbia river, September tenth, eighteen hundred and forty-six; and the brig "Somers," lost in the Gulf of Mexico; the sloop of war "Boston," lost on Eleuthera, on November two, eighteen hundred and forty-six; and the steamer "Hunter" lost in the harbor of Vera Cruz in eighteen hundred and forty-seven: Provided, That the amount of such losses in the case of each claimant shall be established, by affidavit or proof, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, and shall be paid only to the applicant himself, or his authorized agent, or, in case of his death, to his widow; or, if there be no widow, then to his surviving children, or if there be neither widow nor children, then to the brothers and sisters now living, who are minors, or were minors, at the time the loss occurred: And provided also, That no more than the actual amount of loss shall be paid in any case, nor shall the entire allowance or account of any individual in the respective grades exceed the following sums, viz: to a captain, eight hundred dollars; to a commander or lieutenant commanding, six hundred dollars; to a lieutenant, master, surgeon, assistant surgeon, purser, chaplain, professor, captain of marines, chief engineer, four hundred and fifty dollars; to a passed midshipman, first assistant engineer, or first lieutenant of marines, three hundred dollars; to a midshipman, second or third assistant engineer, second lieutenant of marines, secretary, clerk or master's mate, two hundred dollars; to a boatswain, gunner, carpenter, sailmaker, one hundred dollars; to a petty officer, or sergeant, or corporal of marines, fifty dollars; to a seaman, ordinary seamen, marine or musician, forty dollars; to a landsman, boy, or fireman, thirty dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, asked that the consideration of this amendment be postponed until to-morrow morning, when its author, Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, would be in his seat and prepared to defend it.

Mr. BADGER moved that the Senate adjourn. The motion was negatived—Ayes 14, Noes 24.

After some desultory conversation as to the propriety of considering an amendment of so much importance at that late hour of the day—

Mr. BENTON remarked that this subject was a very intricate one, and required a patient, careful and calm investigation, and should be reported in a bill by itself. He wished to call the attention of the Senate to a subject, to him of greater moment. Since January last the laborer at all the navy yards had been without his hire. If they could not comply with the command of the Bible, "let not the sun go down without giving the laborer his hire," he would say let not the sun go down without passing that bill. He was against every amendment, and wished to pass the bill as it then stood.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, withdrew the amendment in order that it might be further considered upon before again offered to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. HALE moved further to amend this bill by adding the following sections:

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That corporal punishment be, and the same hereby is, abolished and prohibited in the navy.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That the spirit ration in the navy be also abolished, and in lieu thereof every individual who receives the ration in kind shall be entitled to receive six cents per day, and those who commute the whole ration two cents per day.

Mr. HALE knew that the Senate were becoming wearied of the long debate they had had upon the bill, in consequence of the many amendments suggested, but he had a few considerations to present in connection with his amendment, which he felt to be his duty, notwithstanding the impatience of the Senate, to offer. He had found in the bill which was then before the Senate, in the eighth section, that there was an attempt made to regulate that subject by law. The section required that the Secretary of the Navy report to Congress the number of persons flogged in 1846–'47, specifying the name of the ship and its commanding officer, and the number of lashes inflicted; similar reports to be made hereafter. We had had laws regulating this subject ever since the organization of the confederacy; yet what did they amount to? He spoke nothing but the literal truth when he said by looking into the records of the Navy Department, they would be found to be perfectly inoperative. By a law of the Congress of the United States, made since the year 1800, court martials were prohibited from inflicting, for any offence not capital, more than one hundred lashes. He had found by reference to the Navy Department that by a court martial held at Port Mahon, in 1837, for an offence not capital—manslaughter—a man was sentenced to receive four hundred lashes; one hundred of them were remitted, and three hundred inflicted, when the law of the country for fifty years save two, had prohibited the infliction of more than one hundred lashes at one specified time. There was an intimate connexion between the spirit rations and corporeal punishment. If they took away the cause of intoxication, they done away with the necessity for corporeal punishment. A man on board the frigate Constitution lying off Mazatlan was on the 23d March, 1846, sentenced, because of intoxication, by Commodore Sloat, to receive fifty lashes. In a letter to the Commodore, the man stated that he desired of the court while deliberating upon the extent of the punishment to be awarded, that they would do him the favor to recommend his discharge from a ship, where he was placed in a situation where the temptation to intoxication was beyond his control. Thus it was the government got their sailors drunk by law and then flogged them for it. [Mr. H. here read an extract from a newspaper published in 1843, giving the record of the punishment inflicted during a single voyage, and showing the severe inflictions of corporeal punishment apportioned in the navy for the most trivial offences.] It was perfectly idle in his opinion, so long as these men were thus degraded by law, to undertake to regulate the matter by law. It had been reproachfully said of him (Mr. H.) that his sympathies and philanthropy had been altogether exercised in favor of the blacks. He would now ask gentlemen to have some sort of consideration for their white brethren, who were the subjects of the brutal system of corporeal punishment. He firmly believed, and he said it with all truth, that if they could have the facts apparent upon the records of the Navy Department in relation to the subject before them, it would be seen that the most oppressive system of slavery to be found engrafted upon the laws of this country, gave unlicensed freedom compared with the slavery to be found on board of the ships of war.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the amendment, it was determined in the negative.

No further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

The question being on concurring in the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole—

Mr. TURNEY asked that the amendment reducing the appropriation for the Memphis navy yard be excepted.

Mr. KING asked that the amendment making advances to mail steamers be also excepted.

Mr. DICKINSON informed the Senator from Alabama that there was no such amendment. The clause authorizing advances was a part of the original bill as it came from the House.

The question being taken upon concurring in the amendments [excepting that relating to the Memphis navy yard] it was determined in the affirmative.

The question then recurred upon concurring in the amendment reducing the appropriation for the Memphis navy yard from $174,038 to $100,000.

Mr. TURNEY hoped that the Senate would not acquiesce in the amendment. It had passed through the committee without his colleague's notice or his own being called to it; and he should much prefer that its consideration be postponed until morning. As however the Senate appeared desirous of passing the appropriation bill to-day, he would ask of the Senate that the amendment be rejected. The work was being prosecuted, was nearly completed, and would require but a small amount of money to finish it. The appropriation asked for by the department was absolutely necessary for the completion of the work. It would be doing injustice to them and to the work itself to except the amendment.

Mr. BERRIEN thought that at any rate the sum advanced—one hundred thousand dollars—would be sufficient to keep the work in operation until Congress again met the coming year.

The question being taken upon concurring in the amendment, it appeared that a quorum of the Senate were not present.

Mr. WESTCOTT moved that the Senate adjourn. The motion was negatived.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, it was Ordered, That the absent Senators be sent for.

A quorum of the Senators being present,

The question on concurring in the amendment was again put, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Berrien, Bradbury, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Massachusetts, Hale, Hamlin, King, Lewis, Sprague—11.
NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Benton, Borland, Breese, Bright, Dickinson, Dodge, Douglas, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Mason, Rusk, Sebastian, Turney, Westcott, Yulee—21

The amendment was not concurred in

Mr. YULEE moved further to amend the bill by adding the following section:

"SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the restriction established by the 4th section of the act approved March 3, 1845, whereby no more than one hundred and eighty passed midshipmen, and three senior in rank, shall at the same time receive the pay fixed by law for first class of officers, be suspended in its operation from the passage of this act until the close of 1841 and 1842 shall have been examined and the relative rank established among those who shall pass their examination.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE then renewed the amendment, disagreed to in Committee of the Whole, authorizing the appointment of officers of the grade of midshipman to the number of four hundred and sixty-four.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON moved further to amend the bill by inserting in line 108, after "United States," the following:

"if the contractors shall so elect. Provided, That slaves, horses and passengers shall be transported, for one voyage in each vessel, for the government, from any port in the United States to Panama and any port on the north Pacific, free of charge, excluding subsistence of passengers.

The amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendments being offered, it was Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed and the bill read the third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That the bill pass with amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendments.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned

SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1848.

PETITION.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of John Lewis, of Philadelphia, praying that the privilege of citizenship proposed to be conferred on "free white mail inhabitants" of the territory of Oregon, by the bill to "establish the territorial governments of Oregon, California, and New Mexico," may be extended to others.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Henrietta Bedinger, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Henry Gray, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk :

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1849, and for other purposes, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

They have passed the following bills of the Senate :

An act to make Bangor a port of entry for vessels coming from or beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make a compromise with the securities of Francis D. Newcomb, late Surveyor General of the State of Louisiana.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary :

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed the 21st instant, the bill amending the act entitled "an act granting half pay to widows and orphans where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States," in case of deceased officers and soldiers of the militia and volunteers, passed July 4th, 1836.

THE COMPROMISE BILL.

The bill to establish the territorial governments of Oregon, California, and New Mexico, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Nearly eight months of this session of Congress have passed away ; the interesting and most important subjects embraced in this bill having been long and ably debated. The Senate will, I doubt not, be rejoiced to hear that it is not my purpose to inflict upon them a long speech, in opening the discussion on this bill. My purpose now is chiefly to state the contents of the bill as briefly and as fairly as may be in my power—reserving the right usually accorded to the chairman of every committee to conclude the debate on the bill, if debate should be unavoidable. I understood the object of the Senate in the appointment of the select committee to be, the prevention of an agitating and exciting discussion ; and, with the other members of the committee, I cherish the hope that we may be able to effect that object by the passage of the bill which we have reported.

At present, the only question to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate is : What are the substantial provisions of this bill ? The bill referred to the committee was one providing for the establishment of a territorial government in Oregon. The bill which we have reported contains provisions for the establishment of territorial governments in Oregon, California, and New Mexico. As the twelfth section of the bill referred to us was the chief subject of debate here, it, of course, first occupied our attention. It is still retained as the twelfth section of the bill reported by us, but so modified by the committee as to provide that all existing laws in the territory of Oregon,

"Shall continue to be valid and operative therein so far as the same may be found not incompatible with the constitution and the provisions of this act, but may be altered, by the first meeting of the legislature of said territory ; subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the legislative assembly of the said territory of Oregon ; and the constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and declared to be in force in said territory, so far as the same, or any provision thereof, may be applicable."

I think it my duty, in order to explain that section, to present in connection with it, a reference to those existing laws of Oregon, to which reference is made in this section. The Senate will find them in Senate document of the first session 29th Congress, No. 353. The 1st article 6th section of these laws positively prohibit all slavery or involuntary servitude (except for crime, whereof the party shall be duly convicted,) in the whole territory.

This provision, as well as every other contained in these organic laws of Oregon, is continued by the force of this bill, until three months after the first meeting of the legislature of the territory of Oregon—I mean the legislature provided by the terms of this bill. The organization of the government of the territory of Oregon differs from that of California and New Mexico in one important particular. We regarded the people of Oregon as entitled to the right of self-government, and we have, therefore, given them in this bill an elective territorial legislature, whose laws are liable to be reviewed and annulled by Congress ; and we have given them also, as in other cases, the right to elect a delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States. In the case of the territories of California and New Mexico, we have given no such power. The legislative power in those territories is vested in a governor, secretary, and three judges in the case of California—two judges only in the case of New Mexico—who shall have power to make all laws, as in the case of Oregon, except such as relate to an establishment of religion and the institution of slavery. In both cases—that is to say, in the case of the legislature of Oregon, and in that of the legislature of California and New Mexico—the legislative power is restrained in regard to all enactments touching the primary disposal of the soil and the imposition of a higher rate of taxation upon the property of the United States and the property of non residents, than upon the property of residents. But the great distinguishing feature is, that in the case of Oregon the legislative power is conferred upon men chosen by the people, whilst in the case of California and New Mexico, it is conferred upon the appointees of the President, by and with the consent of the Senate.

These constitute the important features of this bill to which it is my duty now to call the attention of the Senate ; and I suppose that they will form the only subjects of discussion, if discussion be necessary and unavoidable. I repeat, that in the committee all other modes of compromise or settlement were in vain attempted ; all efforts to settle the great question now agitating and disturbing portions of our country, except that which resulted in the preparation of this bill, utterly failed. It is my deep conviction that no other mode of compromise or settlement can possibly be adopted. I have been more anxious, for my own part, that the question should be settled, than as to the means of settlement, though I would not, of course, surrender any great principle which I held sacred in order to effect the settlement of this matter. Indeed, the great merit, in my judgment, of this mode of settling the controversy, is, that no man, North or South, in voting for this bill, sacrifices any great principle to which he has ever been committed. The bill refers the whole matter in controversy between the North and South, to the decision at last of the judicial tribunals of the country. It resolves the difference between them into a constitutional and judicial question. Any man who prefers discord and civil war to that mode of settling all differences between sections of this Union, which the constitution itself points out, may and can consistently with his opinions, oppose the bill. But any man who desires in his very heart to avoid this great disturbing question between the North and South, as a political question—this great geographical question, as it has become—can do so by voting for this bill, which resolves into a mere judicial question to be decided by the proper constitutional tribunals of the country. I do not mean to impeach any one's motives who may oppose the bill, or by any means to intimate that such as differ with me in opinion may not do so honestly.

The territorial judges appointed under this bill, will, in the first instance, decide all questions submitted to them respecting slavery. Before them a writ of error or appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States is allowed, as in all cases where writs of error and appeals, are allowed to revise the opinions of the circuit courts of the United States. We have made no distinction, because it was thought it would be invidious to make one. We have allowed the right of appeal as fully as ever it had been allowed before, and in doing so we have been content. It is palpable to every lawyer, that whenever a question arises in these territories, proper to be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, it can be carried there by any man acquainted with his profession.

There was some information communicated to the committee, which has not yet been laid before the Senate, and which it may be, therefore, proper that I should state on the present occasion. I think that this information will strengthen the conviction of the great difficulty, and, indeed, the impracticability of settling this question in any other mode. The compromise line of 36° 30′ was proposed and voted down in the committee, after a most earnest and anxious discussion. It was voted down in every way in which the proposition could be presented. The proposition of the honorable Senator from Indiana was voted down, and that, also, of my friend from Kentucky. The Senate will perceive by the statement which I am about to lay before them, how the question would have been settled if that proposition—the Missouri compromise line—had prevailed in committe. By a report made at the request of the committee, by the Commissioner of the Land Office, it appears that—

[Here the Senator read a full statement made by the Land Commissioner, of the area of each section of the territories outside of the States, from which it appeared that the area of all north of 36° 30′ was about 1,600,000 square miles, and of all south of 36° 30′ about 262,000 square miles.]

In other words, the North, by that compromise, would have about six times as much territory for free labor as the South would have for slave labor.

Mr. BALDWIN—(in his seat.)—What is the extent of the area of Texas?

Mr. CLAYTON.—The gentleman asks how much land there is in Texas. Let him add it to the amount which I have just given as lying south of 36° 30′, and every one will see that the territory lying north of that line is two or three times greater than that south of the line. It was agreed by the southern members of the committee to compromise on the line of 36° 30′; but our northern friends would not accede to that proposition. I make no complaint, because I do not stand here for that purpose, but rather to conciliate men from all sections of the country, and to entreat them to put this great question in such a position that it may never hereafter endanger the safety of our Union. It is my deliberate conviction, that although, as I said the other day, the bill on our table will not prevent agitation—because, in our country and under our institutions, no bill can prevent agitation—yet, if adopted, the safety of the Union will be placed beyond the reach of danger from agitation, by its tranquil operation.

I forbear trespassing further on the attention of the Senate, for I did not rise to discuss the merits of the bill. I do not undertake to dictate to gentlemen, but I hope that a vote may be taken speedily upon this bill. I trust its friends—if it have friends in this body—will stand by, and, after allowing ample freedom of discussion to every gentleman, will pass the bill to a final decision as soon as may be consistent with the full exercise of the right of debate.

Mr. NILES.—I desire to ask the honorable Senator one or two questions. If I understand him, he says that, in his judgment, this bill involves no sacrifice of any opinion maintained by gentlemen on this floor in this debate. I wish to inquire of the honorable Senator whether he considers this bill ——

Mr. CLAYTON.—I spoke of members of the Committee, and intended my remarks to apply to them. I do not mean to say that there are no opinions entertained out of the committee inconsistent with this bill; and, I will add, that it may be possible that one or two members of the committee may have some objections to the bill; but I only remarked that, in my own view, the opinions of members of the committee might be reconciled.

Mr. NILES.—The main question in the course of this long debate, has been a question of power. It has been denied that Congress has any power over slavery in the territories; while, on the other hand, it has been asserted that Congress possesses that power, and thus has arisen the question as to the justice and propriety of exercising this power. Now, the inquiry which I wish to propose to the Senator is, whether he considers this bill as affirming or disallowing that power? Another question to which I would desire a reply is, what is the precise principle of compromise in this bill? I understood the honorable Senator to say that he had felt it to be his duty to arrest the debate with a view to compromise. It is desirable, then, to ascertain the principle of the compromise. I have looked over the bill very carefully, but I have not been able to discover it. If there be any compromise, I should like to know what it is. I should like to know what is yielded on one hand and the other, and in what way the two parties are expected to be united.

Mr. CLAYTON.—The gentleman puts two questions: He inquires, first, whether this bill affirms the power of Congress to legislate on the subject of slavery in the territories. I reply, that the bill neither affirms nor disaffirms, but leaves the whole question to the proper constitutional tribunal, which I understand to be the Supreme Court of the United States. That is the principle of compromise. Again, the gentleman inquires, what is the principle of the compromise? He may call it by what name he pleases, but the principle of the bill is, that it refers the whole matter in controversy between the North and South—and, in my judgment, on terms perfectly honorable and fair to both parties—to the great constitutional tribunal established by our forefathers. If we are not willing to abide by that, let us say so. I for one, am willing to abide by it.

Mr. NILES.—I understand the honorable Senator regards this compromise as doing nothing—as leaving the matter precisely where the committee found it. Permit me here to call the attention of the honorable Senator at the head of the compromising committee to the fact, that that is precisely the position taken by the honorable Senator from South Carolina in his speech and concurred in, I believe, by other honorable gentlemen from the South. So, then this is a compromise on the basis claimed by the advocates of slavery here.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Will the Senator yield for a moment? I beg that the Senator will not represent me as an advocate of slavery. That is not the attitude which we maintain. We stand here only as claiming the rights which belong to us as confederated members of this Union, and we are willing to rest our rights upon the high ground on which the Senator from Delaware has placed them—where our forefathers placed them, and where we place them. That is all. We claim nothing for slavery—nothing at all. We wish to see this Union preserved, and its harmony preserved with it—for it is worthy to be preserved only upon the principles of harmony.

Mr. DICKINSON.—When this matter was submitted——

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senator from Connecticut retains the floor.

Mr. NILES.—I am very happy to hear the remarks of my honorable friend from South Carolina, for such I hope I may regard him—and permit me to say it is the first time that I have heard any declaration of that kind from that quarter. I do not know whether I interpret it correctly; but if it is to be interpreted in its fair and literal import, then, sir, there is no controversy here. If there be no claim advanced on behalf of slavery, controversy is at an end, and we are here all united in opinion. I supposed that the claim was, that the slave States had a right to take their property, as it is called, into the territories of this Union, carrying with them that protection which is given to it by their local laws. It has been urged that without that right the slave States were subjected to inequality. But if no such claim be made, then there is no matter of controversy here: and let us just carry out this idea in the bill, which may be done in a very brief section—and we can pass it with perfect unanimity. Let us compromise on that great principle, looking to the interests of the whole country—as the country of a free people—possessed of common rights and animated, I trust, by common sympathies. On that common basis of free soil and free principles in all our institutions, let us take our stand, removing all cause of jealousy and unkind feeling between the different sections of the Union.

But I apprehend that the Senator means something else by the declaration which he has just made, and what it is I am not able exactly to understand. If it mean that he is merely contending for a punctilio—that the slave States must, in point of legal form, in some abstract point of view, be placed in that attitude, which he regards as giving them perfect equality, I should not, for one, be disposed to be very particular in regard to any matter of that kind. Circumstances, of course, may present apparent inequalities in different sections of the Union. The form and descriptions of property may vary in different quarters of the country; but the principles that regulate property and secure private rights are uniform, and whatever they may be in the territories, they will apply equally to all. Gentlemen of the South—if certain rules of propriety were adopted there—might not be able to take into these territories every thing that is recognized as property in their own States; and so, too, with us at the North. Will not the rules and regulations adopted, apply equally to all? Will not the measure of justice in the aggregate be uniform and equal? However, I did not rise to discuss the question.

Mr. DICKINSON.—It will be recollected that when the motion was made to refer this matter to a select committee, a somewhat protracted debate took place, and it was obvious to all that the farther the discussion proceeded, the different sections became still more and more removed from each other. I hailed it then as a motion of peace, and I am yet of opinion that it will so result. To such a pitch, indeed, had the debate arrived, that when the proposition for the appointment of this committee was made, the Senator from Connecticut saw fit to remark that Senators who should vote for a compromise would very likely find themselves burnt in effigy in some quarter of the country. That had not a very great deal of effect upon me. So far as the individuals to be burnt in effigy would be concerned, the proceeding would be very harmless, while it would certainly be a very suitable expression of opinion on the part of those who have no other mode of reasoning. If any individuals feel disposed to do it at their own expense, and furnish images about as heartless as themselves, they are perfectly welcome to burn me in effigy at any time. I think the Senator from Connecticut said a little more than what was set down for him, though he may have pointed to a plan on foot not yet fully developed. However, the remark had no influence upon me, then, nor can it at any time hereafter.

I was appointed upon this committee, on which the Senate did me the honor to place me, with the view of effecting an honorable compromise, and providing for the exigency in which three large territories of this Union are now placed. I believe that my associates on this committee were actuated by the same motives. We saw these territories without law; one of them having existed for a long time without any law, except that supplied by its provisional government: and now an unhappy difference growing up between its people and the Indian tribes, rendering it exceedingly desirable that that territory should be immediately organized and placed on its way to the Union. It was also important and desirable that the two new territories of California and New Mexico should be placed under the pupilage of the United States.—What was to be done? Here were these territories without law—midsummer approaching, and Congress engaged in an exciting debate in one section of it, without any prospect of coming to a close. The select committee was raised; and what has it done? We have placed the Oregon bill in a form to which no human being can object, unless for the mere purpose of cavil. With regard to New Mexico and California, we have neither taken from one section, nor given to the other. If the South asked too much, and the North was willing to concede too little, we have neither given to the one nor taken from the other. We have encroached upon the rights of neither. We have left the subject where we found it—subject to the constitution and Congress of the United States, while at the same time we have placed the territories on their way to the Union, by the organization of a provisional government, which is restrained from any legislation that can embarrass this difficult subject. That is what has been done. We have not given an elective legislature to the territories of New Mexico and California, for the reason that the people are not there, who are to control their destiny. But we have extended the laws and constitution over them, and provided for the appointment, by the President and Senate, of officers who will carry the laws of the United States into execution. We have also provided that those individuals shall make local laws, or police regulations, as they may be more properly called, restraining them as I have said from touching this subject one way or the other, whilst all their laws must be brought here for our revision. The whole matter may be summed up in the inquiry, Is there any evil to be apprehended from extending the laws and constitution of the United States over these territories, and enforcing them there, without doing anything further?

Mr. NILES.—The allusion to burning in effigy to which the Senator from New York has referred, was made by me in relation to what had formerly happened, on occasion of an attempt to bargain away what were considered the rights of one section, by a patch-work trafficking scheme of this kind. Far be it from me even to indulge in the language of threatening, for the purpose of influencing the action of any honorable Senator here; and I may say farther, that my friend from New York would be the very last member of this body that I would think of treating in that way. If that gentleman disregards the solemn and reiterated expression of the great State which he has the honor in part to represent—if the declaration of her sentiments in her sovereign capacity at home cannot influence his conduct here, surely it would be foolish to attempt to control it in any other way. There was one remark made by the honorable gentleman which I rose to notice. I understand that he concurs in this bill.

Mr. DICKINSON—(in his seat.)—I do.

Mr. NILES.—He approves of the bill, and yet that Senator in the early part of this session made a speech of no ordinary character, but one of great deliberation, mainly delivered from his notes in which he attempted to prove that Congress has no jurisdiction over territories in so far as relates to their government. He held that Congress had merely power to dispose of the soil. It seems, then, that the Senator is getting light upon this subject. I take encouragement from this fact: who can tell what a few months more may produce in the developments going on in the country, both here and elsewhere? Who can tell what new positions may be assumed? I am not without hope that my honorable friend from New York will, before this matter be ended, entertain opinions much more consonant with those of his own constituents. He is progressing, sir. Another remark of the Senator I desire to notice. He concurs fully in this plan of compromise—this compromise, which is no compromise at all—which does nothing—which says nothing—which settles nothing—which amounts to nothing. The Senator asks what can be done, but organize the government there and leave this troublesome question open to be settled hereafter? That is my objection to this whole procedure. Here is the point of the case. You propose to set up government there. You propose to invite emigration there. You propose to give them protection and security there. Protection and security to whom, and in what enjoyments, and in regard to what kind of property, and what relations of persons? Now, all that is undefined. Those persons holding slaves have a right to go there, and may take their slaves there. Do you not invite them to go there? Do you not in some degree sanction this proceeding? But the bill goes farther. It is not entirely negative. There is something positive. Let me call the attention of Senators to a point to which I believe the honorable chairman has not alluded. This bill affirms something. It affirms that slavery shall not be prohibited or inhibited, or excluded by any action by the government which is set up there. Is that nothing? I think it is not to be misunderstood. It is a sort of sanction to those who may wish to go there with that kind of property. You leave this thing open. Nay, you do more. You prohibit the government which you establish there from interposing any obstacle, however slight, to the introduction of slave property. You leave it to the government having final authority it is true, that is to the Congress of the United States. But I am not prepared to admit that this principle—a principle of fundamental political regulation—a principle of organic law can be in any sense settled by the courts. We leave this question entirely open, and prohibit any action on it by the authority which we set up there; thus holding out an invitation to the introduction of slavery there; and the Senator asks, what is there in all this? Why, supposing that in this state of things the population emigrating into these territories take slaves with them, come at the proper time, and bringing the treaty with them, knock at your doors for admission, claiming their right to come in as members of this Union, what are you to say? The question, perhaps, comes up as in that unfortunate controversy with regard to Missouri, and the crisis is upon us—such a crisis, I will not say as may dissolve the Union, for I believe the Union to be stronger than any contest, real or imaginary, between opposing sections of this Union. I said last session that I believed this Union to be stronger than slavery; and that is the strongest thing in our system, except the principle of liberty, which is perhaps still stronger and deeper. But the question will come up, and it is immaterial whether it be presented by the majority or the minority of the people, for when rights became established—when the preservation or sacrifice of property becomes the question, then even a small minority will everywhere prevail against a majority. The minority in that case obtain an immense advantage. No longer in its original form and aspect, as it now presents itself to us, the question will then be whether we will sacrifice the property that may be in this territory, or whether we will be bound to protect it. No! no! This scheme of evading for a day or for the moment, the responsibility thrown upon us—this unmanly shrinking from the duty which we owe to the country, is in my humble judgment utterly unworthy of the American Senate. Be it more or less troublesome this question is now before us, and we are bound to meet it and dispose of it as we can. If we cannot dispose of it now, let us do no more than was done with regard to Louisiana. There no attempt was made to establish government, but an act was passed authorizing the President to appoint such officers as might be necessary to preserve some temporary authority. But this bill is of a very different character, and the honorable chairman tells us that by it, this threatening question will be determined forever. That is, I think, rather an extravagant expectation. Why, sir, the Senator himself admits that it settles nothing, that it leaves this thing entirely open, adding only the evil of inviting emigration of every description into these territories. This the honorable Senator calls settling the question!

Sir, the people of this country have some little discernment, and they will desire to know what sort of a settlement this select committee have made. The people understand the question.—With all the ingenuity which they have displayed in the able arguments on both sides of the chamber, gentlemen have not been successful in so mystifying the subject, as to render it inexplicable to the people. They know what the precise issue is. They understand that the question is whether this territory, which we have received as a free territory—if I may say so, doubly free—free by the act of God who created it, and free by the act of man; and that, too, of a half civilized people, who have impressed upon it the law of freedom—is in our hand to remain free; or whether we shall directly or indirectly subvert that law of heaven and of man, and implant there the institution of slavery? That is the question. The honorable chairman of the committee says that the subject is to be referred to the courts. That is avoiding the question. The committee have shrunk from the responsibility which we expected from them. I expected no good from the appointment of the committee, but I confess I did not suppose that they would shrink from the whole subject submitted to them, and bring us a bill skulking, dodging, with a cowardly visage, avoiding altogether the subject submitted to their judgment.

Mr. DICKINSON.—It seems when the honorable Senator referred to Senators burned in effigy, that he referred to what had been done—that he made the reference to affect the past and not the future. It struck me then as a most extraordinary remark in the Senate of the United States; and even with the explanation which has been given, I do not regard it in any difficult light. I hold it to be no particular honor to be burned in effigy as a Senator; but as that proceeding is the resort only of the coward and the ruffian, I do not consider that it inflicts any disgrace; neither shall I be induced to alter my views in any respect by such a threat, nor by the allusion to the fact that a portion of my constituents have other views. By what authority does the Senator call me to account? Where did he obtain his warrant? I would say to the honorable Senator, in the language of a book with which he is probably familiar, "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant; to his own master he is to answer, and not unto thee?" But, sir, if the Senator can show that I am responsible to him, I will render him my reasons for my course with pleasure. And, in the mean time, when he shall have rendered an account of his own stewardship to his constituents upon what the great questions of the last four years, in the language of the banker, if he has "anything over," and I need it, I will draw on him for it, with his approbation.

The Senator says that my position is inconsistent with a speech which I delivered here at the early part of the session. If I had found it necessary to take a position somewhat inconsistent with that taken heretofore, if on deliberation I had regarded my former action as wrong, I would not for the mere sake of being consistent, refuse to become wiser on any subject. But, my present position is in perfect accordance with that assumed by me on the occasion to which the honorable Senator has alluded. Allow me to recall the attention of the honorable Senator to the resolution which I had the honor to introduce. It was as follows:

Resolved, That in organizing a territorial government for territories belonging to the United States, the principles of self government upon which our federative system rests will be best promoted—the true spirit and meaning of the constitution be observed, and the confederacy strengthed, by leaving all questions concerning the domestic policy therein to the legislature chosen by the people thereof

Now, so far as the Oregon bill is concerned, it recognizes to the very letter the principle of that resolution; and I would here add, as I feel at liberty to do, that in committee I voted for the extension of it to New Mexico and California—but my brethren of the committee overruled me, and I do not say that their reasons were not good—because the people now inhabiting these territories many of them are but half civilized, and are perhaps not qualified to exercise all the rights of government, and we deemed it best for the present to give them a provisional government. These territories have been thus placed on their way to the very end which I suggested; and if the arrangement does not fully come up to my resolution, the spirit of it is fully carried out. But whether or not consonant with the "lords paramount" there, in order that they may be free! I mean to establish there the freedom of government, and not the freedom of the cut-throat. I mean to extend the laws there, and leave it as free as God and our institutions leave it, to bring itself into this Union according to the principles of our confederacy.

I did not rise to discuss this bill, but I am not to be misrepresented. I know the fevered feeling on this subject, and I am not ignorant of the attempts to fan it. It has been said that it is a bill in accordance with the views of the Senator from South Carolina. Much as I respect that gentleman, I do not think that the bill is better or worse for meeting his approbation, farther than I rely on his great experience. But why did the Senator from Connecticut speak of the bill as having received the sanction of the Senator from South Carolina, unless he meant the people of the North to believe that it must be a little worse on that account? Is it anything the worse for having received the sanction of the Senator from South Carolina any more than it would have been if it had received the sanction of the Senator from Connecticut or the Senator from Rhode Island, or a Senator from any other section of the Union? We all know that the Senator from South Carolina has his peculiar views, but I will do him the justice to say, that upon this committee he exhibited every disposition to be conciliatory, and to yield as far as he consistently could yield. Such, indeed, was the spirit manifested by all the members of the committee. They brought forward the best project which, on the whole, they could present. The Senator has asked, if I approve the bill? I do with my whole heart. For one, I could go much farther. The bill does not meet all my views; but the constitution itself was made up of compromises on this subject, and all our action with regard to it must be in the same spirit.

Mr. HALE rose and was about to address the Senate, but yielded to

Mr. CORWIN, who said, I wish to submit to any member of the committee one or two questions to which it is very desirable to myself, and I dare say to many others, that a reply should be given before we are called upon to vote on this bill. The bill, with what propriety I will not undertake to say, has been described by the honorable chairman of the committe as a compromise bill. It will be in the recollection of every Senator, that during the discussion upon the Oregon bill which gave rise to the proposition that laws should be made for all these territories together, there was one point of law discussed by several gentlemen on both sides of the chamber. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, if I did not misunderstand him, maintained, that by the constitution of the United States it was incompetent for Congress to enact that slavery should not exist in the territories; and that it was equally incompetent for any territorial government of any sort that might be erected there to make such a law. I understood my honorable friend from Georgia on my left [Mr. BERRIEN] to maintain the same proposition, in the same identical terms. Now, I supposed, that after that discussion, when the whole question had been submitted to this committee, constituted chiefly of gentlemen learned in the law, they must have revolved in their minds and discussed in their retirement, this fundamental proposition, lying at the bottom of all our action. I did expect—though perhaps I was wrong in entertaining that anticipation—that we should have had a detailed report from that committee, resolving that radical question for the benefit of Senators who might not be able, in consequence of their not being learned in the law, to give to the proposition that degree of attention which it deserved. If it be true, as was maintained by my friend from Georgia, for whose legal acquirements I entertain so much respect, that I can scarcely trust myself to differ from him—that Congress can make no such law—why, then, I presume that the objection urged by the Senator from Connecticut, on the other side of the chamber, falls to the ground. I rise, then, for the purpose of asking of the learned gentlemen who were occupied so assiduously for some days in the examination of this important question, and who must have known, before they retired, that if this grand obstacle could be removed, we should have no difficulty at all in passing such a bill, whether they made any investigation on that point; and if so, whether they are at liberty to disclose the result of it to the Senate?

Again: I wish to be informed from these gentlemen learned in the law—for I have not turned my attention to the particular statuary provisions on this point, how it is that an appeal and writ of error shall lie from the superior judicial tribunal established in the territories, to the Supreme Court of the United States? The gentlemen of the committee, having, as I supposed, very sedulously directed their attention to the subject which divides us here—the subject of slavery—I wish to know whether, when this law comes to be put in operation, the committee have found with certainty that the question of slavery, as it is usually brought up in courts, can be brought by a writ of error before the Supreme Court of the United States without some specific legislation? For instance: I believe that in the law which regulates writs of error and appeals from the circuit courts of the United States to the Supreme Court, it is provided that the value of the thing in controversy must be at least two thousand dollars exclusive of costs. I have been told, informally, that the provision in this bill, allowing writs of error and appeal, was made to satisfy any gentleman that it was the intention of the committee to withdraw this controversy about the power of Congress to make laws for the territories from the Congress of the United States—to withdraw this constitutional question, in other words, from Congress, and submit it to the judicial tribunals of the country. Now, if that be so, and if that would be the effect of the bill in case it were enacted, I wish to know if a man go into one of these territories with a slave, whether the object of the bill is to raise the question whether that sort of property, without law, can be carried into a territory where there is no law, and if so, how it is to be carried into effect? Under the existing law I suppose the slave would ask a writ of habeas corpus, and require his master to produce him in court, and show the cause of his capture and detention before one of these territorial judges. The territorial judge, according to this bill, is to be appointed by the present Chief Magistrate of the United States—a fact which I beg to mention for the information of gentlemen north of Mason and Dixon's line. This judge will decide—if he believe the constitutional law to be as the gentlemen from South Carolina and Georgia maintain—that the master has a right to the services of the slave, who will be accordingly remanded into the service of his master. But in what way in which the case elaborates itself out into a judgment, and how it is proposed to bring it before the Supreme Court of the United States, so that it may be decided by the highest judicial tribunal in America. How is it to come here? Is the property in controversy of the value of two thousand dollars? What is the value of a slave? My learned friend from Georgia smiles. Perhaps, I may not be so familiar as he is with the value of that kind of property. But if he can listen to me with the gravity which I think the subject demands ——

Mr. BERRIEN.—(In his seat,)—The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. CORWIN.—I withdraw the remark. How is the value of a slave to be ascertained. We are told that there is no property in the negro but simply a claim to his services. What then is the value of his services? It may be more or less according to the judgment of men; but very few slaves I believe sell for a thousand dollars. If then the value of the slave do not reach two thousand dollars, his fate is decided by this judge appointed by the President of the United States, who sits in his court fifteen hundred miles from Washington City. This is the final judgment.

I may be wrong in all this. But certainly, as the case now stands, if such a case come within the category of the bill before us, I have difficulty in perceiving how it can be brought here. I say nothing now of the great advantages that will accrue to the slave population which may be carried there, in consequence of their having such an easy and facile method of bringing their case before the Supreme Court; nor of the perfect equality between them and their master, as respects the giving of the requisite security for costs; nor of the ease with which they can attend the Supreme Court of the United States, after a journey of fifteen hundred miles during the winter, to hear the decision of that tribunal as to whether Cuffee or his master is right in the matter! But it does seem to me that there is here an anomaly worth looking at about the noon of the nineteenth century. I do not rise, however, to discuss the question, but simply to ask the learned gentleman from Vermont, or any other gentleman, who has given attention to this legal question, to favor me with a reply to those interrogatories which I have now respectfully submitted. I should also be very happy to be informed as to the amount of population in Upper California and in that described in this bill as New Mexico. I believe we have pretty accurate statistics in relation to the population of Oregon. But I am somewhat at a loss to know why a distinction has been made between Oregon and the territories of California and New Mexico. I should be very happy to know why the people of Oregon have been regarded as capable of making their own laws, while the people of California and New Mexico have been deemed incapable.

Mr. CLAYTON.—The committee thought in view of all the facts, that the people of California and New Mexico were not now in that state which fitted them to elect a delegate to Congress, or a territorial legislature. The gentleman, as a northwestern man, knows, that many of our territories in the first instance, had just such a form of government extended over them as is proposed in this bill for California and New Mexico. The next stage of territorial organization we have given to Oregon, and I think my friend from Ohio must admit that the character of the population of New Mexico renders them utterly unfit for self-government.

Mr. CORWIN.—Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask another question? Why does he consider the people of New Mexico unfit for self-government?

Mr. CLAYTON.—They are entirely too ignorant, and the gentleman probably knows that as well as I do.

Mr. PHELPS.—I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this bill, but to answer the inquiries of the Senator from Ohio; which were, in half, at least, addressed to me. But before I proceed to answer the questions directly, I beg the privilege of saying in the outset, that in my judgment a great deal of confusion has been thrown around the subject from the want of a proper discrimination between the different aspects in which it is presented. It came here originally upon this Oregon bill, as a mere legislative question. The question propounded was, what legislation, under all the circumstances, would be proper for these territories? Should we, by any express act of Congress, admit slavery, or should we, by the same means, prohibit it? But in the course of this discussion it was insisted in certain quarters that the constitution itself had settled this question, and that our legislation was thus precluded—that this question is not a legislative question—that it never was and never can be—that it is a judicial question; not to be settled by us, but to be settled alone by the proper judicial tribunal. Now, suppose that we pass the Wilmot proviso—that we enact the ordinance of '87 as a part of the territorial law, this constitutional question lies at the bottom after all. Gentlemen may then insist, as they insist here now, that these constitutional guaranties cannot be done away with by legislation. The question still recurs, notwithstanding our legislation, what is to be done with it? We must go to the expounders of the constitution. The question must rest with the Supreme Court, where the constitution itself has placed it. This bill, then, leaves the question where we must leave it, because it is not in our power to decide it.

I think, then, that great difficulty has been thrown over the subject by a failure to distinguish between the power of Congress to enact municipal laws, and a constitutional question involving a construction of the constitution, with respect to which Congress have no power of exposition. Let us determine as we may the question, the constitutionality of the law is to be settled elsewhere. If this bill leave the question to the constitutional expounders, can gentlemen complain that we have not attempted to do that which the constitution has put out of our power, but have left the subject where the constitution placed it?

But the inquiry is raised, whether this subject can be brought before the highest judicial tribunal, and it is said that the bill leaves it to the territorial government jurisdiction. Well, that is inevitable. No judiciary system can be established there which does not possess that jurisdiction. It may be so connected with the ordinary administration of justice that it is impossible to deny this power to the judicial authority of the territory. But the committee have endeavored to provide that the decision of the judicial authorities of the territories shall be subject to the supervision of the highest judicial tribunal. If the honorable Senator had adverted to the celebrated Mississippi case, (the case of Slaughter,) involving this principle, he would have found how the case was brought before the Supreme Court.

Mr. CORWIN.—What was the amount in controversy?

Mr. PHELPS.—I admit that it was over two thousand dollars. But is it to be supposed that this species of population or property is to be carried to any extent into those territories without involving transactions which, in point of pecuniary magnitude, would be brought within the cognizance of the Supreme Court? But the Supreme Court possesses jurisdiction over writs of habeas corpus. I know that they decided in one case not to sustain the writ; I allude to the case of Barry, of New York. The only practicable rule is, that they take cognizance of the writ, where they have cognizance of the subject matter. But if they have not jurisdiction of the subject matter, they have no cognizance of any writ. The case of Barry was one of that description. The subject matter did not come within their jurisdiction. But by the constitution, and, if I mistake not, by the act of '89, the Supreme Court can issue a writ of habeas corpus in all cases proper for the cognizance of that court.

We insist on the part of the free States, and need hardly repeat that if the territory of New Mexico be free, as I now assume it to be, the municipal laws of that conquered or ceded territory apply until they are altered by a competent legislative power. That I hold at present to be the doctrine of the civilized world; and every gentleman from the slaveholding States will not controvert it. But they insist that the constitution is necessarily extended over these territories, because that is the political charter of the country. The argument is then presented, that the guaranties of the constitution apply to this species of property and supercede the local law of the conquered territory. Hence the question comes directly before the Supreme Court of the United States, and no man can doubt that any process which is adapted to the case calculated to bring its merits before that Court will be sustained by them. I have never supposed that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court over this subject would be disputed. It may be brought up in a variety of ways. It is a very poor compliment to the constituents of the Senator from Ohio, or to mine, to suppose that any pecuniary difficulty can be interposed. The question can very readily be tested. I hold that if the question arises, the constitution gives the Supreme Court jurisdiction over the matter without reference to the value of the thing in controversy; and that wherever the Court have jurisdiction over the subject matter, they have of course jurisdiction over all the means necessary to bring it before them.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from Vermont with regard to the provisions of this bill which relate to California and New Mexico. If I recollect the phraseology of the bill, it declares that the governor, secretary, and judges, to whom is given the legislative power in those territories, are prohibited from adopting any legislation respecting slavery. The query which I wish to put is this: whether the words "respecting slavery" relate merely to the inhibitiou or exclusion of slavery, or a positive and direct admission of slavery in express terms; or whether—and this is the point to which I would particularly direct his attention—whether the phrase is intended to prohibit the legislative power from passing any of those enactments for the punishing of slaves for crimes and misdemeanors, as distinguished from the punishment of crimes committed by other persons, which, in every slaveholding community, have been found essential to the safety of such community.

Mr. PHELPS.—I will answer the Senator as far as I am able; and I will here remark that the language of the bill will speak for itself. I believe I was the first person who suggested this restriction, and for reasons which I need not explain. My purpose was—and such I understand the provisions of the bill to be—to prohibit the enactment of any law which should recognize or directly or indirectly establish the institution of slavery in the territory, and of course it would prohibit the enactment of any law which should forbid its establishment. My purpose, and I believe the purpose of the committee, was not to entrust this troublesome question to the appointees of the President, but as far as it was a subject of legislation, to leave the power, as it is now, in Congress. If we were to entrust this duty to the constituted authorities there, it would never be exercised in a manner satisfactory to the people. But so far as respects the punishment of offences, great or small, it never entered into my conception that this bill would inhibit proper criminal enactments.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The Senator does not touch the question which I propounded. He is aware that in all the slave States it has been found necessary to have laws for punishing slaves distinct from those which apply to the white inhabitants. The question I ask is, whether this distinctive character of the law is to be established there?

Mr. PHELPS.—I was about to say, that in my judgment, whatever penal laws are enacted by the legislative power of the territory must be uniform. I certainly do not understand, that under the color or in the form of criminal legislation they could distinguish between persons held in servitude and other citizens; because, if the power is allowed to distinguish between those persons and others, there is no limitation upon the exercise of the power as to the extent to which it may be carried.

I think the question of the Senator is answered, by saying that the purpose of the committee was to leave the institution where it has been placed by the constitution of the country; to retain the power over it in that tribunal, from which we have no authority to withdraw it.

Mr. NILES.—I understand the Senator from as giving it as his opinion that the territories of New Mexico and California are now free territories. I should like to know what was the opinion of a majority of the committee on that point. The Senate will see the importance of this from the inhibition of any action of the local government upon the subject. The existing law, whatever it is, is not to be disturbed. Another question, and that is, whether Congress, in establishing these temporary governments, and giving to the local governor the power to veto the territorial legislation, has parted with its jurisdiction over the subject, or whether we will still be at liberty to pass laws in relation to the subject of slavery, or any other subject, to be applied to the territories. If we still have this power, then there is nothing settled; if we have not, then, as the local authorities are prohibited from acting upon it, the question which I first raised becomes still more important, because the existing law must remain as it is. The local authorities cannot act, and if Congress divest itself of the power, there is no way in which the subject is to be controlled until the territories become States. All, I believe, will admit that Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over these territories, and they may exercise it in one of two ways: they may either make laws directly applying to the territories, or they may constitute a government there. The latter has been the course of action heretofore in regard to territories; and when Congress does this in reference to municipal matters, divesting themselves of authority, and constituting local tribunals, I wish to know whether it is considered that the power of Congress is exhausted.

Mr. BALDWIN.—From the views which have been expressed by members of the committee who have spoken upon the subject, as well as from the reading of the bill which they have presented to the consideration of the Senate, it would appear that the legislated contemplated by the committee as proper for New Mexico and California is very different from that which the committee have contemplated as proper for the territory of Oregon. It has seemed to me, sir, from the first, that there was no proper basis for connecting, for any purpose, the interests of the people of Oregon with the interests of the people of New Mexico and California—territories acquired as the fruits of the war in Mexico. When this bill was referred to the committee, it was a bill for the organization of a territorial government for the people of Oregon, and for them alone. I, for one, am not willing to admit that there is any question here, as it respects the different portions of this Union, of a purely local character. In the remarks I had the honor to submit to the Senate at the commencement of the discussion of the Oregon bill I stated, that in my view the question was a national question, and should be regarded as a national question, and that we should adopt a form of government for the Oregon territory, with a view to great national purposes, with a view to the interests of this republic as well as to the interests of the people of that territory. I am unwilling now, sir, to regard it as a question of any other character, and I think, therefore, that there is an impropriety in connecting the question as to California and New Mexico with the question of forming a territorial government for Oregon, because upon the very face of this bill, there is an admission, an acknowledgement, that we regard it as a question between the North and the South, which is to be settled irrespective of the interests of the whole community, irrespective of the interests of each particular portion of the territory for whose government we are now called on to provide. Sir, I regard these territories as standing upon a different footing, in many respects, in regard to the legislation which it may be proper for us to adopt. We were informed the other day by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, who is a member of this committee, and who has occupied heretofore, during the discussion between this and a foreign government in regard to the title to Oregon, a position which caused him to direct his enquiries to the origin of the title of this government to that territory. We were informed by him, that he regarded our best title to the territory of Oregon as being derived from the cession by France of Louisiana; and in looking to the correspondence which took place between the distinguished Senator, then occupying a prominent place in the administration, and Mr. Pakenham, the British Minister, I find that the honorable gentleman is right in his recollection in regard to the view which he then maintained, although upon other grounds, the title of the United States might be sustained, this certainly occupied a prominent place.

[Mr. BALDWIN read from the documents accompanying the message of the President to Congress in 1845:]

Now, at the time the resolution was passed for the admission of the State of Missouri, there was inserted an express provision, that in regard to all the territory acquired by the cession of France under the treaty for the cession of Louisiana, it should be forever subject to the ordinance of 1787, If then there was a compromise by which all the territory north of 36° 30' which was acquired by the cession of Louisiana should forever be free, why connect Oregon in a bill for the organization of territorial governments with territory since acquired by conquest from Mexco? The compromise, commonly called the "Missouri compromise," exhausted itself in this territory which is now Oregon, and in that territory which has since been organized into States lying south of the line, that designated the division between the free and the slave States. Oregon was then the subject of compromise. The fruits of that compromise have been enjoyed by the South. If our best title to Oregon is the title derived from the cession of Louisiana, I ask gentlemen who profess to be benefitted by the Missouri compromise, why not in fairness suffer the Oregon bill to stand by itself, and suffer the prohibition of slavery to be incorporated in the bill, irrespective of any required concessions, in regard to territory to which the United States had then no title, but the title to which they have since acquired. Is it fair, is right, that those who insist upon adherence to the Missouri compromise should call now upon those who compromised on that occasion, to make a new compromise with respect to territory since acquired? The resolution now stands on your statute book, it has remained unrepealed from that time to this, it still applies to the territory of Oregon. Why then, I ask, correct this legislation relative to the different territories? I rose for the purpose of moving that all that part of the bill which follows the 20th section be stricken out, so as to leave within the bill that only which provides for the government of the territory of Oregon.

[Mr. HALE here addressed the Senate at some length. A report of his speech will be given in the Appendix.]

Here there were general cries of "question!" question!" amidst which—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland rose to inquire whether it was the purpose of the Senator from Connecticut to provide territorial governments for California and New Mexico, or leave them without any until Congress again assembled?

Mr. BALDWIN.—My purpose is simply to disencumber the Oregon bill and the people of Oregon from any connection with the territorial governments proposed for New Mexico and California. My purpose is to consider the bill by itself, as it was pending before the Senate when it was referred to the committee of eight. It appeared to me to be unjust to the people of Oregon to convert their interests with those of New Mexico and California.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I rise to make but a single remark. Every Senator must know that the decision in this amendment will determine the fate of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—I rise simply to express my wish that my friend from Connecticut would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I have no objection to withdraw it for the present.

Mr. BUTLER.—Let me ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he would consent to any legislation in reference to either of these territories that did not explicitly contain a prohibition of slavery?

Mr. BALDWIN.—In answer to the Senator from South Carolina, I feel called upon to state frankly that I could not consent to the organization of government for any territory now free, in which a security against slavery should not be provided.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I understand that the Senator from Connecticut is willing to withdraw his amendment for the present, reserving to himself the right of moving it at some future time.—The question is whether it is in the power of the Senator to withdraw the amendment after the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it? Now, much as I desire to see the amendment withdrawn, and the discussion relieved from the question which it presents, if we are to meet it, I prefer to meet it now; and I therefore object to the withdrawal of the amendment.

There were then renewed cries for the "question;" and the yeas and nays were taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs Baldwin, Bradbury, Chalmers, Clarke, Cooper, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dix, Dodge, Iowa, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Miller, Niles, Upham, Wales, Walker—17.

NAYS—Messrs Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Borland, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Clayton, Davis, of Miss., Dickinson, Dodge, Wisconsin, Downs, Foote, Hannegan, Haywood, Jarnagin, of Md., Jarnagin, of Tenn., Johnson, of Ga., King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Pearce, Phelps, Sebastian, Spruance, Stockton, Turney, Underwood, Westcott and Yulee—31.

So the proposed amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN.—I am admonished, Mr. President, by the whisperings within these walls, that we are to be pressed to a decision of this great question at the present sitting. If, therefore, I would offer any suggestions, which will control my vote and command my action, I must embrace the present as the only opportunity.

The question which we are now called upon to decide is of momentous importance. Yet from its decision I have no disposition to shrink. It is, indeed, startling, that in the middle of the nineteenth century—in this model republic, with the sun of liberty shining upon us, and while the governments of Europe are tottering to their base, from the lights reflected from our own, and while they are striking down the shackles of tyranny over the minds of men—we have been gravely discussing the proposition, whether we will not create by law the institution of human slavery in territories now free. Such, in direct terms, has been the question which we have had before us; such is the issue, in fact, now. Sophistry cannot evade it—metaphysics cannot escape it. If there have been those who have heretofore believed a discussion of this matter premature, all, or nearly all, have declared a willingness to meet the issue when it should be practically presented. That crisis is now upon us, and, as men faithfully representing the constituencies who have sent us here, we must meet it. I had hoped—nay, I had believed—that there were those common grounds of concession, union, and harmony, dictated by a lofty patriotism, upon which all would meet, and by which we would settle this vexed question. Of all things, I have been desirous that we might be able to arrive at such a decision of this matter as would quiet the public mind, and be just to all the people of all the States.

The character of the debate, connected directly with this subject, within the last few weeks, must necessarily associate itself with the question immediately before us for our decision. This bill sprang from that discussion. They are one and the same. That was a bill for the establishment of a government for the territory of Oregon. This includes also the territories of California and New Mexico. As there is no connection in these matters, I had hoped to have seen each bill presented by itself—to stand upon its own merits, or fall upon its demerits. That the Senate has decided that they shall not be separated, and we must meet it as it is presented. I will state the reasons why I am compelled to withhold from it my vote.

We have acquired the territories over which this bill extends. They are embraced within the Union, and it now becomes our duty to legislate for them. It is proper and just that we should extend over them the laws of our country, and adopt such other legislation as the case shall demand. It is a solemn and responsible trust committed to our hands. We are about to shape and mould the character of these territories, which in time shall become a mighty empire. Their destiny is in our hands; the responsibility is upon us. Whether that country shall present all the elements of a free government, in which man is elevated as an intellectual and moral being, or whether the despotism of slavery shall imprint its soil, are matters depending entirely upon us. Let wisdom guide us in the path of duty, and let not the light of the past be lost upon our action. We must act; it now presents a point from which no man can shrink. The issue cannot be avoided; and let no one imagine that an intelligent public can doubt as to the character of that issue. No matter in what form presented it will be clearly understood. True, the bill, like the proposition discussed by the Senate, does not profess to establish slavery by law. It leaves it to extend itself by the "silent operation" of the law without restriction. It does not guarantee it, but will it not permit it? and, after it has found an existence, will it not demand a guarantee? Thus, without inhibition, will it not become certain and fixed by the process of time? Is it too much that freedom of the soil shall be asked and demanded from this aggressive march of slavery? I solemnly believe that this bill will allow of the extension of slavery, as certainly as if it created it in express words. The bill, as I understand it, concedes practically all that the ultra doctrines of the South demand, or will, in its operations, end in that.

With such a bill as this, I cannot hesitate to give the aid of my voice and my vote to arrest it. To know and understand the views of those who sustain it, will enable us to judge of its merits. The public mind will be startled through all the North; it will thrill through all the country like an electric shock, that the acquisition of territory from a foreign power, necessarily subjects it to the institution of slavery—that the flag of this Union carries that institution with it wherever it floats. This is a new principle in the doctrines of slavery propagandism. It is not the doctrine of the founders of the republic. Democracy has been called progressive, but my word for it, she goes along in the old fashioned stage coach style, while this doctrine of slavery propagandism has mounted the railroad cars, if it has not assumed the speed of electricity. I repeat, that it will startle the North when it is known that it is gravely discussed here; that the constitution of the United States, whenever it extends over territory which we may acquire, carries with it and establishes the institution; that it in fact abrogates the laws of the free, and gives in stead the power of servitude.—This is a doctrine of a latter day. It is not the doctrine that accords with the sterling patriotism of the founders of our republic. Far from it! While such are the views of aggressive slavery, which are promulgated here, it makes our path of duty as clear as sun-light. We must prevent this tide, by positive law, from spreading over our free soil. This extraordinary demand of this power leaves us but one course to pursue. We shall be faithless to ourselves—faithless to those we represent—faithless to our country, the age in which we live, and the principles of Christianity, if we falter. We have but to press on, and if, from any or various influences which shall be brought to bear against us, we shall not succeed, or shall suffer a partial defeat, yet

> "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again—
> The eternal years of God are hers—
> While Error wounded, writhes in pain,
> And dies amid its worshippers."

While I do not admit the force or justice of these demands, so pertinaciously insisted upon, yet they must be met, or they will be certain to prevail. In my judgment these doctrines are not deduced from the constitution, but are in derogation of its letter and spirit—that instrument is in all its terms, and in all its scope, an anti-slavery instrument. It was conceived, it was enacted, it was approved by the States of this Union, not in the spirit of extension or creation of slavery, but in a spirit which looked to the future emancipation of the slave in this country. It looked not to the extension of the institution, but to the time when this anomoly in our system of government should cease to exist.

I do not propose to follow gentlemen who have discussed this point at length, nor do I propose to detain the Senate with the views and opinions which I entertain, and which I have drawn from the constitution, and which have brought my mind to a different conclusion. It is necessary, however, that I state briefly my views; that I state the points without attempting to elaborate them. I deny then utterly and entirely this new doctrine which has been presented to us, that the constitution of the United States contains within its provisions a power to extend and establish over territory now free, the institution of slavery. If I understand the argument upon which it is based, it is simply this: that these territories are the property of the people of the United States, that as such they are open to settlement by all the people of the United States, and that as the constitution recognized the institution of slavery at its adoption, it therefore authorizes the institution in those territories which belong to the United States, and in which the people of the United States may wish to reside with their slaves. The constitution does recognize slavery as existing, but it does not create or establish it. Article 1, section 2, says:

> "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons."

This surely is not establishing slavery by the constitution—it makes slaves a basis of representation and taxation. That is all. But in another place the constitution declares. Art. 4, sec 2.

> "No person held to service or labor in one State by the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

From these extracts it would seem to be perfectly clear, that the constitution does not create or establish—it only recognizes a class of persons held to service in the States by "the laws thereof," not by virtue of the constitution. That clause, when fairly construed, is only an inhibition upon the free States, that they shall not pass laws to prevent the owners of slaves from reclaiming them. The argument that slavery is recognized by the constitution is used as equivolent to establishing. The laws of the State do that, not the constitution. It is a State institution resting on the local law of the State, without the aid, without the support, without the maintenance of the constitution in any way whatever. Yet in the face of all this, it is contended and attempted to be proven by metaphysical reasoning, that the constitution extends beyond the States in which slavery is established; that it carries it into free territories, and guarantees it there. Can this be so—and if so, where will the power end? If the institution is one which has its foundation in the constitution, and not in the law of the States, where is the limit to its extension? What is the next step in the application of the argument? After you have overrun your territories, what power can prevent the slaveholder from coming into the free States with his slaves? If his right is a constitutional one—if he rests his claim there, and is correct, a State law could not effect him, because it would be in conflict with the constitution. I cannot see how this conclusion can be avoided. If the premises are correct that result must follow. But I neither admit the premises or the conclusion. The constitution gives no right, it creates no right, it merely recognizes a right which is created by the laws of the State. That it is a local institution there can be no doubt. The courts of nearly all the States have so decided. Authorities to any extent could be cited—they are familiar to all.

I hold that the constitution in and of itself, by its express language, authorizes Congress to inhibit this institution in our territories. I hold the article in the constitution which gives to Congress the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting its territories, includes full and absolute authority over this whole matter. What is the language of this clause of the constitution.

> "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States."

What is this grant of power?

First. Congress may dispose of its public domain. Second—it may make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property of the United States. To dispose of is to give, grant, or convey the public lands; but to make all needful rules and regulations, implies and carries with it full and ample power of legislation, in all cases where the constitution does not otherwise prohibit. There can be no doubt as to the meaning of the terms rules and regulations. The constitution itself interprets them. A law is defined to be "a rule of action prescribed by the supreme power in the State." The constitution gives Congress power to regulate commerce—to make rules concerning captures—to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces. It also provides that persons escaping from one State to another shall not be discharged from service in consequence of any law or regulation therein. In this case both terms are used—all needful rules and regulations—to give the widest scope to the power. But it is said that the concluding words in the clause quoted "and other property" limit and confine our legislation over the territory to the same as property. Grant that our territories are denominated as property, whether inhabited or not, does not the same power exist to pass all needful rules and regulations for its settlement and its final admission into the Union as a State. The power is clearly within the scope and meaning of that clause. The history of the manner in which that clause became a part of the constitution, would settle the question if there could be a reasonable doubt. In the articles of confederation by which the States were united, before the constitution was formed, no such power was found. This grant of power was therefore made, in the forming of the constitution, for the purpose of giving Congress the power. The doings of the convention and the declarations of Mr. Madison are clear upon this point. But aside from this view of the case, we have the uninterrupted use of the power by the general government for about sixty years. Hardly a Congress has existed which has not acted upon this power from 1787 to this time. This power has been exercised by Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and Van Buren. The Supreme Court of the United States has settled this question. Congress has already exercised the power, and that power has been declared valid by the Supreme Court. 1 Peters' Rep., 543, Chief Justice Marshal says:

> "Whatever may be the source whence this power is derived, the possession of it is unquestionable."

In the 5th Peters', 44, again the court says:

> "Rules and regulations respecting the territory or other United States property may include complete jurisdiction."

It is contained in the bill upon which we are acting. It continues the laws of Oregon in force for three months after the meeting of the legislature. It provides in the territories of California and New Mexico that the legislative power shall not pass any laws on the subject of religion or slavery. Here we use the power in its broadest sense. We inhibit the use or exercise of any power on either of said subjects, and some others. Could there be any doubt still remaining, and if we had no grant of power in the constitution at all, there would yet be another source from which we must gather it. If the constitution were silent, as it is not, yet under that power which can acquire, we could most certainly govern. It matters little where you find the power to acquire, if you do acquire, you must have the power to govern. The first is the major, the second is the minor proposition. It would not be good sense to contend that we have a power to acquire public domain, and yet could not pass needful rules and regulations for its government. The case when stated is its own best argument. The sovereignty to acquire must contain the lesser power to govern. These are briefly the reasons which force conviction upon my mind. Casuists have been known to deny their own existence, and satisfactorily to prove it to their own minds. That may be a plausible and a practical doctrine, when contrasted with the one that we have no power to govern our territories. It is "too late" at the noon of the nineteenth century to deny that right, or for us to avoid the duty of acting.

Having the power to act what is the responsible duty which I feel imposed upon me, for I speak for none other? It is that I should exert all the power which the constitution gives to exclude the institution of slavery from our territories now free, because it is a social, moral, and political evil. That such is its character.

needs no argument to prove. They are conceded facts—supported by the declarations and admonitions of the best and wisest men of the South—

"In thoughts that breathand words that burn."

I would resist the introduction of that institution in justice to a superior race of men—to men who are capable of a higher state of social and political refinement. I would institute such governments as are best calculated to advance the true interests of our own Caucassian race, and not degrade the dignity of labor by fastening upon it the incubus of slavery. I would resist it because I would not invoke or use the name of democracy to strike down, as with the iron mace of a despot, the principles of social equality and freedom. I would not profane the sacred name of freedom, while using it, to impose a tyranny upon the minds or persons of men. Jefferson has said that "God has no attribute which can take sides with us in such a cause." The eloquent Pinckney has declared "that the earth itself, which teems with profusion under the cultivating hand of the free-born laborer, shrinks into barrenness from the contaminating sweat of the slave." Sir, my course is a plain one, and clear from all doubt. Our position is unquestionable. We stand in defence of free soil and resist aggressive slavery. And we demand enactments for the protection of free soil against this aggression. We will not disturb that institution, but we will stand in defence of the freedom of our soil as right in principle and beneficial to free white labor in all parts of our common country.

I have expressed the hope that we might have met upon a common ground upon the settlement of this question—a question which has agitated so much the public mind—and more did I hope for it when I listened to the patriotic breathings of the first lines of the President on this subject; when I listened to the language he used in his message, when he submitted the treaty of peace with Mexico to us, and called our attention to this matter now before us for our ultimate decision. When I heard that language read by the Secretary, and recalled the history of the events to which he had invited our attention, I had hoped that the spirit of the fathers of the republic had not altogether departed, that the language of the declaration of independence had not become obsolete. I had hoped that we would come up and, in the language of the President, in a spirit of forbearance and of patriotism, have settled the question in a way which would have secured the approbation of the country.

Allow me to read from the President's message:

"In organizing governments over the territories [which, with such exceptions as may be agreed upon, will be the case with all we may hereafter acquire,] we should go to every portion of our Union. I invoke that spirit of conciliation, conciliation, and compromise which distinguished the illustrious men who formed the Constitution, and which has given us the most prosperous period of our history. Let us imitate their example, and look to no sectional interest, but to the general welfare of the whole Union. We could never have existed as a nation had not this been the spirit which originally animated the different parts of the Union. It is the only spirit which can preserve it. We could never have acquired Louisiana, Florida, Texas, California, and New Mexico, had not this been the ruling principle in the councils of the nation. It has been the source of all our prosperity, and has given us the control over the destinies of a continent, and the ever-increasing means of our national greatness and of all our blessings."

This is the ground upon which we should have met and decided the question. It is in this spirit of liberal and elevated patriotism that I had hoped that this question would have been settled, and that it would not have been merged in a mere question of power or of local or sectional character. I had hoped that we would have been guided by the lights of experience.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I would ask the Senator, if he will allow me, whether he, as the representative of the people of Maine, is now ready, or has at any time been ready to vote for the Missouri compromise line being extended until it terminates in the Pacific?

Mr. HAMLIN.—I answer frankly, no. Because the spirit of the Missouri compromise was not the spirit which marked the wisdom of the framers of the constitution. I would not vote to extend an arbitrary line which permits the extension of the institution of slavery over a portion of the continent.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Did not the Senator vote for the Missouri compromise upon the annexation of Texas?

Mr. HAMLIN.—I did not.

Mr. CLAYTON.—He voted for the annexation of Texas—did he not?

Mr. HAMLIN.—I did not vote for the resolutions for the annexation of Texas which passed the House, nor did I vote for the Missouri compromise contained in the resolutions. A Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLASS,] then a member of the House, offered the compromise there. It was adopted, but I voted against its adoption, and against the resolutions after it was incorporated into it. The resolutions came to the Senate, and the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] offered another and distinct resolution to accomplish the annexation of Texas. Mr. H. said such was his recollection, and he would inquire of the Senator of Missouri whether he offered the resolution?

Mr. BENTON.—It is of very little importance who offered the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN.—Yes, it is of very little importance who offered it. All knew that it originated with that distinguished Senator; for that resolution I voted; and deeply is it to be regretted that the annexation had not been accomplished as that resolution provided. The treasure of the country would have been saved and the lives of our citizens preserved. We should have had no Mexican war. I did not then vote for the Missouri compromise, and I would not vote for it to-day. I would vote for no arbitrary line, even if it took the southern boundary of New Mexico and California, running to the coast of the Pacific. I would vote for no rigid fixed line, whether upon a direct parallel of latitude or winding, because it would lead to the very difficulties which Mr. Jefferson, in his letter recognizing the Missouri compromise in 1820, alluded to with so much force, when he said that it would create sectional parties—that it would strike upon the ear like a fire-bell at night." But this line of 36° 30', running to the Pacific, has other and more serious objections to it. It would be utterly useless. The superiority of our race and its liberal institutions, with the events of the past, teach us, with unerring certainty, that our government is destined to extend over this country. Establish this line, and you doom the whole of the continent south to the curse of slavery, when it shall become a part of our Union. You establish it on a section of country over which free labor cannot pass. That will be the inevitable result of such a line. Can it be doubted that such is the design.

Mr. CLAYTON.—The Senator speaks of compromise, will he tell us what compromise he alludes to?

Mr. HAMLIN.—I am coming to that, and should have done so if I had not been diverted by these interrogatories. In the language of the President's message, I would have our deliberations consummated in "that spirit of concession, conciliation and compromise, in which the constitution was framed." Then we would have no difficulty in the settlement of this question. What is the history of the times cotemporaneous with the formation of that instrument? The constitution was adopted by the convention, September 17, 1787. Virginia, in a spirit of wisdom and patriotism worthy of her ancient fame, had ceded to the general government all her claim to the vast northwest of the Ohio river, and the lands lying within the limits of the Union. On the thirteenth day of July, 1787, and while the convention was in session to form a constitution, Virginia entered into a compact with the States, and established what is known as the ordinance of '87, forever excluding slavery from all that country. Nay, it went further; it abolished slavery there and made it free soil. I think, too, that the history of these times will satisfy all, that the noble and patriotic vote of Virginia was designed to aid in the formation of the constitution by acting upon the convention. In the same spirit of restriction, too, did that convention authorize Congress to inhibit the importation of slaves into the United States after the year 1808. This is the history of those times—this is the spirit of conciliation and compromise that mark those days; let us adopt it now and our work is done. We need not go so far in the rule which we will adopt. The ordinance was an act of abolition. I would abolish slavery in the States, and so help me God I will not abolish freedom in our territories. Let us have nothing of abolition either North or South, nor fix lines which shall divide a country without regard to its character or construction—which shall create sectional parties, the worst and most to be deplored of all. But let the character of the country be determined and settled as it shall be on its acquisition. If free, so let it remain, and so let it be preserved. If a slave territory, so then let it continue without our action. When we look at former acquisitions, it would seem that the South should not object to this manner of compromise. From our former acquisitions, seven slave States have been added to this Union, and three more of the largest class provided for to be carved out of Texas. One free State has only been added from these acquisitions. Justice to the North demands this course. What is a compromise upon which all can meet, and one which cannot create those sectional divisions which all must deprecate. If I have a desire in my heart above all others, it is that this vexed question shall be settled—that it shall be taken from the vortex of political conflicts and the people quieted. Adhere to the ancient landmarks, conform to the settled usage of the country, and such will be the happy result. So much upon our power and duty to act.

The bill before us is objectionable in its provisions, as well as in the manner in which it is presented. It comes in a triangular shape with Oregon as the base, and California and New Mexico for its side lines. Oregon has no connexion with the other territories, and why, then, are they chained and thus connected together? Why not let each stand by itself? Why make the one depend upon the fate of the other? I can see no sufficient reason. For years the people of Oregon have been demanding a government, and bill after bill has passed the other House, but as often as they have reached this body, they have been either permitted to sleep "the sleep that knows no waking," or they have been defeated by those who now claim to be the most vigilant sentinels. During this session and within a few weeks past, Congress has been admonished in a message from the President, that savage hordes were committing depredations upon the whites, and still no bill was passed. The bill was before the Senate, and in accordance with the prayer of the people of Oregon, it contained a section inhibiting slavery from the territory. It was the general impression that that section could not be stricken out. A motion was made to recommit to a committee of eight, and it was seconded, and the bill comes back to us chained to the other territories, and with that section in the bill restricting slavery in Oregon so modified, that it secures freedom for three months only after the first territorial legislature shall meet. This bill is called by some a compromise—all that I can see which entitles it to that name is, that it does provide that the laws in Oregon which exclude slavery, shall remain in force for three months. A compromise, indeed!

Mr. CLAYTON.—If the Senator will allow me, it may not be inappropriate to make an explanatition upon this point concerning which an inquiry has been made. Section 12 provides that the laws now existing in the territory of Oregon shall remain as they are until three months after the first meeting of the legislature of the territory. The Senator from Maine understands, of course, I take it for granted that is his doctrine, that the legislature of Oregon will have the power upon the subject of slavery. Gentlemen who argue as he does, argue that the territorial legislature has full power over this subject. Now take the sixth section in connexion with the 12th. The sixth section provides that the legislative power of the territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the constitution and the provisions of this act. The gentleman holds that the legislature can consistently with the provisions of the constitution, legislate on the subject of slavery. If it can do this, it will do it. If it cannot do this consistently with the constitution, it ought not to do it. Now, take the 12th and sixth sections together, and the whole will be, I think, plain to the mind of any one. I do not see how gentlemen, advocating the opinions which are advocated by the gentleman from Maine can object to this provision of the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN.—From the explanation which the honorable chairman of the committee has given, I apprehend that I did not misunderstand the scope and meaning of the 12th section of this bill, and if the gentleman had listened to the construction which I drew from that section, taken in connection with the 6th, he would have had no occasion to interrupt me. I repeat, then, that the compromise of this bill is one which concedes that the fundamental law now existing in the territory of Oregon, shall remain in force for three months, and for only three months. That is the only concession which I can find in the bill, and if for that it is to be taken as a compromise bill, why then let it be called such. The 12th section concedes that the laws of the territory shall remain in force for three months after the territorial government shall have met. They will then cease and be no longer in force, unless the territorial government shall see fit to re-enact them, and send them here for the approval of Congress. Now, if it were intended as a compromise, why repeal all the laws of the territory? Why was the law regarding the exclusion of slavery not permitted to remain in force until the territorial legislature should see fit to change it? Sir, it is not worth the name of compromise. This is the fundamental objection. It repeals all the laws of the territory after three months, and the 17th section provides that—

"All laws passed by the Legislative Assembly shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States, and if disapproved, shall be null and void."

Thus making the legislative acts of Oregon depend on our approval or disapproval. Is it not then literally true, that this bill concedes the free principle to Oregon for only three months, after which it must depend upon action here. So I understand it.

There is to my mind another and most peculiar feature in this bill, rendering it most inconsistent in its character. It creates for Oregon a territorial government, and gives it a legislature elected by the people thereof. It is a government in which the people participate. Every—

"Free white male citizen above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of said territory at the time of the passage of this act, shall be entitled to vote at the first election."

And it gives the legislature power over all rightful subjects of legislation. In California and New Mexico this bill deprives the people of all power, and of any participation in the government over them. It creates an odious oligarchy over the people of the most objectionable kind. It sets up a government, not with the consent and participation of the people, but rather in defiance of their just rights.

"Sec. 26. The legislative power of said territory shall extend to all rightful objects of legislation, consistent with the constitution of the United States, and the provisions of this act; but no tax shall be imposed on the property of non-residents higher than the taxes imposed on the property of residents. All the laws shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States, and, if disapproved, shall be null and void."

What good reason there may be for entrusting full power and sovereignty to the people of Oregon, while you wholly deny it to California, I do not understand. Why adopt one system for Oregon, and another for California? Is it said that the people of California are not yet suited to participate in a free government or in the enactments of laws? If such even were the fact, why wholly exclude them from all rights? But Senators know, that at this day there are some five or six thousand American citizens there, and they are ruthlessly excluded. Is their capacity for free government to be mistrusted? Is it not rather from the fact that they would set up a free government indeed, that they are deprived of all power? I know there is a mixed population in California, and so it is in Oregon, but the same limitations and restrictions which apply in one case can be applied in the other. The right of voting has been confined in Oregon to the "free white inhabitants." The same limitation may apply to California. No sound distinction can be drawn in these cases. Yet a republican government is established in one case, and an oligarchy in the others. These people were but a short time since the subjects of a foreign power, and sound policy would dictate that we should not set up a despotism over them. Is it not better to authorize our own people to participate in this government, and allow the free white Castilian race the same power? Is it not sound policy as well as correct in principle? Will it not fraternize them with our people and our own government? On the other hand, without power in the local laws by which they are governed, will they not be alien to our Union, and unfraternal to our people? It must not be forgotten that all laws which would be passed in California as in Oregon, would be subject to the approval or disapproval by Congress. This system is wholly repugnant to our form of government. It is in violation of that fundamental principle which recognizes the "consent of the governed," as the basis of government. We are told that such as the early form of our territorial governments. Be it so. It is not the form of later years. If it were the application should be uniform, not applied to the free white population of one territory and not to another.

The settlement of the question of slavery by this bill, it is said, to be determined by the Supreme Court. I think, if that be the case, this is the first instance in the history of legislation where a question purely of a political character has been transferred to the judiciary. It is avoiding what necessarily belongs to us to determine. Is this the part of wisdom, or manly dignity and firmness, to avoid the settlement of a question which is political, and which belongs to us? I think not. We are told that the Supreme Court of the United States can determine whether slavery will exist there or not, if this bill shall pass. That by the 22d section of this bill, a right to appeal is granted from the Supreme Court of the territories to the Supreme Court of the United States. Suppose it to be so. What would the right of appeal be worth practically? Suppose slavery steals in there, as it will, how can the slave avail himself of this right of appeal? Who is to aid him in the first instance, to obtain his writ of haebus corpus, on which to try the question of his right to freedom? And if he should get that process and take the first step, how could he appeal? Court would be his surety; and at the distance of three thousand miles from Washington, by what means could he reach the court? This right of appeal, if it existed by law, could have no practical effect whatever. It leaves all unsettled in fact, while two lines in a law we may pass, by simply inhibiting the institution, will settle all. But, sir, the bill in fact, does not grant even a right to appeal in a case of this kind. Though the right of appeal in certain cases is granted, it does not include this case.

The bill establishes "a Supreme Court, district court, and probate courts." The bill also provides that—

"Writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of the Supreme Court shall exist in the same manner, and under the same regulations as from the Circuit Court of the United States."

To understand correctly what are the rights of appeal granted in this bill, it becomes necessary to see in what cases, and in what manner writs of error and appeals are granted from the circuit courts to the Supreme Judicial Court of the United States. Then we can learn whether there is in fact, any thing practical in this right of appeal. This bill does not determine in words, how appeals shall be had, but refers to existing laws—granting writs of error and appeals. What are those laws? Section 22, chapter 20, regulates the manner of granting appeals from the circuit court to the Supreme Judicial Court of the United States. It says—

"That no appeal or writ of error from a final judgment in any suit in a circuit court hereafter rendered in any civil action, or in equity, shall be allowed to the Supreme Court, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, does not exceed the sum or value of two thousand dollars."

The right of appeal, then, is given only when the property exceeds in value two thousand dollars. As that would be greater than the value of a person who might sue out his writ of habeas corpus, no right of appeal would exist.

But, on this poin, we are not left to the doubtful or uncertain construction of a statute, although the language of that statute is to my mind clear and positive. The Supreme Judicial Court of the United States, our highest legal tribunal, have settled and adjudicated that question. It meets this case precisely. The case to which I refer is one involving the right of appeal from the decision of the circuit court to the Supreme Court, on the process of the habeas corpus. Barry vs. Mercein et al. 5 Howard's Rep. 103. This case was decided at January term, 1847.

"The authority to issue the writ must be given by the law of the United States, or it cannot be allowed. And the only law which authorizes it is the act of 1789, which gives the power to the courts of the United States, and to the judges of them, to issue the writ for the purpose of inquiry into the cause of commitment. But it is clear that this power is limited to cases where the party is in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, or is committed for some act done or omitted to be done in pursuance of a law of the United States, or of an order, process or decree of some judge or court thereof; or where he is in custody for an act done or omitted in pursuance of a treaty or statute of the United States. And in no other case can the writ of habeas corpus issue to bring up the prisoner, or can the court or judge before whom he is brought have the power to discharge him."

So the court has decided this case. No right of appeal could lie. If it did, every man knows that it would be utterly useless as a practical matter. It would not and could not reach the case of a person held to service—no right of trial can exist beyond the limits of the territory by this bill.

How, then, stands the case? You establish a government in California, a governor and secretary are appointed by the President, with three judges who are not removable, and to them you commit the legislative power of the territory; you deny them the power to legislate at all upon the subjects of religion or slavery! even if every person in the territory should desire to exclude the latter. You deprive the people of the right to act at all—you refuse to act here, and one-half of the Senate nearly denying the power. Is not this virtually binding up a wall around that territory, which will and must serve as a protection to this institution? What is the origin of slavery? It is never created by law; it steals into territory, and then claims a law to recognize it. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] says:

"There never was a law in Virginia creating slavery, and I doubt if there has been such a law even in the cotton States."

Such is the fact. There is no law creating it. It exists by brute force, in the violation of the rights of every thing human or divine. Were we called upon, could we justify it, if we thus surrender up this vast country—these great principles of human freedom, and exclude from it the free white labor of the whole land? That this bill will do it, there can be no doubt, as it restricts that power which alone could prevent it. It inhibits all power in the territory from preventing the lawless spread of slavery. That inhibition will prove a guarantee. Or certain it is that while you thus prevent the use of all power to exclude slavery from the territory, it would be as certain as the decree of fate that it would steal in, as it has into all the territories, and then claiming vested rights, it would demand and obtain laws securing and recognizing it. Such has been its history in every State where it now exists; such will be the result here, if this bill shall become a law.

The Senator from Delaware gave us the extent of the area included in those territories north of the parallel of 36° 30′. I was unable to get the precise amount, but if I am right in my recollection, the aggregate of territory north of that parallel was about one million five hundred thousand square miles.

Mr. CLAYTON.—One million six hundred thousand square miles.

Mr. HAMLIN.—And that south of that parallel the area was about three hundred thousand square miles.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Two hundred and sixty-two thousand square miles.

Mr. HAMLIN.—Now, sir, we have not the Missouri compromise before us for discussion. What was the object of the gentlemen, then, in presenting that table of figures? Why did not the gentleman, in connection with it, present other facts and figures for our consideration? Why did he not state that in our free States the population is about twelve millions, and in the slave States about eight millions? Why did he not present another element—the relative proportion of territory between the free and the slave States? I have not made an exact calculation on that point, but I believe that the proportion is about as nine to four—the free States having an area of less than four and a half millions of square miles, and that the slave States embrace an area of more than nine millions of square miles, twice as great as that of the free States. Why did not the gentleman from Delaware go still farther into the statistical view of the subject, and show that even with every inch of territory down to the southern limit of California and New Mexico, somewhere between the years eighteen hundred and sixty and eighteen hundred and seventy, under the operation of the laws which have heretofore governed our increase, the population of the free States would be more circumscribed, more to the square mile, than that of the slave States?

Mr. CLAYTON.—The honorable Senator has so repeatedly called upon me that I must again answer. As chairman of the committee, I stated its proceedings. I stated that the Missouri compromise was proposed—that northern gentlemen voted against it, and southern gentlemen for it, and that if adopted the effect of it would have been to give one million six hundred thousand square miles to the North, and two hundred and sixty-two thousand square miles to the South.

Mr. HAMLIN.—I do not object to the gentleman's statement, but I merely expressed the opinion that it would be much more pertinent to the occasion, had it been accompanied by some of those interesting statistics to which I alluded.

There are other objections to the bill to which I would gladly allude, but I have already detained the Senate longer than I designed or anticipated. Looking to the lights of other days—the patriots of other times—the eloquent warnings which we have had from our Washington, Madison, our Jefferson, our Mason, aye, and from our own Pinckney, too, and all that long list of patriotic men of the South who have adorned this Union; who have pointed out the evils that would come upon us by perpetuating and extending this institution, I owe it to the constituents whom I represent, to our posterity, to all the toiling millions who are seeking an asylum in our land, to embrace this opportunity of opposing with unshaken firmness any attempt to introduce or permit this institution to flow into territory now free. Let these vast and fertile regions be preserved for the cultivation of free labor and free men, so well calculated to advance the arts of civilization. Do this, and the teeming and busy millions of future ages shall bless our acts with grateful hearts.

Mr. CLARKE moved that the Senate adjourn.

It was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

THE COMPROMISE BILL.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial governments of Oregon, California, and New Mexico.

Mr. CLARKE.—From my peculiar position in relation to this matter, having been placed upon the committee, from which this bill is reported to the Senate, I feel it to be my duty to explain the course which I have taken, and which I shall take, in regard to the bill. On the morning when the Senate was about to elect the select committee, to whom was to be referred the subject of considering the territorial bills for Oregon, New Mexico, and California, a [illegible] Senator on this side the chamber expressed a wish that I should be a member of that committee. I declined for the reason that my health would not enable me to undergo the fatigue, and also, because I proposed about that time to return home to my family, hoping that a slight relaxation from my duties here would restore me to my accustomed health and strength. I referred the Senator to my colleague as more able than myself, and better fitted to execute the responsible duties which must devolve upon the committee. I foresaw the difficulties which surrounded the subject, and desired most sincerely to avoid them. Immediately I went to the other end of the capitol to see a friend, and whilst there the committee was elected. When I returned, I understood I had been chosen a member of the committee, and was about declining to serve, when several Senators dissuaded me from that purpose. I consented, much to my own discomfort, to remain and serve as a member of the committee, thereby losing the opportunity of going home, and gaining only an unlimited quantity of abuse from Mason and Dixon's line to the Aristook. The bill reported by the committee has received a laborious and deliberate consideration. It was reported to the Senate with the assent of all the members of the committee, but there were two of the committee who did not give their assent to the provisions of the bill—I mean the Senator from Kentucky and myself. The other members gave their assent unqualifiedly to the bill as reported, and to all its provisions. Since that time an additional provision by way of codicil, or addendum has been reported, without my knowledge or consent, limiting the time for the action of the territorial government of Oregon to three months, and providing that if the law regarding slavery shall not be confirmed within three months after the first meeting of the territorial legislature, the act shall be null and void. I have never given my assent to such a provision—indeed I did not know it was to be reported. The conclusion was arrived at after the bill was exhibited to the whole committee, and had been reported, and from such a provision I dissent entirely.

I shall be as brief as possible, sir, in what I have to say, for at this period of the session it would not be courteous towards the Senate, to detain them by any lengthened observations of mine, even if my health would permit me to stand long enough upon the floor—the last consideration is the best assurance that I shall not abuse their patience. This committee, Mr. President, you will recollect, was appointed by the Senate, peculiarly with a view to the reconciliation or adjustment of this absorbing question. One-half of the committee was composed of Senators from one geographical division of the country, and the remaining half from the other, and each half consisted of two members of each of the two great political parties. Why and for what was the committee so constituted? and to what end was it expected their deliberations should come? Was it not constituted with an expectation that local and sectional feelings should, in some degree, yield to considerations of great public policy, and that the committee should unite their labors for the purpose of endeavoring to frame a bill that should reconcile the conflicting interests of parties in regard to this agitating question? Or was it that the committee should meet together and spend their time without producing any result whatever? So far as my intercourse with the committee has gone, I have seen nothing but a spirit of harmony, urbanity and kind feeling. It is true, sir, that the gentlemen from the South desired to secure to themselves the full rights which they claimed. It is also true that we of the North did endeavor to resist the claims that were made by the South, and in the course of the deliberations of the committee many questions arose, and many were decided by yeas and nays; and finally, after great labor, a bill was agreed upon, which received the sanction of six members of the committee, and which was not sanctioned by the remaining two. The bill has been brought before the Senate to receive the suggestions and improvements which may be thought necessary to perfect it; and it is my purpose, if possible, to give to it a somewhat better shape. But, sir, the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Maine, instead of aiding to improve and perfect the bill, have contented themselves with denouncing the committee who reported it. Now, I disclaim all intention of entering into a controversy upon the question of slavery in the abstract. I have my own opinion in regard to it; and that is that slavery, by the legislation of Congress, should not be allowed to pass into any territory which is now free. My State has expressed the opinion of her citizens upon this subject, decidedly and unmistakeably. I by no means say that she would interfere with that institution in the States where it is now established by law; but she looks with great distrust and alarm upon the acquisition of any territory, to which it may be extended.

Mr. President, under a full knowledge of these views of my constituents, so exactly corresponding with my own, I have acted in regard to this bill, which has been completed by the arduous and unremitting labor of the committee. Before it was reported I moved an amendment, which I shall move again to-day, and that amendment goes to recognize the fact, that by the existing laws of Mexico slavery has been abolished in the provinces or States of New Mexico and California. The amendment which I proposed, and which did not prevail in the committee, I then stated was, in my judgment, indispensible, and without it I could give no assent to this bill; and a declaration of dissent I subsequently reduced to writing and filed with the minutes of the committee. I considered that it was a point, all but conceded, that the territory of Oregon was to be unequivocally and positively a free territory, not being within the probable range of the application of slave labor according to the principles of population, soil, and climate alluded to by the Senator from South Carolina. It is conceded, I believe, that this matter, if uncontrolled, is, in a great measure, governed by geographical position; and no man of the committee believed that Oregon was within that range, which would naturally make it a slave territory. Besides, the provisional government of that territory has enacted a law for its exclusion, which law should never be repealed by territorial legislation, without the assent and approval of Congress. Well, it was proposed to put this matter beyond equivocation or doubt, but in casting my eye over the bill, I perceive in the sixth section that, after granting the power of legislation to the territorial government, there is this expression: "All the laws passed by the legislative assembly shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States, and, if disapproved, shall be null and void." That leaves the question in regard to slavery in the territory of Oregon precisely where I did not understand it was to be placed. There is this vital and essential difficulty in regard to this portion of the bill. If the legislative assembly of Oregon, at any time after the passage of this bill, whether it be at the time contemplated by the bill, or at any other time, shall repeal the law for the exclusion of slavery as passed by the provisional government, and if the act of repeal, travelling across the Rocky mountains and the wide waste that lies between this capitol and Oregon, shall be submitted to the Senate and House of Representatives for their approval, and the Senate should be in favor of approving the law, and the other branch of Congress should be against it, then the act is not set aside, but continues and remains a law in full force. In order to meet this difficulty and to make the bill accord with my views, I propose to add at the end of the sixth section the following:

"Provided, however, That no law repealing the act of the provisional government of said territory, prohibiting slavery or involuntary servitude therein, shall be valid until the same shall be approved by Congress."

My object is this: that no repeal of a law so essential to a large portion of this country, so important to the North under the present excited state of public feeling, was contemplated by the committee, nor should take place without it should first receive the decided assent of Congress. With this provision I shall consider that the territory of Oregon will, in all probability, be a free territory; and I also believe that she is entitled, clearly and unequivocally, to the power of excluding slavery and involuntary servitude from within her limits. I believe it was the understanding of all parties here, at the time of the admission of Texas, that Oregon should be a free State as an offset against the increase of slave power which would necessarily follow from the annexation of Texas. The North has lost, by the surrender of a large portion of Oregon, much that we had a right to expect would be free territory, whilst instead of losing at the South, we find that the State of Texas is now claiming to extend herself to the Rio Grande, and to take within her limits all that portion of New Mexico which is most valuable. Nothing is lost to the slave interest of the South, and much has been lost to the free soil of the North. But by the proviso I offer, we shall secure what we have remaining, and with this amendment, in my judgment, the bill relating to Oregon will be satisfactory to all parties.

Mr. President, when the committee were debating—and they had much deliberation in regard to these territories of New Mexico and California—there was some doubt expressed as to the fact whether, by the laws of Mexico, slavery had been utterly and absolutely abolished within all the States of that republic. It was the generally received opinion that such was the case, but I have heretofore understood the Senator from Texas, [Mr. HOUSTON,] to assert that such was not the fact. In order that it may no longer be matter of doubt, but settled beyond controversy, I have prepared an amendment declaratory of the fact, which I will offer for the consideration of the Senate—meanwhile I ask that the following decree of the President of the republic of Mexico may be read by the Secretary.

"The President of the United States of Mexico to the inhabitants of the republic:

Know ye, that desiring to distinguish the anniversary of the commencement of the year 1829, by an act of justice and national benefaction, which may contribute to the comfort and support of that unfortunate portion of the inhabitants of the republic who live in the state of slavery—that many promised the guardians so frequently and in the most solemn manner to restitute an unfortunate portion of its inhabitants in those sacred rights, which nature gave them, and thus protect and sustain the nation by wise and just laws, in conformity with what is prescribed in the fifth article of the constitutive act of the federation of the extraordinary powers with which I have been invested, I have seen fit to grant the decree—

1st. Slavery is abolished from the republic.

2d. All those who until this day have been considered as slaves, are now entirely free.

3d. When the situation of the public Treasury will permit it, the proprietors of the slaves shall be indemnified in the manner which the laws may prescribe.

Don Don. Jose. Maria Bocanegra.

Mexico, 15th September, 1829.

Vol. 3. Page 149 of the decrees of the Mexican government published by authority.

It appears that in 1829 slavery was abolished in the republic of Mexico by the then President Guerero, by this decree issued by him in virtue of the extraordinary powers vested in him by the constitution. In 1830 or 1831, the government of President Guerero was subverted and overthrown and he was put to death—and in the zeal of revolutionary excitement, the Congress of Mexico passed a general law, repealing all the laws that had been made or decrees issued by Guerero, by virtue of those extraordinary powers, and in this general repeal of all laws, this decree for the abolition of slavery was included. But in the year 1837, the Congress of the republic of Mexico passed an act having direct reference to this subject, which I will also ask the Secretary to read:

"AN ACT ABOLISHING SLAVERY IN THE REPUBLIC.

ART. 1. Slavery without any exceptions, is, and shall remain abolished throughout the entire republic.

ART. 2. The owners of slaves manumitted by the last, or by the decree of 15th September, 1829, shall be indemnified for the interest, &c.—providing only for appraisal.

Dated April, 5th, 1837.

Well, sir, such being the undisputed fact in regard to the Mexican law, in order that it may be placed beyond doubt or question in future, I propose to offer to the Senate the following amendment, to be added at the end of the word [illegible] in the 26th section of the bill—and also to a similar section relating to New Mexico, viz:

"[illegible] New Mexico [illegible] and all laws [illegible] and all laws now in [illegible] the United States to forbear to [illegible]."

There was another question, which was considered of vital importance as to these territories, whether they are to be governed by the existing laws of Mexico until others are made and sanctioned by Congress, or whether under the constitution of the United States which over-rules all law, the owners of slaves would have the same right to carry them as property into these territories, as the citizens of the free States would have to carry with them their property. It was proposed in the committee that this question should be left open. The view taken by my friend, the Senator from Vermont, and by myself was, that if such was the law, another great constitutional question was involved, that if a slave should be carried to California, and if by the laws which exist there, he could not be held in servitude, whether he would be able to sue out a writ of habeas corpus before any judge in California, and upon a decision rendered by the judge against him, also be able by this bill to carry the question of his personal liberty by appeal, to the Supreme Court of the United States. As the bill stands, it was necessary in order to carry a case to the Supreme Court that it should involve an amount equal to $2,000. But in a case of personal liberty, the question of amount involved, should not, in my judgment, enter into the consideration of the case. Whether such a case necessarily involved a constitutional question, so as to enable the appeal to be carried up, was a matter of much deliberation. It was the opinion of the Senator from Vermont and others, in which I also concurred, that it would be a subject for an appeal to the Supreme Court; the difficulty would only lay in its practical operation. The committee were divided more upon this question than upon any one of so vital importance; and as much doubt continued to rest upon the subject, I propose to offer the following amendment as an addition to the 24th section of the bill. It can surely do no harm—but may be productive of good:

"And in all cases involving the personal liberty of a citizen of said territory, or any person claiming therein any matter touching the personal liberty of any person, in any judge thereof, [illegible] United States."

My object, Mr. President, in offering these several amendments has been to endeavor to make the bill, if it shall become a law, as unobjectionable as possible.

We cannot shut our eyes to the deep interest that is felt and the strong manifestations made in regard to these important subjects. Why, sir, the charges that have been made against us have been rung, with all their exaggerations, from the broad Atlantic to the Alleghanies; and the reverberations will reach us from the more distant parts of our land. Clouds of discontent are gathering in the political horizon—they are lowering upon us—and, without invoking the spirit of prophecy, we may easily anticipate the mischiefs that will ensue if these questions are not satisfactorily settled. He who can throw oil upon these troubled waters will have done much good. I am not vain enough to suppose that office to be mine. I anticipate no such distinction; but if my humble aid can contribute to the quiet and peace of our common country I shall conceive that my labors have not been in vain.

The Legislature of the State of Rhode Island has passed strong resolutions upon this subject, and under the instructions contained in those resolutions I am not permitted to vote for the enactment of any law that will, upon any contingency, authorize the existence of slavery in the territory of Oregon: neither am I at liberty to establish slavery in any territory now free. With regard to the instructions of a legislature, I do not consider them as obliging a Senator to surrender his own well-conceived and fixed opinions. I feel, that in receiving an appointment to the high honor of a seat in this body, a degree of confidence has been reposed in my discretion and judgment, and that I may be permitted to exercise that judgment in sincerity and in honesty. Indeed, sir, I would shrink from no responsibility. But as the bill is now framed I cannot and will not give it my support, and may not, even if the amendments I have proposed are adopted—although they would certainly make the bill much less objectionable than I believe it to be now.

I have said that I did not assent to the provisions of this bill as reported by the committee, and that I reserved to myself the right to propose such amendments as I deemed advisable, and to act upon its passage as my judgment should direct. This was distinctly stated in the committee-room, and I supposed my objections had been entered upon the minutes by the Senator from Indiana. Having ascertained from him that the entry upon the minutes had not been made, at his suggestion, I drew up a declaration myself, and gave the paper to the honorable Senator, to be attached to the minutes of the committee, then in his possession. If he has the minutes of the proceedings, I will be obliged to the Senator to allow that paper to be read.

Mr. BRIGHT.—The journal of the committee is in the committee-room. I will send for it.

Mr. DICKINSON.—What the Senator from Rhode Island speaks of was all subsequent, I presume, to the action of the committee upon the bill. I heard nothing of any protest.

Mr. CLARKE.—It was perhaps not properly a protest. It was a statement of my objections and of the reasons that would govern my action upon the bill.

Mr. BRIGHT.—I did not understand the Senator as dissenting from the report, but on the contrary as consenting it should be made. Since the committee reported the bill, the Senator handed me the paper, which I have in my hand, and which can be read if he desires it.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I have no desire to oppose the wishes of the Senator from Rhode Island in regard to this matter, but the practice of referring to what took place in the committee is wrong. I beg Senators to consider how much it will embarrass the intercourse of members of committees if the proceedings of such committees shall be liable at any time to be brought into public discussion. I merely make the suggestion to the Senator from Rhode Island, without meaning to make any objection to his having the paper read.

Mr. CLARKE.—I am not disposed to violate the courtesies or the rules of the Senate. My only object is, that the matter should stand before the Senate and the country precisely as it occurred.

Mr. FOOTE.—I certainly think the Senator from Rhode Island has a perfect right to make such explanation as he may think proper, and if the reading of the paper is necessary, in justice to the Senator, it should be read.

Mr. CLARKE.—I thank the Senator from Mississippi for the kindness of his remarks. It matters but little, however, whether the paper is read or not. I will state what occurred when the committee was called together for the last time, so far as an explanation is proper.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I hope the Senator does not understand me as making an objection.

Mr. CLARKE.—No, sir; but a suggestion from the Senator from Georgia has much weight with me. When the committee was in session for the last time, and the bill, as matured, was presented for approval. I offered an amendment, which I deemed important; which amendment was rejected by the committee. I then stated that I would not dissent from the report, but that I held myself free from any committal in regard to the bill—free to offer any amendment, and to vote upon it as I should think proper. That, instructed by the legislature of my State, and knowing the feelings of my constituents, which did not differ from my own, I could not give it my support. The Senator from Kentucky also dissented from the provisions of the bill, and made the same explicit reservations; and it was to that Senator and to myself that the chairman [Mr. CLAYTON] referred, when he said that one of the committee from the South and one from the North dissented from the bill as reported. I supposed these declarations had been noted by the secretary of the committee. Finding it had not been so done, on the same day I drew up the paper, which has been referred to, declaring unequivocally my position, and the reasons that would govern my course, as stated to the committee, and as now detailed to the Senate. Having done this, I considered my position undoubted, and my right as a Senator unquestioned and unquestionable. I did desire that the paper should be read, as its purport is plain and distinct—particularly that I might place myself here and elsewhere in a true position as to my action upon so important a measure. I have not the physical strength to proceed further.

Mr. MILLER.—Mr. President: I desire briefly to express my objections to the bill now under consideration. It provides for the establishment of territorial governments in Oregon, California, and New Mexico. The reasons which induced the committee to unite these three territories in one law have not been given to the Senate. And why Oregon is found in this strange connection, I do not understand. Her history, her position, the character of her people, and their claim upon us for government, are so entirely different and disconnected from the two other territories, that I cannot comprehend the propriety of this alliance.

Oregon is a native territory—her people are our people—with the same manners, customs, and language. She had claims for territorial government long before these foreign provinces were conquered by our arms. California and New Mexico became ours on the 4th of July. Our title to them is not one month old. Many of the people inhabiting these territories do not know at this hour that they are citizens of the United States. The character of these people, and their feelings and disposition towards this government are unknown to us. We have but little information as to their local laws or customs, and of the nature of the soil and productions of the country. All the information we have is that we have acquired so many thousand square miles of territory, and that this territory is inhabited by mixed races of men, ranging from the proud Spaniard down to the unadulterated negro; but in what proportion they exist there, and what are their relative rights, we are altogether ignorant. Now, sir, I am not prepared, nor do I think the country is prepared, to say what kind of political connexion we ought to form with these strange people. Are we now prepared to say that the government proposed in this bill, which places all the power, legislative, judicial, and executive, in the hands of the same men—uniting the three branches of government in one body, is the proper form of government to trans in up these people in the ways of our republican institutions?

If I understand this bill, it authorizes the judges and governor, with the aid of the secretary, to make the laws, and then to construe and execute them. This is a strange form of government. It is neither republican, democratic, nor theocratic. It is a tri-ocracy—three in one. Now, although I am ready and willing to give to Oregon a proper government, I am not prepared to legislate for California and New Mexico. And one objection which I have to this bill is that it compels me to legislate for all or none. Is this fair and just towards Oregon? Why should her fate be united with that of these Mexican territories? Why should the free-born be associated with the base-born? Why should the free territory of Oregon be joined with the conquered territory of New Mexico? Should the native citizens of Oregon be told that the laws and constitution of their country will not be extended over them, unless at the same time and in the same bill they be also extended over the piebald races of subjugated Mexico? Is this part of the compromise? Is it the understanding of the committee that the claims of these territories upon us for government are so equal that they must stand or fall together? If so, let the friends of Oregon look to it, or another session of Congress may pass, and Oregon still left without a government. I did suppose that the friends of Oregon had found out, by this time, that there was some danger in these Mexican connexions. There was, I believe, a sort of an understanding between Texas and Oregon that they should come in the Union together—one as slave territory, and the other as free; but owing to some inattention, by not being put in the same bill, Texas got in first, and then shut too the door, and poor Oregon has been knocking for entrance ever since; and even now, she is told that she cannot come in unless she brings with her two such Mexican slave territories.

But this bill is presented to us as a measure of compromise, and in that point of view I desire to examine it. We all understand that the subject of compromise is slavery in the territories named. In looking into the bill, I find that the subject is named or referred to in but two sections of the act. In the 12th section, (which relates to Oregon,) it is declared that the existing laws now in force in that territory, under the authority of the provisional government established by the people thereof, shall continue to be valid and operative therein until three months after the meeting of the first territorial legislature.

One of the laws now in force in the territory is known to be a law prohibiting slavery in Oregon. This law, then, is continued in force for three months after the meeting of the first legislature, and then it will be abrogated by virtue of this act of Congress. This repeal will leave Oregon without any law against slavery. It is true, there is nothing in our bill prohibitory of the right in the territorial legislature to pass other laws upon the subject of slavery, and they may do so subject to the sanction of Congress; but until they do pass such new laws, there will be no law, Congressional or territorial, against the admission of slavery into Oregon. The 26th section of the bill, which provides for the legislative power in California, expressly prohibits the territorial legislature from passing any law "respecting slaves." The 33d section contains the same provision with regard to New Mexico. Thus by the prohibitions of this bill New Mexico and California are prohibited from passing any laws against the introduction of slavery into those territories. Neither is there any reservation in the bill that Congress may hereafter act directly upon that subject.

These provisions in the bill do, in my opinion, amount to an abandonment of the power of Congress over the subject of slavery in California and New Mexico. We say in effect, that we will not interfere by law, although we have the power to do so, to prohibit slavery, but let it go there and sustain itself, if it can, under the constitution. In order to understand what it is that constitutes the compromise, proposed by this bill, it will be necessary to look at the matter in difference between us at the time we referred the subject in dispute to the committee. The question that divided the Senate, and upon which we spent many days and much eloquence, was this: whether Congress had the constitutional power to prohibit slavery in a territory of the United States?

There was also a collateral question, whether, if we had the power, it would be expedient to exercise it in the case before us. Upon the question of power, I entertained no doubt then, nor now, and I am well satisfied that a majority of this Senate were of the opinion that Congress had full power over the subject. Congress had frequently exercised that power in the territories, both North and South, and the Supreme Court had, whenever the question was raised, sanctioned our laws. Yet the Senate thought best to raise a committee upon this point. I then thought, and still think, there was nothing in the question which we could or ought to compromise, unless we were prepared to yield up or to qualify a clear constitutional legislative power.

But, sir, the committee was raised. How have they disposed of this question, the question of our power to prohibit slavery in the territories? The chairman of the committee says that this bill neither affirms nor denies the power of Congress to legislate upon the subject, but leaves the question to be decided by the Supreme Court. If this be so, we are just where we started. The committee have done nothing towards settling the question in dispute, they merely refer it to the decision of another tribunal. But is the bill of that negative character represented by the chairman. I think not. Upon looking into its provisions, I find that it does exercise the power of Congress upon the subject of slavery. It exercises the power in Oregon by abrogating the law now in force there against slavery, in three months after the meeting of the first territorial legislature. It also exercises the power in New Mexico and California, by declaring that no laws shall be passed in those territories "respecting slavery;" this inhibition of course prohibits all laws against slavery. Thus this bill instead of neither affirming or denying the power of Congress over the question of slavery in these territories, does assert it openly and efficiently, and what is more objectionable, it exercises the power all in one direction, and that is in favor of slavery. All laws now in force in Oregon are to be abrogated. While California and New Mexico are deprived of all power to pass laws respecting slavery, still more, if this bill is to be considered as a compromise, Congress is also to refrain from passing any law prohibitory of slavery in either of those territories, for it cannot hereafter be insisted upon with any fairness, that after agreeing to leave slavery unrestricted in these territories that Congress may hereafter pass laws to prohibit it there.

This bill, then, in my opinion, removes all restraint upon slavery in the territories. There will be no law, Congressional or territorial against its admission. It is left to stand or fall upon the constitution, without any law of Congress upon the subject. This I understand to be the compromise. This is making a clean field for slavery to commence operations in. There is no visible wall nor hedge to shut it out, and if it does not take possession of the field, and plant itself there with deep root and wide spreading branches, it will be because the field is not worth the cultivation. But it is said that slavery cannot be established in the territory without a positive law to sustain it. And yet there being no law in the territory legalizing it, it cannot go there.

I have no doubt of the correctness of this principle of law. We all admit that the right of the master in his slave depends entirely upon positive law. Yet we all know that slavery has and will make its way into countries where there is no positive law prohibiting it. I doubt whether slavery was introduced in the first instance into the Atlantic States—it being contrary to—by positive law. It came in at first by stealth, then by permission. It grew in because there was no law to forbid its entrance; once in it soon made friends, and created an interest and an influence too powerful to be discarded. Then came a demand for laws to protect and regulate it. Slavery is here—here without our consent—imposed upon us by England; cast upon our shores by Yankee ships, but being here it must now be protected and regulated. Thus said the slave States at the time of the formation of the constitution, and thus it was that African slavery commencing by imposition and without law, fastened itself upon the country and grew up until it is now dignified by the name of an institution, and sanctioned by the constitution itself. This non-interference policy is the true policy for the extension of slavery. "Let us alone," says the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] pass no laws against slavery in the territories, is all that the South asks of the North. This bill concedes to the South all that they ask in that particular. Slavery is, as far as Congress is concerned, let alone, and being left to work its own way into these territories, it will continue to be let alone until it finally secures itself beneath the protection of a slave State constitution; then it will be beyond our control. Again, if we pass no prohibitory law, slavery will go there under some color of right. It is insisted by distinguished Senators from the South-southeast, that, in whose opinion upon this subject the people of the South will have great confidence—that the constitution of the United States carries slavery into the territories, and will protect it there provided there be no law to interfere. Now, sir, although I believe that there is no such power in the constitution, yet others as sincerely believe that the power does exist. They will act upon their opinion, and will carry slaves into California and New Mexico, sincerely believing that their property will be protected by the constitution. Under these circumstances that constitutional question which you reserve for settlement by this bill, will become more of a practical than a legal question. Large interests, individual and social, will be involved. Sectional feelings will be aroused. The peace and safety of the Union will be threatened. Under these difficulties the supreme court may say that as Congress had not ex-reised its constitutional power to prohibit slavery in the territory, and did by way of compromise agree to refrain from passing any laws "respecting slavery," and slavery being now in the territory to a large amount, we, the judges of the Supreme Court, being also divided upon this constitutional question, will also compromise the matter by letting slavery remain until Congress shall pass a law to abolish it.

I do not see why the Supreme Court may not compromise its constitutional powers as well as the Senate. If it will endanger the Union to prohibit slavery in a territory where it does not exist, how much greater the danger to expel it after it has taken root there. Again, I am altogether opposed to throwing this question upon the Supreme Court. I consider it more of a political than a judicial question. It has for years entered into the general politics of the country. It has influenced our national policy, both in war and in peace. From the foundation of the government to this hour it has been treated as a legislative question. Here in Congress, where the States and the people are all represented, this vexed question has, through all the excitements of former times, been regulated and controlled. To send this question now into the Supreme Court for final adjustment, will be to send there all the politics of the country, national and sectional. Presidential elections, Executive judicial appointments, sectional interests, State rights and State honor will all follow the question into your courts like so many suitors and advocates.

In the course of the debate this slavery question has frequently been called a firebrand, the incendiary's torch, thrown into these halls to destroy our free institutions. But what do you propose to do with this explosive matter? To extinguish it? No, sir, you only propose to smother it for a time, to wrap it up in this law, and then send it down to the chamber below, into the Supreme Court, and there, among the deeper foundations of our political temple to let it explode. I prefer to keep this matter above ground, in the light of day, before the American people, and here in the legislative department, by a majority of the representatives of the States and people of this Union, fairly and honestly to settle the question. This will be after the example of the fathers of the republic, and in accordance with the spirit of our republican institutions. Let that majority decide the question either way, and I will be content. Neither do I believe that a decision of this question either way by Congress will endanger the Union. The people of this country have been too long in the habit of submitting to laws passed by their own representatives, to resort to nullification now. They may seek to alter or repeal them by a change of their representatives, but they never will resort to disunion in order to get rid of an act of Congress. Who believes that any respectable portion of the people of this enlightened country can be excited to revolution upon the question, whether negro slaves shall or shall not be permitted to go from the sunny South to starve or freeze to death on the mountains or in the valleys of Oregon and California? This alarm about the safety of the Union is a false alarm, and I trust that the Senate of the United States will not be frightened by it, out of its constitutional right to control this subject. But, sir, suppose we should send this question into the Supreme Court, and that that tribunal should, in a particular case, determine the constitutional point, would their judgment finally settle the matter, or even quiet future agitation? If I could believe in or even hope that this exciting question could be finally settled by the Supreme Court I would cheerfully vote for this bill. But it must be remembered that the decision upon this bill would be founded simply upon the constitutional right to hold slaves in the territory. There would be no act of Congress prohibiting or admitting slavery in the case submitted, and therefore let the opinion of the court be either one way or the other upon the constitution, the great question which we have been agitating here for months—the question as to the power of Congress to pass laws on the subject, would not be touched by the decision of the court.

That question will then come back to us—it will return with increased urgency and necessity. It will come with more force on account of the decision of the court upon the constitutional question; for that decision may be founded upon the fact that Congress not only neglected to pass laws, but agreed, as we do in this compromise law, not to pass any upon the subject; and we will then be told that slavery is admitted or rejected as the judgment of the court may be, because Congress neglected to exercise its constitutional power upon the question. It would be but a sad result of this reference to the judiciary, if it should turn out after all that the only power in this government which can control slavery in the territories is the legislative power. But again, are Senators from the North or from the South prepared to say that the decision of the Supreme Court will be satisfactory to both sections of the Union as a final settlement of this exciting subject. I have heard no opinion from either side upon this point. We all know, from past experience, that political questions of this character are not settled by one or two opinions of the court. The Supreme Court, with John Marshall at its head, solemnly decided that the charter of the bank of the United States was constitutional; yet General Jackson, and the party which he led, held otherwise; and claiming the right to construe the constitution as they understood it, overruled the judgment of the court, and substituted public opinion in its stead. Such I fear will be the fate of any opinion of the court which may be obtained under this law. Public opinion will sustain it in one section of the Union, and public opinion will condemn it in the other; and the fight will go on until Congress shall settle the question by positive law.

Permit me also to call the attention of the Senate to what, in my opinion, will be the practical operations of this law in the territory upon the respective rights of master and slave. Under this system of non interference on the part of Congress, and by virtue of the new doctrine that the constitution protects slavery in the territories, slaves will go there. It will be found scattered all over the country wherever slave labor may be profitably employed. It will soon become, in favorable locations, a dominating interest, exercising a controling influence—the master believing that he has a constitutional right to this kind of property, while the slave, accustomed from his birth to obey, and ignorant of the privilege reserved to him by this bill, to contest the right of his master.—The master's rights will be maintained as strictly and as rigorously as in any slave State in the Union. Under circumstances like these it is expected that the slave, either by himself or by his next friend, will avail himself of this law, and by a writ of habeas corpus, or by an action for false imprisonment, try the right of his master to hold him in bondage. To suppose that the slave would or could commence these proceedings for himself, is idle. He has not the power to do so, even if he had the knowledge of his rights. He will be found on some plantation, remote from any of the means of redress. He cannot take the first step towards freedom without the consent of his master. His person under the control of another, without means, without counsel, and without opportunity, how can the slave commence and carry on to judicial decision a law-suit against his master? Nay! will he be permitted to do so, when that decision may destroy the right of every master in the territory? But suppose a slave, impelled by the love of freedom, should escape the vigilance of his master and find his way to one of our judges appointed under this law, and apply to him for a writ against his master. It is probable that the judge to whom the application is made, will be himself a slaveholder, and entertain the opinion expressed here by several southern Senators, that the constitution of the United States carries and protects slavery in the territory. Will the judge grant the writ, or even listen to the appeal of a slave against what he considers the constitutional right of the master? But suppose the judge be willing to hear the case, it will not be his duty to issue the writ. This, under some rules of practice hereafter to be made by the court, must be done by an attorney or clerk, and the negro will be turned over to them for his writ; and whether they will undertake the case or not may depend upon the state of public opinion in the territory at the time. We all know its controlling influence both for or against the slave, according to the latitude in which he may be found. It will be a long while before a slave, in New Mexico, will be able to settle, in his own person, the great constitutional question referred by us for final adjustment in the Supreme Court of the United States. But it is said that the slave will be aided in this matter—that he will have friends at the North—that the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] will interest himself in the matter—that funds will be raised, and agents sent down for New Mexico to institute legal proceedings in behalf of the slaves, and in this way we shall soon have the question settled.

Now, sir, suppose the Senator from New Hampshire, or any other gentleman equally ardent in the cause, should undertake this mission of philanthropy, what would be the course of proceeding and what the result? He would go, I trust, in the spirit of law and order—he would go down for New Mexico to institute legal proceedings against the master, for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of slavery in the territory. When he gets there, he will proclaim his object. He tells every master that his mission is to free all their slaves—not by force, but by law, to be administered through the courts, and then asks the aid of local judges, marshals, attorneys, and witnesses in his suit. Now, whether he will get such aid or not, or whether he will be permitted even to remain there himself, will depend upon the amount of slave interest and slave influence to be destroyed and encountered by his mission. We have one or two examples of a mission of this kind, sent from a free State to try in a slave State the constitutional question of slavery.

In the year 1820, the State of South Carolina passed a law of a highly penal character against free colored persons being found on board of any vessel arriving at a port in that State. This law, I believe went so far as to doom the unfortunate colored sailor to be sold into slavery.

Under this law, a colored seaman, and a freeman by the laws of Massachusetts, being found in the port of Charleston on board a ship belonging to citizens of Massachusetts, was seized and imprisoned, and was dealt with according to the provisions of this law.

The State of Massachusetts complained of this law. She believed it to be unconstitutional, and for the purpose of settling that question, she sent one of her most respectable citizens, with power and authority, to bring a suit in one of the courts of South Carolina, for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of this law. What was the result of this message? If I recollect rightly, the agent's first difficulty was, that he could not find a lawyer in Charleston who would bring the suit. And then undertaking to bring it himself, he found all avenues to the courts shut against him, and the result was, that instead of liberating the colored seaman by due course of law, he found himself imprisoned by a mob, and from which he only escaped with life and limb by being forcibly carried off by some friendly citizens of Charleston.

I have not referred to this case by way of censure to the citizens of Charleston. I have no doubt they acted under the belief that the law was constitutional and necessary to their peace and safety. My sole object is to show how utterly futile it is to rely upon a mission sent from a free State into a slave community to settle through the courts of the latter a constitutional question affecting the safety or the legality of slave property. If the enlightened and law-abiding citizens of the city of Charleston would not permit a question of this kind even to be heard by their courts, what may we expect from the slave owners of New Mexico?

Let us also look at the operation of this law upon the master. He, as I have already said, will carry his slaves into the territory under the opinion that his property will be protected by the constitution of the United States. Honestly entertaining that opinion, and there being no law in the territory against slavery, he will feel himself authorized to resist every attempt on the part of individuals to interfere with his slaves. At the same time, others who are opposed to slavery, and who embrace the other side of the question, will deny his right to hold slaves in the territory. They will tell the slaves that they are free, and may entice them to leave their masters. Thus beset and harrassed in the enjoyment of what he considers his property, the slave owner will resist this interference, and there being no law in the territory "respecting slavery," he will make law for himself, and riots and lynch-law will settle the question. Now do southern gentlemen desire to see this state of things, are they willing to place slave property, the most timid of all kind of property, in a position where it may be constantly interfered with, and where there is no law to regulate the relative rights of master and slave? My opinion is, that this no-law-policy will not be satisfactory either to the South or to the North. The South will complain that while you permit slavery to go there, you give no law for its protection. The North will complain that you permit it to go there at all when you have the authority to prevent it.

The interest of both sections of the Union require that, before their people emigrate to these territories they should know whether they are to be slave or free territories. Do not send them there under false hopes, some with the opinion that slavery is to be protected, and others that it is to be abolished. Do not send slavery there for litigation, do not permit it to grow and spread itself there, under the hope that you may hereafter be able to root it out by the process of a law suit. No, sir, let us meet this question now openly and fairly, and declare at the very beginning of the these territorial governments, whether they are to grow up into free or slave States. It is due to the people of the territories. It is due to our citizens who may desire to settle there, that this question be settled before it becomes involved with the rights of private property, or entangled by local interests.

It was upon consideration of this character, that our fathers enacted in advance, the great ordinance of 1787 for the future government of territories and States which, in the course of time might arise out of the north-west territory. They enacted this law while that country was yet a wilderness. They impressed it upon the virgin soil, and made it an original element of social and political existence. They did not wait until slavery should go there and then eradicate it. They did inquire whether slavery could exist without positive law. They knew that the country was free then, and they determined to keep it so by positive law against slavery, and who, now, can look upon those five magnificent States, as free as they are, which have grown up under the influence of this organic law of freedom, and not admire the wisdom of that forethought, which prompted the ordinance of eighty-seven.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. FOOTE] asks me whether I am in favor of any compromise upon this subject. I will answer the Senator's inquiry with pleasure. I am not in favor of any compromise that will admit slavery into either of these territories; and I will now proceed to state my reasons for this position.

Slavery has now no legal existence in either of these territories. It is, in fact, prohibited in them all. They were free when we acquired our title to them. Oregon is free by nature and by the act of its inhabitants. New Mexico and California are free by the law of Mexico abolishing slavery. Now, if I agree by way of compromise to admit slavery into these territories, or into either of them, I would, by my vote, establish slavery in a country where it had no legal existence before. This responsibility I cannot assume. In taking this position I make no war upon the institutions of slavery as they exist by law in the slave States. I interfere with no man's rights, private or political; I take things as they are, leaving slavery where it has the right to be, and prohibiting it where it has no right to go. Neither can I perceive that there is any thing unfair towards the South in this. The North has heretofore, on all occasions where the territory acquired was, at the time of its acquisition, subject to slavery, yielded the question to the South. Louisiana, Florida, and Texas were all slave territories when we acquired them. We of the North did not insist that you should abolish slavery there. We objected to the annexation of Texas as unconstitutional and impolitic, but we did not insist, with threats of disunion, that slavery should be abolished in Texas as a condition to her admission into the Union.

Since the acquisition of Texas we have acquired other Mexican territories, in which slavery is abolished. Now, all we ask of you is, to extend the same fair rule to them that we extended to Texas. They are free now; let them remain so. If we consent that acquired slave territory shall remain subject to slavery, ought not you to agree that acquired free territory should continue free?—What more fair and equitable compromise than that can you expect? To demand more on your part, would be asking for slavery a double advantage, and to grant more on our part, would be to surrender the rights of free labor in all the territories. While we of the North are willing to maintain the existing rights of slavery, as they exist in the States or in the territories, we cannot, we will not aid in creating for that institution new rights and new advantages. We cannot consent to acquire territory in order to increase the area of slavery. We will not conquer free countries and then subject them to slave institutions.

There is another reason why I would not compromise the question upon these territories. It is this: New Mexico and California were acquired by war; that war arose out of the annexation of Texas; and Texas was annexed for the avowed purpose of extending and strengthening slavery. I am not willing to crown this unholy purpose with a double success, by extending slavery, not only into Texas, but also over New Mexico and California. I am not willing that the triumph of our arms in this war shall be the sole triumph of slavery. There are also other Mexican provinces lying south of New Mexico. They are well adapted to slave labor; they would make several slave States to be annexed to our Union, and if we now admit that the two provinces already conquered may be subjected to slavery, we shall hold out an inducement to a portion of our people for the subjugation of all the others. I am not inclined to compromise any difficulties which stand in the way of another war with Mexico; I would rather increase them.

I am opposed to the admission of slavery into these territories for another reason. I believe its establishment there would not only be unjust to their present free inhabitants, but would also retard the growth, cripple the energies, and mar the future prosperity of the people and of the States which are destined hereafter to occupy that country. In forming the first government for our territories, soon to be States on the Pacific, we should look at the country upon which that government is to operate, we should look at its climate, its soil, its relative position to, and its future influence upon the Union. With these enlarged views, it is our duty as well as our interest to give to this school of infant communities such laws and institutions as will best train them up into great and prosperous States—States where labor may receive its best reward, enterprize achieve its richest triumph, and liberty enjoy its surest protection. We are not engaged in making a government for South Carolina or Massachusetts, but for Oregon. We are not making laws for the regulation and protection of the domestic institutions, or for the local rights of property in the several States of this Union, North or South. No, sir, we are legislating for our far distant provinces on the Pacific, and the question is what laws and institutions will best promote their prosperity, for their prosperity will best secure the strength and glory of the whole republic. I deny that the slave States are alone interested in the introduction of slavery into these territories. If it be right that slavery should go there? If slave labor will be profitable there? If the prosperity and wealth of that country are to be promoted by it? Then considering it as a mere question of political economy, we of the North are as much interested in sending slave labor there as you of the South; so on the contrary, if slavery will be a hinderance to the growth and prosperity of these territories, you of the South are as much interested to keep it out as we of the North, unless you put yourselves upon the narrow and selfish ground, that you have the article to sell, and wish to get rid of it by inflicting it upon some raw and inexperienced territory.

During this debate, Senators from the South have said that slavery was entailed upon the southern States by England, introduced there while they were yet colonies, when they had not the power to resist the imposition. They even charged our Yankee friends with aiding and abetting the cruel mother country in the perpetration of the misery. We have also been told that if slavery be a curse, that the North aided in inflicting that curse upon the South. Without stopping to inquire into the truth of this charge, I desire to call the attention of the gentlemen who make this charge to the striking similarity between the position of our colonies on the Pacific, and that of the old colonies of England on the Atlantic. The distance of each from the mother country is about the same, except ours have the advantage in the inland means of communication. Both are new countries about to be settled by freemen and improved by human labor. Both about to be impressed for the first time by the controlling influences of law and civil institutions, which will mould the character and fix the destiny of people and States. Now, sir, if it be true that England committed an enormous outrage upon the rights of humanity, and upon the best interests of her subjects by sending slavery into her colonies, how can we excuse ourselves for following her pernicious example, by sending slavery into our provinces on the Pacific? England may plead as her excuse for justification, she has now the opinions of the age and the demands for labor in a new country. But in this nineteenth century, full of light, liberty, and free labor, what apology can we offer to Christendom for planting slavery upon the distant shores of the Pacific. There is no Christian man now living who would like to acknowledge his descent, face him who by force placed the first African slave upon our Atlantic shore, and who I ask is willing to take the responsibility of planting the first seeds of slavery in the free soil of Oregon and California upon the Pacific.

The proposition to establish slavery in countries conquered by our arms, and free at the time of the conquest is a a new and startling proposition. This is far beyond and above the old question concerning the rights of slavery as they existed when our constitution was formed, or as they now exist under State institutions. With these vested rights, I have neither the power nor the disposition to interfere. It would protect them where they are as I would protect any other rights secured by law and constitution. But this new franchise which is now claimed for slavery, has neither law nor practice to support it. If we grant this privilege, we make ourselves the authors of slavery in these conquered provinces; we give to slavery new existence, new energy and a new country. We carry an exotic into fresh soil and with our own hands plant it there, cause it to grow and spread until its dark branches shall overshadow the land. To do this is to become propagators and cultivators of slavery in foreign lands, and only to be limited in our operations by the extent of the continent. To extend slavery by conquest of free soil is to make slavery one of the highest objects of national dominion, and the chief incitement to national progress. It is to place slavery above liberty by seizing upon soil in possession of free labor and converting it to the uses of slave labor. To grant this advantage to slavery will be to invest it with a progressive power, never before acceded to it by any nation, heathen or Christian.

I know of no higher political responsibility than that which rests upon legislators, when engaged in making the first laws for a new and an extensive empire. It is, if I may use the expression, a work of creation, giving form and character where they never existed before, causing the spirit of law and order to move over the solitudes of nature, and converting them into the abode of social and political life. In performing this great work for our extensive territories in the far West, I desire to give them such a government as will best secure to their citizens life, liberty, and property; as will best encourage and reward labor, agricultural, commercial, and mechanical; as will best secure domestic tranquility in them, and national strength and glory to the Union. To secure these great results, I have, after much deliberation, come to the conclusion "that there should be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territories, otherwise than in punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

Mr. PHELPS.—I rise, not to discuss the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, but as a member of the committee who reported the bill, I feel bound to vindicate the measure; more especially as (if I am to judge from present appearances) I shall be almost the only representative of that section of the North from which I come, in favor of the bill. It is by no means a pleasant position. It was as a matter of necessity in the first instance that I consented to act upon the committee, and to my entire regret I have discovered that the result of our deliberations has met with the most decided—the most vehement—I am strongly tempted to say—the most unreasonable opposition, from the northern section of the Union. This subject of slavery, so much discussed here, has indeed excited the deepest alarm in the mind of every man who is attached to the Union. Long before I had the honor of a seat here, the prediction had gone forth, that if the Union were to be dissolved, it would be through the agency of this agitating question. No reflecting man can regard it with other sentiments than those of alarm. No man who desires the perpetuity of this Union can avoid the strongest anxiety to terminate this excitement and, if possible, to settle this perplexing and dangerous question forever.

As a member of the committee, I felt that I had a duty to discharge to the whole country. I was not placed on that committee for the purpose merely of representing the peculiar sentiments of the people of my own State. I was placed there to discharge a duty—an imperious duty—which I owed to all sections of the country. I was placed there in order to endeavor to bring to an end the agitation of this subject, at least in this chamber. Under these circumstances, I concurred in the bill which has been presented to the Senate as a proposition of peace. And it is now my object to explain, if I can, the assertion I made the other day, that on this subject I thought I could vindicate my course to the country at large, and to my own immediate constituents.

The conferences of this committee resulted in a manner surprising to all. It has been said that extremes met here. It is true. The result of our deliberations brought the honorable Senator from South Carolina and my humble self, who may be regarded as representing the extremes of opinion, into concert. If he and I agree, surely I am justified in asking that our proposition may be considered and discussed in all quarters in the spirit of conciliation. But how is this proposition met? To my surprise and my regret, the whole catalogue of approbrious epithets has been exhausted in the attempt to heap odium upon this bill. It has been called a "skulking," "dodging," "shrinking," "shuffling," "cowardly" measure! I do not know but the term "dough-face" has been applied to each of its supporters.

Sir, all that the committee ask is a dispassionate and a candid hearing. If the bill do not commend itself to the sound, deliberate, and impartial judgment of the Senate, let it be condemned; we must submit. But I am not disposed to see the bill hunted out of the Senate like a wild beast. I am not disposed to be implicated in the cry of "mad dog," in relation to the subject. The committee are entitled to a candid and rational examination of their work.

What are the objections urged to the measure? The very first proposition, I believe, coming from my honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] is founded upon the technical objection of a misjoinder—the subject, as we lawyers all know of special demurrer; yes, mere special demurrer. I regret very much, that in the case of a measure of so great importance—involving considerations of such magnitude, affecting the interests of the whole country, the existence of our institutions and the Union—that we are called upon in the outset to argue it on the nice point of a special demurrer. My friend from New Jersey also [Mr. MILLER] complains that we have united these several bills. But, sir, is there a single provision in this bill relating to Oregon that applies to either of the other territories? Is there a provision which extends to California that extends to any other territory except New Mexico? Where, then, is the force of the objection that the committee incorporated in one bill provisions for three territories? I can answer the objection in one word. The committee thought it expedient, in order to bring the whole subject before the Senate, and to avoid the manifestation of mutual distrust by a controversy as to which bill should be acted upon first, to pin together those bills, which were originally separate, and if any gentleman objects to the union, he can, by simply taking his scissors, in one moment remove the objection, by cutting them apart.

Sir, it was but the other day that we had to meet the objection that a distinction was made between these territories; and the question was asked by an honorable Senator, "how does it happen that you have distinguished between these territories, making one provision for Oregon and another for California?" The question is readily answered. I answer it for myself as a member of the committee, in vindication of my own judgment and my own motives as a northern man, hostile to the institution of slavery, and opposed to its further extension. The people of Oregon have already adopted my views and my opinions, in the absolute exclusion of slavery from that territory. Every consideration which bears upon the subject convinces me that they will hold of the same opinion. There will be no inducement to carry the institution there. Their condition, soil, climate, productions, and pursuits will forbid it, while the sentiments and preconceived opinions of the people who will emigrate thither will be hostile to it. With New Mexico and California the case is widely different. Those territories are debatable ground. I, for one, was not willing to entrust them with the decision of this grave question; and therefore it was that I would leave the matter to territorial legislation in one case and not in the other. But while we are called upon on the one side to answer the objection, we are met on the other by the special demurrer of the Senator from Connecticut upon the ground that we have united in one bill separate and independent provisions for each territory which neither control, interfere with, or modify each other.

Mr. BALDWIN.—The Senator from Vermont does not seem to apprehend the point of the objection which I made to the union of those bills. The objection was taken and insisted on the ground that the people of Oregon were entitled to have their bill considered irrespective of any objection which might result from any unwillingness on the part part of members who were favorable to the bill for the organization of the territory of Oregon, to vote for those provisions peculiar to New Mexico and California. I desired the bills to be separate, inasmuch as if the Senate and House of Representatives could not agree upon the provisions for the organization of all these territories, all would be deprived of government, Oregon among the rest; whereas, it standing alone, Oregon might be supplied with a territorial government.

Mr. PHELPS.—I have no doubt that Oregon is content to stand on her own rights, but I do not see how these rights are affected by having the bill providing for her territorial government connected with another measure providing for the government of another people. It would be in due season to raise this objection when it is ascertained that such difference of opinion exists in the Senate as calls for the division of the measures.

But the proposition of the committee has encountered objections of more importance than those relating merely to technical forms. The details of the bill have been misrepresented—grossly misrepresented. It has been described to the country as an odious measure; and I must be permitted to say that it would seem, from the comments bestowed upon the bill here, that gentlemen had derived their ideas of it rather from the perusal of newspaper paragraphs than from an examination of the bill itself.

My purpose in addressing the Senate is, in the first place, to vindicate myself against the charges involved in these misrepresentations; and secondly, to vindicate the bill itself before the Senate and the country. As I have already intimated, the most decided opposition to the measure which has been manifested here, has come from my own section of the country. It may be that I stand alone in its vindication, but I trust to be enabled to stand upon my own resources, and shall trust to my own intelligence for my vindication. It is well known, I presume, to the whole of these States as decidedly hostile to the institution of slavery as any section of the Union. Ultra, I may indeed call the people of that portion of the country, for they have always taken the most decided and strongest ground in opposition to it. I have had occasion heretofore to give expression to their sentiments and my own upon that subject upon this floor. Only a few days ago I expressed those sentiments in a manner, as I believe, not at all misunderstood. I professed my decided hostility to the extension of this institution to any portion of this great country under our legislative control, where it does not already exist. I maintain the same position still, and standing upon that position, I concurred in the bill reported by this committee. I will add that I will defy the world with all the ingenuity that can be brought to bear on the subject, and all its demagogueisms to show that I have abandoned one particle of the principles heretofore maintained by me on this floor, or one iota of the constitutional power necessary to carry those principles out.

I am not about to enter into a lengthened argument as to the effect of this bill. My views have been already expressed on a former occasion, and they have been reiterated by others who agree with me upon the legal principles which form the basis of my opinions in relation to the bill. At the same time it is necessary briefly to advert to them in order to show their application to the measure before us. In doing this, I beg gentlemen to understand that my remarks are intended to meet northern objections. My vindication is to be addressed to that quarter in which the charges have been made, and if in vindicating myself it should happen that I do not commend the bill to the favorable consideration of southern gentlemen, I have only to say, that understanding my purpose, they must judge for themselves of the force of what I say, and of the propriety of sustaining a measure which I fear my arguments will not commend much to their favor.

What, then, are the provisions of the bill? What, let me ask in the first place, is the condition of those provinces? That inquiry has been answered by documents read at the clerk's table this morning. These territories come to us with an absolute, express abolition of this whole system of African slavery. It was exterminated there totally, absolutely, and forever. Such was the condition of things there when they came under our dominion, and such, as I maintain, is their condition still. We have all supposed, until we learned to the contrary from the Senator from New Jersey this morning, that by the law of nations—the law of the civilized world—the law of equity, and humanity, and of common justice, the municipal regulations of a conquered or ceded territory, so far as they are connected with private rights and the rights of property, remain in force until changed by the legislation of the conquering power. It requires no argument to establish that proposition. The question, indeed, becomes this: Does the cession of a territory, (or its conquest if you please to use the term,) disorganize and destroy the whole social system? Does it abrogate all civilized association, and is every individual of such a territory upon occasion of its cession, growing out of conquest or otherwise, turned out of the pale of civilization? Does all security for life, or liberty, or property cease? Is the title to all property vacated? Is crime legalized, if such an expression can be used, where there is no law? And can every crime known to the category of human depravity be perpetrated without the power to prevent or the power to punish? If not—if society can hold together under a cession, it follows that the ligaments which hold it together, remain in force until they are destroyed by a superior power.

Mr. MILLER.—I hold that they do until altered by the conquering power; and that when you establish a government there, you abrogate the previously existing laws, which are inconsistent with the laws which you establish.

Mr. PHELPS.—Unquestionably. I will not differ with the honorable Senator on that point. So far as the laws of the conqueror, which are extended to the province, come in conflict with previously existing laws, the latter are abrogated. There is no doubt of that. But the general principle is what I contend for, and I am very happy to find that the Senator from New Jersey concurs with us on that point. We have had several arguments on that subject. I had myself the honor of addressing the Senate on that very point, and I believe I was fully sustained by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BALDWIN] who preceded me—the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS] not now present, and the Senators from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] and New York [Mr. DIX,] and from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN.] Indeed, I believe with respect to this principle thus advanced, there is not, after the explanation of my friend who sits behind me, [Mr. MILLER] a difference of opinion any where. If these laws, then, are to be retained, what is the result? Here is an express law prohibiting the institution of slavery, and if it is to remain in force undisturbed by us, I ask honorable Senators, where do they find the door open for the introduction of slavery? I have not stopped to cite authorities. I believed it to be unnecessary. Authority enough can be cited. The most emphatic declarations of the Supreme Court of the United States serve to settle this point.—This position, that the law of the ceded or conquered territory remains in force until altered by the conquering or succeeding power is now, I believe, the received and acknowledged law of the civilized world, and is questioned by no competent lawyer.

The next principle upon which I rely is equally well settled, and is, I believe, controverted by nobody—that a slave taken from a territory in which the institution is recognized, into a community where it does not exist becomes by the transition, free.

Mr. BALDWIN.—The Senator from Georgia, I understand, to deny the position.

Mr. PHELPS.—I did not so understand the Senator from Georgia. He says that the constitution of the United States places this upon a different footing. That position I shall advert to presently.

Well thus far, I believe, there has been a concurrence on both sides of the chamber. If I desired a judicial concurrence, I have only to go to Louisiana, the very centre of the slave population, where I find decisions going as far as any to sustain me on this point. The people of Louisiana, deeply interested as they are in this species of property, with every inducement on earth to bias their judgment, through their judicial tribunals concede this doctrine. I think, then, that I am relieved from the necessity of all argument on this subject. Now, after having advanced this argument to the Senate, and found myself sustained fully and absolutely by gentlemen on all sides around me, I am somewhat surprised when I am told that this bill carries the institution of slavery into these territories, and puts an eternal prohibition upon its exclusion there. I pray what principles are to govern my conduct? I listened to the arguments of the Senators from New Hampshire and Maine and found that they concurred with me fully, as they travelled over the road along which I had journeyed, but found to my utter astonishment, that when they had come to the conclusion of the whole matter they had, unaccountably to me, shot off in an unexpected direction. How do these gentlemen make out that this bill carries slavery into these territories? Is that the legitimate result of the doctrines which I have stated? How do gentlemen prove that, in carrying out these doctrines to their legitimate conclusion, I have abandoned my former professions, and subjected myself to the charge of having concurred in "a dodging, skulking, evasive bill, with a cowardly visage?"

Sir, if I were to give a definition of a coward in relation to this matter, I should define it to be one who abandons his principles for fear of popular clamor: I should define it to be one who departs from his own convictions, lest some body who does understand the subject, or who does not choose to understand it, might raise a cry of disapprobation in some quarter: I should define it to be one who avails himself of the excitement upon this subject, and through its aid secures election to office. The man who acts the part of a political weather-cock, by indicating the slightest whiffle in the political wind, trembles at the least indication of popular excitement, and is paralyzed by an opinion which floats to him upon the atmosphere of some bar-room discussion.

I know not what other men may think on the subject, but in the discharge of my duty here, if I thought I could depart one iota from the doctrines which I have advanced, with a view to effect a decision at the ballot box, my own constituents would, in their deliberate judgment, administer a rebuke never to be forgotten. I know them too well to imagine that they will ever find fault with a strict adherence to duty on this or any other subject upon the part of their representatives. I have no hesitation in trusting my reputation, my standing, and my political existence, to the deliberate judgment of that people. But I never will jeopardize their integrity or my own, by yielding to a momentary impulse which may mislead them as it has misled others.

To return to the course of argument which I was pursuing. What are the provisions of this bill in relation to Oregon? The people inhabiting that territory from the necessity of the case, have adopted what they call provisional laws; they are subject to our control. For the present we give validity to these laws by our approbation. Now, these laws exclude the institution of slavery entirely from that territory. But it is said that we have provided for a legislative power which may alter them with our consent. How could we do otherwise? But here a plea in abatement is put in. It is said that we have provided that the laws shall remain in force for three months after the commencement of the first session of that territorial legislature. Suppose they choose to continue those laws in force; they may re-enact them. But, say the gentlemen, you should have provided that the law should remain in force unless repealed. What difference does it make! If we suppose the legislature of that territory competent to re-enact those laws, why they are competent to repeal them, and e converso; if competent to repeal, they are competent to re-enact; and I do not know that the difference is very important between providing "Be it enacted, that a certain law passed so and so, shall remain in force until the future action of the legislure," and providing "Be it enacted that such a law shall be in force no longer, unless it shall be the pleasure of the legislature to continue it." I think the power to do one thing is competent to do the other. It is the most immaterial thing in the world, in my judgment, and before I would hazard the peace of the country, and jeopardize these bills on a distinction like that, throwing these territories out of the protection of law, I can only say that I would select to stultify myself in some other manner.

But there is another view of the subject more worthy, in my judgment, of the consideration of the Senate. I approve of this provision, because I know the people of Oregon to be of my way of thinking. Having expressed their views, and believing without doubt or hesitation that such would continue to be the views of that people, I was willing to say to them, go on and exclude this institution, as I would if I were among you. I suppose this concession to a people whose opinions have already been expressed on this subject, and whose adherence to them hereafter cannot be doubted, is to repudiate the "dodging and sloking" this question. No man from the South has the least expectation that slavery will ever get into Oregon. Every consideration forbids it. Now, whether the territorial government continue the law in force, according to the plan of this bill by re-enactment, or we leave it as the bill stood when printed, in force until repealed—in either event the matter is subject to our control, for they can do neither the one thing nor the other without our consent. And I take the liberty to add, without anything of the kind having been expressed to me, that if the people of Oregon, at the meeting of their legislature should perpetuate this law, southern gentlemen would not withhold their acquiescence. They would make no question about it. We had no controversy about Oregon in the committee. It was conceded as free territory. We were all of one mind, and it would be extremely unfortunate if this criticism of the bill should destroy a measure upon which, in that committee, composed of the ultraists on this subject, all were so well agreed. I care nothing about this restriction of three months, and for the reason which I have mentioned. If they choose to perpetuate the law, I give them my sanction. There is no ground to apprehend that there will be any controversy about it.

The question now arises with respect to the other territories, New Mexico and California. Why do we put them upon a different footing? The answer is easy. We thought that the people of Oregon could be entrusted with the elective franchise. But we were not justified in extending that degree of confidence to the population of New Mexico and California. In this point of view, I believe that the Senate will concur with me. An elective government in Orgon is nothing more nor less than the exercise of the elective franchise by our own people, brought up and instructed under our institutions. The exercise of that franchise by the mongrel population of New Mexico and California would be as broad a farce as could be enacted. Hence we made the differeuce. The question then was, how we could organize a government for these territories without involving ourselves in this question of slavery. After having rejected the idea of an elective legislature there, it was proposed to organize a government on what is called the primitive plan—consisting of a governor and judges, appointed by the President of the United States. As a northern man, I objected to that proposition without a restriction upon the introduction of slavery. I was not in favor of removing this great question from the hands and control of the Senate. I was not disposed to send the power adrift, to seek lodgings in some tenement about this city. I was not disposed to suffer it to take refuge with these appointees of the President. What was the result of my objection? A prohibition was included in the bill restraining these temporary governments from enacting laws on this subject of slavery, and now, to my utter astonishment, I am told that I have concurred in a measure which perpetuates slavery in those countries. How so? Why, says the honorable Senator from Maine, you have prohibited these men from excluding it. I suppose we all agreed that it is not there now, and that it could not be brought there without legislation, and in the simplicity of my heart and the simplicity of my intellect, I supposed that if a local regulation were already made which forbade the institution, and that regulation were left in force, the institution would be effectually excluded. My idea of the matter is simply this: that the institution being already excluded, if you forbade any change of the law, it really was excluded forever.

This is one of the objections going the rounds of the newspapers, and on account of which the committee is threatened with "burning in effigy." We of New England have been accused of not only selling our constituents, but ourselves to perpetual disgrace, and all because we happened to believe in Lord Coke's maxim of letting well enough alone.

What more do gentlemen require than is given in this bill? I claim that, judging by their own platform, no fault can be found with it. If they demand an express prohibition of slavery, here is a local law now existing there, prohibiting the institution—a law which we recognize and affirm. Why add another law? Could you in that way make the prohibition any stronger? It would be a work of supererogation. The committee might have decided upon the Wilmot proviso; and if we had succeeded in introducing it into this bill, does any man suppose that we would have thereby changed the opnion or vote of any man upon this floor? No, sir; the Wilmot proviso cannot be carried here.

If I am right in these views, (and southern gentlemen can judge whether I am or not—they are aware I am addressing myself to objectors who agree with me in the general principles I advance,) I ask why should I have entered into an idle contest about a punctilio? For, with these views, the Wilmot proviso is nothing but a punctilio. The object is effected by other means.

I pass now to the judicial power of the bill. And here, sir, permit me to advert to another objection which has gone abroad in regard to this bill equally unfounded. It has been said that this bill refers the matter to the Supreme Court, and that we have endeavored to escape responsibility by throwing our duty upon them. No greater mistake can be made. The bill refers nothing to that tribunal. It refers to within the constitutional power of Congress, nor any thing which does not belong to them independently of the action. This subject presents itself in two aspects. First, as a legislative question. Congress possessing the exclusive power of legislation over these territories, the question is first presented to us as one of legislation merely. What law should be passed on this subject of slavery? Shall it be admitted or prohibited? These questions must be settled by us in our discretion. They cannot be referred to the Supreme Court. I am not done with proposition, because as I have endeavored to prove, we have settled this matter, so far as our legislation can settle it, against the introduction of slavery.

First, in regard to Oregon by continuing their laws in force for the present, and leaving the matter to their legislation in future, with a negative upon their action in Congress, which will prevent the introduction of slavery without our assent. It is agreed on all hands that slavery cannot exist without a positive law allowing it. Should they be disposed to enact such a law, which no one supposes will ever be the case, we have a control over it.

Secondly, in regard to New Mexico and California, by leaving their present law excluding slavery in force, and prohibiting the territorial legislature from changing it. This is all which can be done. To add a prohibition of our own would add nothing, because, first, we already sanction the exclusion; and secondly, if we did, a subsequent Congress might repeal it. We have done all which we can do.

In the positions on which these results are founded, all gentlemen on both sides agree with me. I will repeat them:

1. Slavery exists only by force of positive law in its favor.

2. There is now no law in those provinces allowing it, but it has been expressly abolished there.

3. The law of those provinces remains in force until changed by the legislation of the United States.

4. The bill prohibits the territorial legislature from changing it,

5. I may add that if Congress enact now an express prohibition, it adds nothing to the existing prohibition, and might be repealed by any subsequent Congress.

What more, then, can be done in the way of legislation than this bill proposes? I have said that I believe all agree in these positions. I believe neither the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] nor the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] deny them. What, then, do those gentlemen insist upon, and what is the judicial question which is alluded to? I understand those gentlemen to insist that the constitution guarantees to the people of the slave States their property in slaves, and that by force of the constitution, they are equally protected in that property in the territories if they choose to migrate there with it. This question is purely a judicial question. If such be the true interpretation and meaning and effect of the constitution, how can any act of Congress change it? Can we repeal the constitution? And if a question arises as to the construction of that instrument, does it not belong to the Supreme Court to determine it? How then can it be said that we refer to that tribunal a question which belongs to it by the constitution, and which we cannot take from them if we would?

What, then, does this bill provide in relation to the judicial power of the territories? That power must be given to them, for every gentleman will perceive that restrictions upon the judicial power in relation to this subject would render the arrangement nugatory and good for nothing. If this question arises, it must be acted upon judicially, and a restriction upon the judiciary of the territory would render the whole inoperative. But I was no more willing to trust the judicial power than I was to trust the legislative power, most especially as it was composed of the same persons.

The question then arose, what shall be done? And here let me inquire what is the question that is to go to the country? It is the question arising under the constitution, for that is the claim of southern gentlemen. All that was necessary, then, was to provide for an appeal which would bring this subject directly before the Supreme Court as the constitutional expounders of that instrument. Is there any skulking or dodging here? If I were at liberty to detail what took place in committee, I believe, that for one, I should be exonerated from the charge of dodging in reference to this matter. But I say here, as I said in committee, I never will, in a constitutional question in the case, I am willing to leave its decision to the constitutional authorities. I cannot repudiate them. Shall we distrust the co-ordinate department of the government? I may distrust the President. He was not elected by my vote; but while he is in office as a co-ordinate department of the government, he is entitled to my confidence as a legislator, so far as the constitution submits any matter to his constitutional control. Can I trust with the Supreme Court? Shall I distrust them? Shall I refuse to submit the matter to their decision? I belong to a class of politicians who have uniformly asserted the supremacy of that court, and I must confess that I have been greatly surprised to find whigs of the North disowning or distrusting its constitutional authority. I have yet to learn either from political friends or political opponents, that that court has in any degree forfeited the confidence of the country. In the integrity and capacity of that court I have equal confidence. Who doubts the integrity or the learning of the distinguished chief justice? And who is prepared to say that that court has become so degenerate, and is filled with such unworthy men, that it is not to be trusted with the power conferred upon it by the constitution? I can preach no such heresy, and I am perfectly willing to leave this as a constitutional question to that court. If the court decide against me, I will submit. If I cannot trust the power there, where, in heaven's name, shall we repose it? To what earthly tribunal will gentlemen refer the question? I might take it home to a whig caucus in the State of Vermont, but their decision would hardly bind the people of the South. We may decide it here, but to what would our decision amount? My friend from New Jersey seems to think that the country would acquiesce in the decision of Congress, though not in the decision of the Supreme Court. Does experience sustain the idea in this point of view? Did the people acquiesce in the decision upon the tariff of '32? Did not the people, instead of acquiescing, take the short way of changing their legislators and abolish that tariff? I hope my friend from New Jersey does not consider us estopped from finding fault with that last legislation.

There is one point upon which I forbear any remark, except to say that it there be any question as to the practicability under this bill of carrying the subject to the Supreme Court, let the bill be amended. I have been informed that some gentleman with the view of closing this whole controversy on this point, will prepare an amendment removing this objection. It is not necessary then to argue that point. But the bill has been most grossly misrepresented. We are told that we propose to abandon our legislative control over the subject—to call on some other department of the government to act for us—to throw the responsibility from our shoulders. What portion of the bill justifies that charge? Where will gentlemen find the proposition to commit this subject as a legislative question to the judges of the Supreme Court? I should be loath to believe that any Senator upon this floor could imagine that such would be the effect of this bill. What do you propose to refer to the supreme court? Nothing as a matter of reference. We simply leave that court to exercise its constitutional functions of determining this constitutional question. We leave the power in their hands just where the constitution placed it, and we do so because we are not competent to withdraw it. Does not the bill place the subject where no legislation but that of Congress can bear on it, and provide for the decision of any constitutional question which may lie beyond legislation, by the very authority appointed by the constitution itself for that purpose?

Sir, what would gentlemen have? Will they go for the Wilmot proviso? Will they go for the ordinance of '87? Suppose we enact them in this bill. And suppose the court should decide after all, that there was a constitutional guarantee as insisted on by my friends from the South in relation to this species of property, and that our provision is unconstitutional. Suppose further, that we extend the ordinance of '87 over these territories, and that the moment they become States they repeal it, and the question goes to the Supreme Court whether our ordinance was binding upon that people. How is my friend from New Jersey in that case, to withdraw the subject from the Supreme Court? Will he call upon them to relinquish that power? Does not every gentleman see that we have left the subject where we must leave it, and that ther eis no "evasion" here?

Mr. MILLER.—The Senator has misunderstood my argument. This bill will present the case to the Supreme Court without being accompanied by an act of Congress. I do not deny the right of the Supreme Court to decide upon the legislation of Congress; but if the bill be accompanied by an act of Congress, the Supreme Court may, in its decision, say that according to the constitution there being no act of Congress inhibiting slavery, slavery may be established in the territories, but if Congress acted on the subject, having power to do so, slavery must be prohibited.

Mr. PHELPS.—I was aware that the Senator made that distinction. But suppose both he and I are right, that this act of Congress virtually leaves in force the law of Mexico, is not that a legislative act, on the part of Congress, on the subject? If the question comes before the Supreme Court, they are informed that when these territories came into the Union they came in with such laws, and that Congress left them in force. Will not the court regard the act of Congress as a legislative determination on the the matter; and how can the gentlemen distinguish between our action negatively and our action positively? Suppose a bill introduced here to prohibit slavery in these territories, would the action of Congress add any different constitutional phase to the question? The Senator from Maine told us that every schoolboy in the country knows that the Supreme Court cannot settle a political question. Sir, call it a political question or what you please, have I not shown that the legislative power is exhausted in providing that the local law shall not be repealed; and it the constitution overrides that legislation and abrogates that law, how can we remedy the mischief? What power is there in this country that can decide the question of the constitutionality of an act of Congress unless it be the Supreme Court? No other. The only alternative is to repudiate the authority of that tribunal. But in that case we must deny the authority of the instrument itself if we deny the power delegated by it.

But it is asked by other Senators why we did not settle this question? My friend from New Jersey has told us this morning that the committee was raised to settle this difficult constitutional question. I beg leave to say that if I had supposed that I was placed on that committee with that view, I would never have troubled the committee with my presence. What, sir! a committee of the Senate raised to decide a mere judicial question, and one upon which the opinion of every member was doubtless deliberately formed. The committee was raised for the purpose of relieving the Senate from the embarrassment in which it had been placed. But to my northern friends who ask this question, I say that we have decided it as a legislative question, involving the expediency of introducing this institution into those territories, in exact conformity to their principles and mine. If, then, they believe with me in the result to which I come, why ask me why we did not settle this question? I think we have settled it for the time being, so far as legislation can settle it. But we cannot tie the hands of another Congress or bind the supreme judicial tribunal. How, then, can it be objected to the bill that it settles nothing?

Other objections have been urged; and in the course of a very eloquent speech by the Senator from Maine, we were told that this compromise is all on one side. I do not know but the Senator is right. I take the liberty of reminding the Senator, however, that if it be all on one side, he or I are the last men that ought to complain of it. If it meet the approbation of our southern friends, I, for one, have two much sense to say that I have made too good a bargain—this is an objection I have never heard in the country. But the Senator from Connecticut asked, where is the compromise? The compromise consists in this: The people of the South concede to us that we may let the territorial law stand as it is, and we concede to them that if they have any constitutional rights affected by the action of this body they may appeal to the constitutional tribunals for the ascertainment of those rights; in short, they yield to us the matter of legislation, and concede that we may enact such laws as we think exclude slavery from these territories, reserving to themselves (what we cannot deprive them of) the right to test, before the constitutional tribunal, the constitutionality of those laws.

Another objection to the bill is that the law will not be carried out—that slavery will be introduced in despite of law, that the question of freedom could not be brought before the judicial tribunals as the slave would be ignorant of his rights and also unable to enforce them.

To these objections my answer is a very short one. If the law is not to be regarded of what consequence is it what that law is? Will the Wilmot proviso or the ordinance of '87 be any better if they are not regarded? Will the slave be any better informed or better able to enforce his rights under one form of law which gives him freedom than another? What kind of law will gentlemen enact if they assume before hand that their laws will not be enforced?

Sir, if the honorable Senator from Maine thinks as I do, that the institution is now excluded, surely he will not complain that the subject is left where it is. Does he wish to change the state of things of which he approves? If it stands on a better footing than we can put it upon, by an unsuccessful attempt at the Wilmot Proviso, then by all means let it remain. But almost in the same breath in which the Senator charges us with doing nothing, he charges us with declaring that slavery shall not be prohibited, because we do not suffer the territorial legislature to act. If this were original with the Senator I should think it entitled to more consideration, but it comes from various quarters. We are admonished by the gentlemen of the press of our monstrous dereliction of duty, while none of them can give you an accurate account of the provisions and effect of the bill. Sir, we have had a great deal of declamation upon the subject. Gentlemen do not seem able, although the bill is open to their inspection, to point out its defects, or to show us how it tolerates slavery. An important argument as to the effect of the bill, an argument which goes to explain its legal import and effect, is denominated sophistry. The very gentlemen who bestowed the epithet upon it have repeated my argument word for word, and if there be sophistry then the paternity lies with them. They have agreed with me almost entirely, and yet there is something in the bill which their astuteness has not enabled them to discover, but which requires sophistry to conceal. Now, sir, I put the question, where have we indged, or endeavored to shuffle off the question. Suppose we had recommended to the Senate not to act upon it either way, but to defer it to a more favorable opportunity, it might have been said that there was a shuffling off of the question? But I ask where is the shuffling, where is the skulking in relation to it? I believe I am about the last man to be charged with skulking, for judging from present appearances, I am standing alone among my colleagues of the North in my vindication of this measure, and am perhaps rendering myself obnoxious to all the whig party in the North. Sir, I know the agitation of the question that is going on, I know how a man may become obnoxious to public feeling under the excited sensibility of that feeling. Sir, I know the opprobious epithets that may be applied. I may be hung or burnt in effigy, but, sir, having formed my opinion of the propriety of the measure, and of the expediency of stopping it, it is my duty to stand by it and vindicate those opinions, let the opinions or feelings of my friends at the North be what they may. I do not "skulk," and I tell gentlemen that although the arts of the demagogue are to be put in operation, I shall never shrink from the vindication of my own honest convictions here or elsewhere.

But what could the committee do? Here is a very important question, the most troublesome, dangerous, alarming question that has arisen since the government was established; a question more difficult of adjustment, pregnant with greater danger to our institutions, with greater danger to the harmony and prosperity of this country, than any question which has heretofore arisen, or is likely hereafter to arise. Sir, the committee have proposed the only measure which their ingenuity could devise, and if their proposition is not satisfactory, let me ask gentlemen who object to it, what it is that they would propose? It is an easy matter to find fault. Nothing was ever done right in the estimation of the world. The world itself, and man its inhabitant, were made wrong in the opinion of some modern philanthropists, but it is well for us they have not the power of making it over again. But let me conjure gentlemen who find fault, to inform us what proposition they would present. Let them tell us what is to be done. If this measure is not palatable to them, what do they propose? Sir, we have the Missouri compromise, will these gentlemen go for it? Will the Senators either of them go for it? Will the Senators from New Jersey go for it? They answer no. If they will not sustain it, will they censure the committee for not recommending what they condemn? Will they censure me for not proposing a compromise against which both they and I are committed?

Well, what else is there? The Wilmot proviso. These gentlemen will go for that. So will I. I am not behind them on that subject. But will a majority of the Senate do so? I knew, and every member of the committee knew, that if we met this question upon the ground of the Wilmot proviso, we would be voted down, and it was not my disposition to present the question to the Senate in such a form that it could not fail to be decided against me. It is not my purpose, in carrying out the principles and views of my constituents, to make up an issue in my case, which I know must be decided against me. I may be permitted, I hope, to borrow something from my personal experience. If I were about to present a case before a judge whose capacity I distrusted, or a jury in whom I had no confidence, I should feel at liberty to save my case if I could by moving for a continuance, or by changing the mere form of the issue. Knowing that the Senate could not be brought to carry out my purpose in that form, I felt at liberty to attain my object in another way, and at the same time to obtain an arrangement altogether more satisfactory to the advocates of freedom than an unfavorable decision upon the Wilmit proviso. The proposition of the committee is the only one which has been presented which affords the slightest chance of an adjustment of this matter, even for the present. I should be gratified if any gentleman of the Senate could propose anything more satisfactory. The purpose of the committee was, to extricate Congress from the difficulty in which we were placed in regard to this subject. I am well aware of the effect its agitation is likely to have throughout the country. It is a very convenient electioneering topic. My own sentiments are known, I am hostile to the institution of slavery, but I trust that my hostility is to be regulated by national and constitutional views; but my sentiments shall not be degraded by being applied to this wretched business of demagogueism or popular excitement. I caution gentlemen on this subject. Gunpowder is a very good thing to fight with, but it is dangerous to explode too much of it at once. Popular excitement is not a matter to be trafled with in this country, or in any other. All experience shows us the danger of tampering with popular feeling. There is not a page in history from the creation to the present day, more pregnant with warning than the page that is now being enacted. There is inquietude, restlessness, desire for change pervading every portion of the world. We have seen the wheels of revolution revolving in Europe, and can any one tell when those wheels will stop, or who is the last victim that shall be crushed beneath them? It is but a few days ago that we were congratulating a people upon their success thus far in the course of revolution. An individual who had spent his life over his books, unknown to the political world, sprung into political existence in a moment as the presiding officer of the provisional government of one of the most powerful and most restless people in the world; and, sir, our congratulations had hardly reached him before the revolutionary wheel which bore him triumphantly to the top, threw him from his high position into comparative insignificance and obscurity. Where will this movement, now proceeding with such tremendous power, terminate? There is but one intelligence which can predict its termination, and but one power that can control its results, and that power is not a human power. We are following in the footsteps of our fellow men in the old world; popular excitement and popular violence are not unknown in our own country. The man who endeavors to carry this excitement to extremes, and to alienate the feelings of this people from each other, to the danger and perhaps destruction of our institutions, should be careful to ascertain whether he can control the tempest upon which he attempts to ride. The history of the old world shows that the demagogue who puts in motion the passions of men and drives them to anarchy and bloodshed deposits his bones at last in one undistinguishable mass with those of his victims. And in this more peaceful hemisphere which revolution and anarchy have not yet reached, the political agitator who raises up the whirlwind of excitement finds, to say the least of him, an early political grave.

Sir, I have no particular anxiety on this subject because of any peculiar interest I may have in the agitations of the day. I know there is a disposition on the part of some to make what is called political capital, by operating upon the feelings of the masses.—How far they may be successful in this case is not for me to say. They are, I suppose, tired of old associations, and are seeking about for something new. A new political church has recently been formed which may serve as a sort of city of refuge to unfortunate politicians, but I know enough of the people of the North to know that although they may be thus played upon for the moment, yet I have sufficient confidence in their discretion, integrity, and sound judgment to believe that all this excitement will be but temporary. That they will not look upon it in the end with sober discretion at least, I have no fear. Sir, I do not intend to say that their sentiments on the subject of slavery will not be changed, but I intend to say that the excitement got up by mistaken representations of this bill, will subside—that they will in the end do the bill and do me justice—and that they will content themselves with a rational opposition to the institution without throwing themselves into the hands of the demagogue, or forming sectional distinctions which may endanger the stability of the Union. I have only to add that I shall not contribute to the production of a dangerous excitement which may tend to disturb the harmony of the Union.

I have thus expressed my views on the subject, because I have felt myself somewhat implicated. If this bill carry on its face a cowardly aspect, its authors are responsible for that aspect. But the epithet "cowardly," would be more applicable to those who watch with trembling anxiety the political vane, the turning and eddying of popular impulse—who waver in the discharge of their duty, first an honest adherence to the dictates of their own judgments and their own consciences, should expose them to a groundless censure from their political enemies, or, what is worse, to the treachery of political friends, and who are paralyzed by the slightest breath of popular disapprobation, grounded upon opinions formed without sufficient information—hotly conceived and hastily expressed.

Upon this subject I may be permitted to add another consideration. I am not responsible for bringing this agitating question upon the country. It came here by no agency of mine. The responsibility lies elsewhere. It originated in the measure of the annexation of Texas. From that measure followed the Mexican war, from that war followed this conquest, and from the conquest follows this agitating and troublesome question. I am not responsible for the origin of this difficulty, but there are men on this floor who are. The Senator from Connecticut over the way who has so liberally bestowed his denunciations upon this bill, I believe gave a casting vote in favor of that annexation. Whether he represented the opinions of his constituents on that occasion, whether he stood in awe of their instructions, whether he was in dread of their vengeance in the shape of burning in effigy, it is not for me to say. Whether it was so or not, his casting vote determined the momentous question—that casting vote brought upon us the difficulties with which we are now surrounded. Sir, if that honorable Senator, instead of bestowing these wholesale epithets of reproval upon the committee and the bill, instead of expressing his dissatisfaction in terms so offensive, had united with his former friends in bringing about a settlement of the question which he and they have brought upon us, it would have been a little more satisfactory. I call upon the Senator from Connecticut as the man responsible for the existence of this difficulty to put his shoulder to the wheel, and as he went with the honorable Senator from South Carolina and his friends on a former occasion, let him unite with those gentlemen now upon some terms of compromise or adjustment. Sir, if this subject is to be made a subject of popular excitement, and my name is to be bandied about in connection with it as an object of reproach, or if my old coat and jacket are to be stuffed with straw and burnt, I confess under these circumstances I prefer that the man who brought about this state of things, if he cannot take my place, should in at least burnish his old coat and jacket to hold to the conflagration. It required no great foresight to predict these consequences at the time of that annexation. We are now where we expected to be when we protested against it. We were driven into the measure and its consequences by some of our northern friends, whose fate it has been to stand pretty much on that occasion where I am now, alone. As they forced us into it, for Heaven's sake let them be generous enough to unite with us now in endeavoring to extricate us from the difficulty.

Mr. FITZGERALD.—I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the merits of the bill, for I have not the vanity to suppose that at this stage of the discussion I could add anything now to what has been already said on the subject. Indeed, sir, I have no great disposition to talk to the very select tailing. I have risen rather to do justice to a gentleman who resides in that for any other purpose. And I shall detain the Senate but a very few minutes. I allude, sir, to General Cass. Since the commencement of this discussion I have been appealed to by gentlemen whose political opinions may on some points differ, but who rank amongst the friends of General Cass, by whom I have been told that the vote which I was about to give or the action which I might take in regard to this matter would have a tendency to affect the election of Gen. Cass. I have been told that inasmuch as I have succeeded him in this Senate, am known to be his personal and political friend, have been placed on the electoral ticket in my own State, and have conversed with that distinguished gentleman after his return, my action would be considered as reflecting the opinions of Gen. Cass on this exciting and all-important subject. My object in rising, then, has been chiefly to declare to the Senate that I never have, verbally or otherwise, had any intimation of General Cass's opinions upon this subject that were not known to all from the declarations made in his response to the committee who notified him of his nomination. I will add that I have not received a solitary line from any citizen of my own State on this subject. I have been left by my friends there to act as my judgment shall dictate. So far I have endeavored so to act, and I shall continue to do so as long as I have the honor of a seat in this Senate. I am aware, sir, that there is a heavy responsibility resting upon me as a Senator, and not only as a Senator generally, but as coming from Michigan, and as being personally and politically the friend of Gen. Cass; but I shall shrink from no responsibility. My main object has been to know what is right in this matter—when I know that, I trust I have the moral courage to do it regardless of consequences. If we are to believe the tenth part of what we hear and see published against General Cass he certainly has sins enough of his own to bear without being responsible for any thing that I may do here.

Having stated that I am not to be regarded as, in any sort, the exponent of General Cass's opinions upon the subjects, I will now add that when the question was taken upon raising this committee, I voted against the motion, because I desired to act directly upon the Oregon bill. I believed it was an act of justice to the people of Oregon that we should do so. I was willing to meet any question that might come up. The Senate directed otherwise, and I then voted for the committee that was chosen, every one of them; and when the honorable and distinguished chairman of that committee reported the bill, I listened with great pleasure, and no inconsiderable degree of interest, to the remarks which he made, when I learned from him that the constitution of the United States was the platform upon which we would be called upon to stand in the decision of this question. I was delighted at the prospect. It appeared to me that I could see the rainbow of peace. I thought this exciting question might be disposed of without a dissolution of the Union, or the shedding of blood, as had been intimated by some gentlemen on this floor. When the motion was made to amend the bill by striking out all after the 20th section, I voted for it, still preferring that the question should be taken upon Oregon alone, and not to have it blended with New Mexico and California. I have been anxious to see this question adjusted, and although I do not approve of this bill—for there are parts of it to which I decidedly object—yet if I saw that the passage of the bill depended on my own vote, and if its passage would be the means of settling this question, though it were to cast me into political oblivion—though it were to be the last act of my political life, I would vote for the bill with pleasure. I fear, however, from what I have heard in the Senate since the introduction of the bill, that its friends are doomed to disappointment. And why, sir? A political storm is rising in the North which is destined to become a tornado before it is allayed. Gentlemen who are seeking to direct it for their own benefit may not be able to succeed; but the prospect cannot but be regarded with apprehension by every patriotic citizen. God knows what may be the result of the excitement which now prevails, and therefore I say again, that if I could feel an assurance that the passage of this bill would settle the question, though it were the last act of my life, I would vote for it. And permit me to repeat, once for all, that whatever I may say or do here, I am myself alone to be held responsible for it.

Mr. CORWIN.—Mr. President: I should scarcely undertake to assign to the Senate a reason for prolonging this debate, especially after the very elaborate and lucid exposition of the bill now before us which has been given by the Senator from Vermont; I feel compelled, however, from various considerations, with which I will not trouble the Senate, to state, in very few words, if that be possible, what my objections are to the passage of the bill; and, it may be, to offer some few observations in reply to such propositions as have been announced at various times during this debate, by Senators on the other side of the chamber. I have listened with great eagerness, since the commencement of this discussion, to every thing that has been said, with the most sincere and unfeigned desire to make myself acquainted with at least the primary elements and principles which enter into the composition of the bill. And, I think I may say, without exposing myself to the charge of egotism, that I feel as little the influences which have been spoken of by the Senator from Vermont, as it is desirable that any gentleman, acting in the capacity of a legislator, should feel. I do not participate, however, I may advertise gentlemen, in the belief which has been so constantly expressed during this discussion, that this is a subject which is likely to produce that terrible and momentous excitement that is spoken of. I believe if this principle were discussed solemnly, and, so to speak, abstractedly from those extraneous circumstances too frequently adverted to here, that we should be much more likely to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion to ourselves, and at more satisfactory results, I hope, to those who are to come after us. I have no belief that the passage of a law, such as is now before the Senate, will produce a disruption of the bonds that hold this Union together. I have no belief that the passage of the law so much deprecated by some gentlemen on this side by the name, if you please, of the "Wilmot proviso," could, by any possibility within my view, induce the southern portion of the Union, which, we are told, is so much excited on the subject, to tear themselves asunder from the constitutional compact by which we are all held together. Sir, if I entertained an opinion of this kind, I should scarcely think a seat on this floor worth possessing for a single day. I do not think the technical term spoken of by the Senator from Vermont, the "Wilmot proviso," can of itself exercise that influence upon statesmen of exalted intellect of the South, which has been intimated by gentlemen who have participated in this debate. What is this terrible Wilmot proviso, that has been erected here and elsewhere into such a raw-head and bloody-bones, to use a very expressive phrase of the nursery? What is it? Why, sir, there are about me Senators who know very well to whom the paternity of the "Wilmot proviso," as it has been recently baptized, belonged. They know that the same gentleman who drafted the declaration of independence, which is hung up in our halls and placed in our libraries, and regarded with the same reverence as our Bible—for it has become a gospel of freedom all over the world as well as in this country—drafted that which is called the "Wilmot proviso," composing as it did a section of the ordinance of 1787, and that the hand that drafted both was Jefferson's. There have been some strange misnomers in regard to acts, some strange confusion of nomenclature in this country, as in this case, when a part of the ordinance of 1787 has come to bear the appellation of the "Wilmot proviso." Sir, much as I respect that gentleman for his position upon this subject, which has connected his very name with the ordinance of 1787, I deny to him the honor of originating it. It is a piracy of the copy-right. I do not see that there is any danger that southern gentlemen, after the lapse of so many years, and after the founding of a young empire in the West, by virtue of that ordinance, will so desecrate the memory of Jefferson and spit on his grave, because we merely re-enact that ordinance over a territory which has subsequently come into our possession. I have no idea that such consequences will follow from the passage of such a law, as gentlemen have predicted. There must have been a strange revolution wrought in the minds of southern gentlemen between 1787 and 1847, if such consequences are to follow. And I could not help observing while the Senator from Vermont was expressing these noble sentiments, which every body, even those who do not feel them, must admire, telling us we should act here independently of the excitement without these walls, and that we should scorn those newspaper paragraphs in which we are villified, written by those who know little of the motives by which we are influenced, and who care less; I could not help observing that at last the Senator admonished us that there was an excitement abroad which we must allay; and to do that he agreed to this bill, although it was somewhat different from that which he desired—so that the lion-hearted Senator from Vermont has agreed to this compromise, as it is called, because there is an excitement which he wishes to allay by it. Sir, I desire to see gentlemen act and vote here as if there were no excitement on the subject. I should be very sorry, at least, to allow any influences to operate upon my deliberate judgment, except those which belong to the relation of representative and constituent. It is the farthest from my intention of any thing that can be conceived of to say any thing in regard to this bill which may wound the feelings of gentlemen who have labored so hard to produce something that would satisfy us all. The Senator from Vermont has acted as he should have acted, has acted nobly in regard to this matter, and I know very well that he will be willing to accord to me the same rule of action, the same independence that he has used; and I fear when I come to speak of the bill, I shall be under the necessity of availing myself of what the gentleman has called a "special demurrer;" for I do not think there is such pressing necessity for the passage of the bill, as to oblige us to forego the statement of such objections as we may entertain. Suppose you enact no law, what will happen? Oregon has for many years taken care of herself, and I believe on one or two occasions made better laws for herself than she is likely to get at our hands. She has taken care of herself ever since she became an integral portion of the Union, by the settlement of the dispute between us and Great Britain. How the new provinces may fare, what may happen to New Mexico and California in the intermediate time which will elapse, if we should not be able to act upon this matter at the present session, is not a matter of much concern or apprehension with me, because I know they have been in your custody for a year or two, and have not complained at all for the want of legal enactments; they have only complained that you have made too free use of gunpowder. Rather than not act in the matter fully and definitively, as I would if there were no emergency, I would allow those provinces to take care of themselves for another twelve months, and come here at the beginning of a new session, ready to act upon the subject as my judgment should dictate.

Now, sir, in the first place, I understand we have a message from the President, although I believe it has not been adverted to by any one calling upon us to designate the boundaries of these territories of New Mexico and California; and another branch of the legislature has been anxiously looking to the geography of those countries, and tracing their history, and are as yet incapable of determining where Texas ends and New Mexico begins; and they have been under the necessity of applying to the Chief Magistrate to give them a lesson in geography. What the substance of the information they have received was I do not know, but I have been informed, upon the floor of the Senate, that Texas extends to the banks of the Rio Grande.

If this be so, I must be permitted to look to the gentlemen of the committee for information as to how much is left for New Mexico, what extent of territory, and what amount of population? Is it worth while to establish a territorial government there, if it be true that Texas extends to the Rio Grande? I think it will be found that there will be but a fragment of New Mexico left, so far as population is concerned. It will be very convenient, perhaps, to attach it to the government of California. If you send your governors and other officers there without establishing the boundaries, there will be a conflict of territorial jurisdiction. Is it not expedient to settle it now, when you are founding new governments there, and placing side by side institutions which may be very dissimilar? It is perfectly certain that Texas will extend her laws to the Rio Grande; and if she does, she will comprehend within her jurisdiction a large proportion of the population of what was formerly New Mexico. Here, then, is my special demurrer. Under other circumstances, I am sure the Senator from Vermont would agree with me that it is indispensable to the governments which we are about to establish, that the limits of their jurisdiction should be defined, although I do not know that this would be an insuperable objection with me, if the other portions of the bill were such as I could give my assent to.

And now I intend, in a few words, to state why I object to this compromise bill. Sir, there is no one—there can be no one—who does not desire that every subject of legislation which comes before the Senate should be settled harmoniously, and, if it might be so, with the unanimous concurrence of every Senator. But, sir, in my judgment, with this subject as it stands before us, it would be arrogant presumption to undertake to vote upon this bill, with a question before us which we unde transfitake to er to the judiciary department of the country. How is this? Is it not a new thing in your legislation when a system of policy is proposed and the constitutional propriety of that policy is questioned, to pass an act for the purpose of getting a decision before the Supreme Court, that that court may instruct the Senate of the United States as to constitutional duty in the matter? Sir, if we know certainly what that law will be, need there be any hesitancy how we shall vote upon this bill? Can any one suppose that the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from South Carolina, if they believed that the litigation that is proposed by this bill to be brought into the judicial tribunals of the country would result to their determination of what the law should be, that they would be in favor of such a bill as this? Does any one believe that if the Senator from Vermont could anticipate that the Supreme Court of the United States might decide that Congress, being silent upon the subject, had allowed slavery to pass, at its pleasure into these newly acquired territories, and to become parts of the municipal institutions of those territories, and to decide also, that if Congress had enacted a prohibitory law, it could not have gone there, he would vote for this bill? Certainly he would not. Is there any necessity that there should be a prohibitory law passed, in order that the question of slavery should be presented with the aid of Congressional legislation to the Supreme Court of the United States? I will not undertake to say that I differ with the Senator from Vermont in a single legal proposition that he has laid down. I regard slavery as a local institution. I believe it rests on that basis, as the only one that can give a moment's security. I believe it cannot he carried. by the power of the master over his servant, one inch beyond the territorial limits of the power that makes the law. I believe that a slave carried by his master into the territory about which we are talking, if slavery be abolished there, will be free from the moment he enters the territory, and any attempt to exercise power over him as a slave will be nugatory. That is my judgment. But I would guard against any doubt on this subject. I would so act that there should be nothing left undone on my part to prevent the admission of slaves, for I am free to declare, that if you were to acquire the country that lies under the line, the hottest country to be found on the globe, where the white man is supposed not to be able to work, I would not allow you to take slaves there. if slavery did not exist there already. More than that: I would abolish it if I could, if it did exist. These are my opinions, and they have always have been the same. I know they were the opinions of Washington up to the hour of his death; and they were the opinions of Jefferson and of others who, in the infancy of the institution, saw and deplored its evils, and deprecated its continuance, and would have taxed themselves to the utmost to exterminate it then. I possess no opinion on the subject that I have not derived from these sources.

I have only to say, that these opinions have always received the concurrence of my own understanding, and this, after the most careful investigation I have been able to give the subject. I find the institution of slavery existing in several States of the Union—it is a local, a State institution, existing under the guaranties of the constitution. I find that, as a legislator of this national government, I am forbidden by the constitution to act upon this or any other merely State institution. I cannot, therefore, interfere with slavery in the States as I can in a territory, where as yet no State sovereignty exists, and as I will there, and would every where else on the face of the earth, where I am not forbidden, and where my power might extend. And here sir, I ask what has been your practice as a government on this subject? If at any time in your progress since 1789, you have acquired territory where slavery existed in such form and consistency as to make it now difficult to overthrow it, it has been permitted, only permitted, to remain where by law it did exist; as in the northwestern territory before 1789, but had not taken a deep root, it was expelled; and as in the Missouri compromise, excluding it in all territory north of latitude 36° 30′ after 1820.

When Louisiana was acquired, such was the tone of public opinion then against slavery, that I am sure the men of that day would have abolished it there, but for the supposed evil of displacing a system long established, on which and by which the social and political systems of the country were necessarily formed. Perhaps, also, the terms of the treaty were with some an obstacle. The same men who directed public opinion in 1787 in a great measure controlled it in 1804. Jefferson, who was the author of the ordinance of 1787, was President in 1804, when Louisiana was acquired. By his influence, the ordinance of 1787 made five free States in the northwest, and I doubt not Louisiana would have been also freed from slavery too, but for the reasons I have assigned. Such were the views of men who directed public opinion then; would to God they, or such as they, had more to with public opinion now.

When the ample patrimony of Virginia was transferred to the confederacy, Jefferson and those associated with him in the noble donation, at once declared that slavery should not pollute the soil of five rich and powerful new States. Such was Virginia, such was American opinion then. I cannot suppose the opinions of those men were so changed between 1787 and 1804 that slavery at the latter period would be spared by them, except for the reasons I have assigned already. Liberty, perfect freedom to all men of all colors and all races, was the motto of Virginia, and I am told he is now the southern extreme leader of free principles to the end of the world. Virginia, as well as Jefferson, is dead.

Why, there is scarcely a Virginian who would venture to give an opinion contrary to the principles I have just expressed. And it is so that we are even to be required for the sake of some imaginary balance of power, to extend slavery over territory where it does not now exist? That, sir, is the question propounded by this bill. The Senator from Vermont is satisfied that slavery cannot be extended to these territories. I believe, if his confidence in the judicial tribunals of the country were well founded, that slavery could not possibly go into the territories, provided the Senate is right both in law and the facts. I ask every member of the Senate—perhaps I may be less informed than any—whether slavery does not exist by some Mexican law, at this hour, in California?

Mr. HANNEGAN. (in his seat.)—It does exist, peon slavery exists there.

Mr. CORWIN.—I would thank the Senator from Indiana if he will inform me what peon slavery is; and really I ask the question for the purpose of obtaining information. I desire to know its conditions. Is it transmissible by inheritance? Does the marvellous doctrine of which the honorable Senator from Virginia spoke of as being part and parcel of the law adopted in Virginia—partus sequitur ventrem—prevail? Is that holy ordinance, that the offspring of the woman or her who is a slave must necessarily be slaves also, there recognized.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—As I understand, slavery exists in California and New Mexico, as it does throughout the republic of Mexico, and is termed peon slavery—slavery for debt, by which the creditor has a right to hold the debtor through all time in a far more absolute bondage than that by which any southern planter holds his slaves here.

Mr. CORWIN.—So it has been described to me. I have not seen the Mexican laws upon the subject, but the statement just made agrees with that of many gentlemen who profess to know something on the subject, and therefore I am inclined to think that it is so, and that these people are the subjects of that infernal law. The Senator from Delaware the other day informed us that the committee have not given to the people of California and New Mexico the right of suffrage, because they were incapable of exercising it—because a large portion of them were of the colored races. Now, supposing that to be the case, and supposing the proposition to be submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States—was slavery an institution of New Mexico?—what would be the answer? If the Senator from Indiana were there to make response, he would reply in the affirmative; he would say that the institution of slavery was there—that to be sure it had its modifications and its peculiarities, but that it was still slavery, though there might have existed a law as strong as that glorious principle of free government spoken of by the Senator from Virginia—partus sequitur ventrem. If, sir, these three Latin words can condemn to everlasting slavery the posterity of a woman who is a slave, may not that municipal regulation of which we are now speaking in California and New Mexico, with equal propriety be denominated slavery? I find, then, slavery, as it is called, existing here to a degree, and to all practical purposes as lasting and inexorable as in the State of Virginia; and therefore the whole of the hypothesis of the gentleman from Vermont falls to the ground as a matter of fact, inasmuch as the Supreme Court will decide that slavery existed there, and that therefore the whole slave population of the United States may be transferred to that country.

Mr. PHELPS.—The gentleman will excuse me, I spoke of African slavery.

Mr. CORWIN.—Of that I am aware. I speak now of the general proposition. Now, this is a very curious spectacle presented this day and for weeks past in the American Congress, and one cannot help pausing at this point, and reflecting upon the events of the last few years. On looking back at what has happened to that period, I am sure that the magnanimous spirit of the Senator from South Carolina himself will be obliged to concede to the northern States at least some apology for the slight degree of excitement on this subject. His hypothesis is, that to every portion of this newly acquired territory—California not excepted—every slaveholder in the United States has a right to migrate to-morrow, and carry with him his slaves—holding them there forever, subject only to the abolition of slavery when these territories shall be made into States, and come into the Union. What, then, would be those few chapters in our history? We find ourselves now in the possession of territories with a population of one hundred and fifty thousand souls, if I am correctly informed, in California and New Mexico. The best authenticated history of the social institutions of that population informs us that there exists there at this moment a species of slavery as absolute and inexorable as exists anywhere on the face of the earth; and that about five in six of the population of that country are subjected to the iron rule of this abominable institution there.

Now, I do not expect that any man will rise up and say that because an individual happens to be the debtor of another, he shall have his own person sold into slavery; and not only that, but that the curse shall extend—worse than that of the Hebrew, not to the third and fourth generation, but to the remotest posterity of that unfortunate man. Nobody will pretend to rise up in defence of such a proposition as that. Now, then, I will give over the criticism. Suppose there is a law in New Mexico, which obliges a man to work all the days of his life for another, because he happens to owe him five dollars, by some means contrived by the creditor to keep him always his debtor. Do you intend that that law shall exist there for an hour? Well, you have made a law here, that your law-makers who are to go to New Mexico and California shall not touch the subject of slavery; and if that which is designated in the popular language of the day slavery, exists there, do you indeed send abroad, as you promised to do, your missionary of liberty? You went there with the sword, and made it red in the blood of these people! What did you tell them? "We come to give you freedom!" Instead of that you enact in your code here, bloody as that of Draco—that there shall be judges and lawgivers over them, but that they shall make no law touching that slavery to which five out of six of them are subjected.

Mr. President, this chapter in your history furnishes instructive matter for our consideration. It is a strange act in the great drama of what we call progress. I have looked upon it with some concern. I was one of those who predicted that this, or something like this, would be the result of your Mexican war. I always believed, notwithstanding your denials here, that you made war upon Mexico for the purpose and with the intention of conquest. I ventured to predict just what we now see, that acquisition of territory would follow the war as its consequence, and its object was that, and nothing else; and that this very question would arise, and arise here, to distract your councils, disunite your people, and threaten, as we are now told it does, that peace which you thought of so lightly when war was so wantonly waged against Mexico. It now seems your pretensions were all hypocritical from the beginning. You said your armed men went forth as they in the spirit of love. You pretended their mission was not conquest, but to set free the captive, to raise up the prostrate peon of that country—and now what follows? As soon as your arms have subdued the country, the gentle note of the dove is changed to the lion's roar. Instead of the proper blessing of peace to your conquered subjects, you propose to leave the chains of the peon untouched, and now gravely contend that negro slavery shall be superadded to slavery for debt. This is your improvement, this your progress in Mexico. To exalt the miserable peon, you give him the enslaved negro for association and example. Sir, this is indeed a spectacle worth noting, in this bright noon of the nineteenth century.

We proclaimed to the world we would take nothing by conquest. This was our solemn hypocritical declaration for two dark years, while our progress was marked by blood, while the march of your power was like another people of old, by clouds of smoke in the day, and fire by night. City after city fell beneath the assaults of your gallant army, and still you ceased not to declare you would take nothing by conquest. Now you say this territory was conquered, was acquired by the common blood of our common country. You trace back the consideration which you have paid for this country to the blood and the bones of the gallant men that you sent there to be sacrificed; and pointing to the unburied corses of her sons who have fallen there, the South exclaims—"These, these constitute my title to carry my slaves to that land!" It was purchased by the blood of my sons." The aged parent, bereft of his children, and the widow with the family that remains, desire to go there to better their fortunes, if it may be, and pointing to the graves of husband and children, exclaim, "There, there was the price paid for our proportion of this territory!" Is that true? If that could be made out—if you dare put that upon your record—if you can assert that you hold the country by the strong hand, then you have a right to go there with your slaves. If we of the North have united with you of the South in an expedition of piracy, and robbery, and murder, that oldest law known among men—"Honesty among thieves"—requires us to divide it with you equally.

If, indeed, Mr. President, we have no other right than that which force gives us to these our new possessions; if, indeed, we have slaughtered fifty thousand of God's creatures only to subject to our power one hundred and fifty thousand of an alien, enslaved, and barbarous people, it is but a fitting finale to all this to rivet yet closer the chain of personal slavery upon the Mexican peon, and people your possessions thus acquired by slaves. I repeat, that this right of conquest applied to territory, is the same—no other and no better than that by which originally one man could claim to hold another in slavery. It is but the right, if right it may be called, of the strongest—the law in both cases is simply the law of force. You march over a country, wrest it by war from its owner, and say to the vanquished possessor, this is now mine. I have seized your property. I hold it by the law of force. And so originally the slave dealer seized the negro in his African home, slaughtered in combat part of his family, bound the rest in chains, brought them here, and sold them. It is simply power, and not right, in both cases, that makes the claim. I repeat, it seems indeed fitting and in character, that the two should accompany each other.

As in the case of lands thus acquired, long possession and continued acquiescence (in the judgments of men) ripen the claim into legal right, so in the case of legal slavery, the captive, originally held only by force, in time, by the law of men, and by the judgment of men, becomes property!! And we are told by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] that the posterity of such become property only through the magical influence of these words, Roman words: "Partus sequitur ventrem"—"The child follows the condition of its mother." Admirable—philosophical—rational—Christian maxim!!! If the mother be captured in war, it seems then the will of a just God, "whose tender mercies are over all his works, that her offspring to the remotest time shall be doomed to slavery. What sublime morality! What lovely justice combine to sanctify this article in that new decalogue of freedom which we say, it is our destiny to give to the world "Partus sequitur ventrem!" Why, it is said to be "common law." Alas, Mr. President, it is but too "common," as we see. This right of conquest over land is the same as that by which a man may hold another in bondage. You may make it into a law if you please; you may enact that it may be so, it may be convenient to do so; after perpetrating the original sin, it may be well to do so. But the case is not altered; the source of the right remains unchanged. What is the meaning of the old Roman word servus? I profess no skill in philological learning, but I can very well conceive that somebody, looking into his thing, might understand what was the law in those days. The man's life was saved when his enemy conquered him in battle. He became servus—the man preserved by his magnanimous foe; and perpetual slavery was then thought to be a boon preferable to death. That was the way in which slavery began. Has anybody found out on the face of the earth a man fool enough to give himself up to another, and beg him to make him his slave? I do not know of one such instance under Heaven. Yet it may be so. Still I think that not one man of our complexion of the Caucassian race could be found quite willing to do that!

Thus far we have been brought after having fought for this country and conquered it. The solemn appeal is made to us—"Have we not mingled our blood with yours in acquiring this country?" But did we mingle our blood with yours for the purpose of wresting this country by force from this people? That is the question. You did not say so six months ago. You dare not say so now! You may say that it was purchased, as Louisiana, or as Florida was, with the common treasure of the country; and then we come to the discussion of another proposition: What right do you acquire to establish slavery there? But I was about to ask of some gentleman—the Senator from South Carolina, for instance—whose eye at a glance has comprehended the history of the world, what he supposes will be the impression abroad of our Mexican war, and these, our Mexican acquisitions, if we should give to them the direction which he desires? I do not speak of the propriety of slave labor being carried anywhere. I will waive that question entirely. What is it of which the Senator from Vermont has told us this morning, and of which we have heard so much during the last three weeks? And how will our history read by the side of that? Every gale that floats across the Atlantic comes freighted with the death-groans of a King; every vessel that touches your shores, bears with her tidings that the captives of the old world are at last becoming free—that they are seeking, through blood and slaughter—blindly and madly, it may be—but nevertheless resolutely—deliverance from the fetters that have held them in bondage. Who are they? Almost the whole of Europe. And it is only about a year ago, I believe, that the officer of the Turkish Empire who holds sway in Tunis, one of the old slave markets of the world, whose prisons formerly received those of our people taken upon the high seas and made slaves to their captors—announced to the world that all should there be free. And, if I am not mistaken, it will be found that this magic line which the Senator from South Carolina believes has been drawn around the globe which we inhabit, with the view of separating freedom and slavery—36° 30′, brings us very near Tunis into that region in which some supposed, by ordinance of nature, men are to be held in bondage! All over the world the air is vocal with the shouts of men rece[illegible]. What does it all mean? It means that they have been redeemed from political servitude; and in God's name I ask, if it be a boon to mankind to be free from political servitude, must it not be accepted as matter of some gratulation that they have been relieved from personal servitude—absolute subjection to the arbitrary power of others? What do we say of them? I am not speaking of the propriety of this thing; it may be all wrong, and these poor fellows in Paris, who have stout hands and willing hearts, anxious to earn their bread, may be very unreasonable in fighting for it. It may be all wrong to cut off the head of a King, or send him across the channel. It may be highly improper and foolish in Austria to send away Metternich, and say, "we will look into this business ourselves." According to the doctrine preached in these halls—in free America—instead of sending shouts of gratulation across the water to these people, we should send to them groans and commiseration for their folly, calling on them to beware how they take this business into their own hands—telling them that universal liberty is a curse; that as one man is born with a right to govern an empire, he and his posterity must continue to exercise that power, because in this case it is not exactly partus sequitur ventrem, but partus sequitur patrem—that is all the difference. The crown follows the father! Under your law, the chain follows the mother!

Sir, we may, we ought to remember, that it was law in this country in 1776, that Kings had a right to rule us, did rule us. George III. said then "partus sequitur patrem," my son inherits my crown, "he follows the condition of the father," "he is born to be your ruler;" your fathers said, this is not true, this shall be law no longer. Let us look for a moment at the doings of that good old time, 1776. Then, sir, our fathers, being oppressed, lifted up their hands and appealed to the God of justice, the common father of all men, to deliver them and their posterity from that law, which proclaimed that "Kings were born to rule." They (the men of 1776) did not believe that one man was born "booted and spurred" to ride another. And if, as they said, no man was born to rule another, did it not follow, that no man could rightfully be born to serve another? Sir, in those days, Virginia and Virginia's sons, Washington and Jefferson, had as little respect for that maxim, partus sequitur ventrem, as for that other cognate dogma, "Kings are born to rule." I infer from our history, sir, that the men of that day were sincere men, earnest, honest men, that they meant what they said. From their declaration "all men are born equally free," I infer that, in their judgments, no man, by the law of his nature, was born to be a slave; and, therefore, he ought not by any other law to be born a slave. I think this maxim of Kings being born to rule, and others being born only to serve, are both of the same family, and ought to have gone down to the same place whence I imagine they came, long ago, together. I do not think that your partus sequitur ventrem had much quarter shown it at Yorktown on a certain day you may remember. I think that when the lion of England crawled in the dust, beneath the talons of your eagles, and Cornwallis surrendered to George Washington, that maxim, that a man is born to rule, went down, not to be seen among us again forever; and I think that partus sequitur ventrem, in the estimation of all sensible men, should have disappeared along with it. So the men of that day thought. And we are thus brought to the proper interpretation of the language of those men which has been criticised by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. President, it is worth while to inquire what were the publicly expressed opinions of the leading men and States, as to the policy of negro slavery, from the year 1774 up to the year 1787, and from thence up to the final adoption of the constitution, in 1789. And, first, how was it in the old Commonwealth—Virginia:

"June, 1774.—At a general meeting of the freeholders and others of Prince George's county, Virginia, the following resolves were unanimously agreed to, among others:

"Resolved, That the African trade is injurious to this colony. [illegible] Resolved, That the purchase of all imported slaves ought to be associated against."—(Do., p. 541.)

"At a meeting of the freeholders and other inhabitants of the county of Culpeper, in Virginia, on the [illegible] day of June, 1774 [illegible] the following resolutions were unanimously agreed to:

"Resolved, That the African trade is [illegible] Prince George's county.]—(American Archives, vol. 1, p. 530.)

July 14, 1774, at a meeting of the freeholders [illegible] Virginia:

"Resolved, That the African trade is injurious to this colony, &c.; and, therefore, that the purchase of all imported slaves ought to be associated against."—(Do., p. 541.)

July 16, 1774, at a meeting of Surry [illegible]

"[illegible] That the [illegible] to all those [illegible] and [illegible] we will no [illegible] Virginia [illegible]"—(American Archives, 4th series, vol. 1, p. 593.)

"At a general meeting of the freeholders and other inhabitants of the county of Fairfax, on Monday, the 18th day of July, 1774, George Washington [illegible] in the chair:

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this meeting, that, during our present difficulties [illegible] continent; and we take this opportunity of declaring our most earnest wishes to see [illegible]

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this meeting, that a solemn covenant and association [illegible]"—(American Archives, 4th series, vol. 1, p. 690.)

George Washington, Mr. President, was the presiding officer at one of these meetings. Certain young men here may have heard something of this George Washington! He was then a farmer of Fairfax. What he did after that meeting, shall be known, remembered, and revered, by a world, thousands of years to come, long after you and I, and all of us, have been food for worms.

Similar meetings were held, and similar resolutions passed, in the following counties in Virginia: In Hanover, on the 20th July, 1774; in Princess Ann, in July of the same year. I extract from the same volume of American Archives the following, which, from Mr. Jefferson's connexion with it, becomes important.

At a very full meeting of delegates from the different counties in the Colony and Dominion of Virginia, begun "in Williamsburg, the 1st day of August, 1774, the following association was unanimously agreed to." I omit, Mr. President, all not bearing upon the subject of slavery, and quote only the following:

"We will not ourselves import, nor purchase any slave or slaves imported by any other person, [illegible] Africa, the West Indies, [illegible]

It seems Mr. Jefferson was a delegate to this convention, but was prevented by sickness from attending. He however addressed a letter to the convention, which I commend to the especial attention of gentlemen from the South, who object so strongly to the expression of opinions as to slavery here. Mr. Jefferson, in one paragraph in his letter to the convention, writes thus, on the subject of negro slavery—

"The abolition of slavery is the present object of desire in these colonies, where it was unhappily introduced in their infant state."

Mark these words, Mr. President. He complains that slavery was introduced into our American colonies in their "infant state." Would Mr. Jefferson, were he here to-day, and slavery to be in fant colonies of Oregon, New Mexico, and California? But Mr. Jefferson goes on to say—

"But previous to the enfranchisement of the slaves we have, it is necessary to exclude all further importations from Africa; but our repeated attempts to effect this by prohibitions, and by imposing duties which might amount to prohibition, have hitherto been defeated by his Majesty's negative; thus preferring the immediate advantage of a few African corsairs to the lasting interests of the American States, and to the rights of human nature, deeply wounded by this infamous practice."

Here we see proofs undeniable that Mr. Jefferson, the leading spirit then, confidently anticipated, not the continuance and further extension of slavery, but its abolition; and, in order to the speedy "enfranchisement" of the slaves then in Virginia, he desires to prevent their augmentation, by prohibiting their importation. He complains that slavery was prejudicial to the "infant" colony of Virginia. Were he here, would he not vote to exclude slavery from the "infant" colonies of Oregon, New Mexico, and California? We have seen that he drafted the clause against slavery in the ordinance of 1787. We know he remained unchanged till his death.

How stood public opinion, Mr. President, in the year 1775, in the State of Georgia? From the proceedings of a patriotic association in Georgia at that time, called the "Darien committee," I take the following:

"We, [illegible] Congress, [illegible] county of [illegible] Georgia, [illegible] of the inhabitants [illegible] do resolve—

"5. To show the world that we are not influenced by any contracted or interested motives, but moved by philanthropy for all mankind, of whatever climate, language, or complexion, we hereby declare our disapprobation and abhorrence of the unnatural practice of slavery in America, (however the uncultivated state of our country, or other [illegible] may have rendered it necessary among us,) a practice founded in [illegible] and highly dangerous to our liberties, (as well as lives,) debasing part of our fellow-[illegible] to the latest posterity) upon a very wrong foundation. We, therefore, resolve at all times to use our utmost endeavors for the manumission of our slaves in this colony, upon [illegible] for the welfare and happiness [illegible]"—(American Archives, vol. 1, p. 1136.)

From these papers, as well as the general history of the times, we can see what the fathers thought on this subject. May I not, with profound respect, suggest that these papers, dated in 1774 and 1775, explain to us the meaning of the declaration of independence, adopted in 1776. Surely, the men who voted the foregoing resolutions in 1775, might, very consistently, in 1776, declare as they did—"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Well might these men, with their hearts purified from selfishness by the dreadful conflict which then was seen to be inevitable, feel that all men were equal before God, in whom alone they could trust for aid in that dark hour, and that therefore all men were or ought to be masters of themselves, and answerable only to the Creator for the use they should make of that liberty—well might those brave good old men, after such a declaration, look up calmly and hopefully to the heavens and declare: "And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

Mr. President, these men, when they spoke of slavery and its extension, did not get up some hybrid sort of "compromise," and consult some Supreme Court. They declared slavery an evil, a wrong, a prejudice to free colonies, a social mischief, and a political evil; and if these were denied, they replied, "These truths are self-evident." And from the judgments of men they appealed to no earthly court; they took an appeal "to the Supreme Judge of the world." When I am asked to extend to this new empire of ours, now in its infancy, an institution which they pronounced an evil to all communities; when I refuse to agree with some here whose judgments I revere, and whose motives I know to be pure, I can only say, I stand where our fathers stood of old, I am sustained in my position by the men who founded the first system of national liberty on earth. With them by my side, I can afford to differ with those here whom I respect. With such authority for my conduct, I can cheerfully encounter the frowns of some, the scorn of all; I can turn to the fathers of such, and be comforted. They knew what was best for an infant people just struggling into existence. If their opinions are worth anything—if the opinions of the venerated men are to be considered as authority—I ask southern gentlemen what they mean when they ask me to extend slavery to the distant shores of the Pacific ocean, and the slave trade betwen Maryland and Virginia and that almost unknown country.

I am considering the propriety of doing this thing as if the question were now for the first time presented to us. I ask any southern man, if there were not a slave on this continent, would you send your ships to Africa, and bring them here? Suppose this confederation of ours had been formed before a slave existed in it, and suppose here, in the year of grace 1850, you had acquired California and New Mexico, and you were told that there existed a modified system of slavery there, and that they wanted laborers there, would a Senator rise in his place and say, we will authorize the African slave trade, in order to introduce laborers into our infant colonies? If you would not bring them from the shores of Africa—buying them with some imagined "partus sequitur ventrem" branded on them somewhere, how can you prove to me that it would be right to transfer them from Maryland or Virginia, 3,000 miles, to the shores of the Pacific? If slavery were a curse to you in the beginning, but struck its roots so deep into your social and municipal system as was then said, that it could not be eradicated entirely, how is it that you call upon me, as a matter of conscience and duty, to transfer this curse to an area of square miles greatly exceeding that of the thirteen States, when the confederation was formed? If it is so that it is an evil—and do all you statesmen have pronounced it, and so all your eminent men, with the exception of a few in modern times, have regarded it—how is it that you call upon me to extend it to those vast dominions which you have recently acquired? Is it true that I am obliged to receive into my family a man with the small-pox or leprosy, that they may be infected? I know you do not consider it in that light now. But the gentleman from Virginia has said that it must be done. Why? Because it is companion to the slave. He cannot be manured in Virginia; your lands are worn out. Sir, that statement sounded ominous in my ears. It gave rise to some reflection. Why are your lands worn out? Are the lands of Pennsylvania worn out? Are those of Connecticut worn out? Is not Massachusetts more productive to-day than when the foot of the white man was first impressed upon her soil? Your lands are worn out, because the slave has turned pale the land wherever he has set down his black foot! It is slave labor that has done all this. And must we then extend to these territories that which produces sterility wherever it is found, till barren desolation shall cover the whole land? If you call upon me, as a matter of compassion, to send the slave to California and Oregon, you call upon me by the same sacred obligation to receive him into Ohio as a slave; and I would be just as much bound, as a citizen of Ohio, to say that the constitution should be so construed as to admit slaves there, because they have made the land in Virginia barren, and they and their masters were perishing, till Ohio had also become a wilderness. That reason will not do. Sensitive as Ohio may appear to the morbid benevolence spoken of—with which I have no sympathy at all—we can see through that—the citizens of Ohio cannot accept these men upon such terms.

What is there in the way, then, of my giving an intelligent vote on this subject? Nothing at all. I would take this bill in a moment, if I had faith in the processes through which that law is to pass until it becomes a law in the chamber below. But I have not that faith, and I will tell the gentleman why. It is a sad commentary upon the perfection of human reason, that with but very few exceptions, gentlemen coming from a slave State—and I think I have one behind me who ought always to be before me—[MR. BADGER,] with a very few exceptions, all eminent lawyers on this floor from that section of the country, have argued that you have no right to prohibit the introduction of slavery into Oregon, California, and New Mexico; while, on the other hand, there is not a man, with few exceptions, (and some highly respectable,) in the free States, learned or unlearned, clerical or lay, who has any pretensions to legal knowledge, but believes in his conscience that you have a right to prohibit slavery. Is not that a curious commentary upon that wonderful thing called human reason?

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—It is regulated by a line!

Mr. CORWIN.—Yes, by 36 deg. 30 min., and what is black on one side of the line is white on the other, turning to jet black again when restored to its original locality. How is that? Can I have confidence in the Supreme Court of the United States, when my confidence fails in Senators around me here? Do I expect that the members of that body will be more careful than the Senators from Georgia and South Carolina to form their opinions without any regard to selfish considerations? Can I suppose that either of these gentlemen, or the gentleman from Georgia on the other side of the chamber, [Mr. JOHNSON,] or the learned Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] who thought it exceedingly wrong that we should attempt to restrain the Almighty in the execution of His purposes, as revealed to us by Noah—can I suppose that these Senators, with all the terrible responsibilities which press upon us when engaged in legislating for a whole empire, came to their conclusions without the most anxious deliberation? And yet, on one side of the line, in the slave States, the constitution reads yea, while on the other, after the exercise of an equal degree of intelligence, calmness, and deliberation, in the free States the constitution is made to read nay.

I admire the Supreme Court of the United States as a tribuual. I admire the wisdom which contrived it. I rejoice in the good consequences to this republic from the exercise of its functions. I also revere the Senate of the United States. Here is the most august body in the world, they say, composed of men who have wasted the midnight oil from year to year—men who in cloisters, in courts, in legislative halls, have been reaping the fruits of ripe experience, and suddenly their mighty intellects, able to scan everything, however minute, and comprehend everything, however grand, utterly fail them, and they kneel down in dumb insignificance, and implore the Supreme Court to read the constitution for them. I think the Senator from South Carolina must have had some new light upon the subject within the last few years, and that several of my democratic friends on all sides of the chamber must have been smitten with new love for the power and wisdom of the Supreme Court. Do you remember the case adverted to by the Senator from New Jersey to-day? I recollect very well when we did not stop to inquire how the Supreme Court had decided or ordained. It had decided, with John Marshal at its head as a most able legislative conference upon the subject of constitutional law have always had with me as much weight as the well-considered opinion of almost any other man—that Congress had power to establish just such a bank as you had; but with what infinite scorn did democratic gentlemen—Jackson democrats as they choose to be called—curl their lips when referred to that decision of the Supreme Court. Then the cry was, "We are judges for ourselves; we make no law unless we have the power to enact it." Now, however, the doctrine is, that there is one only tribunal competent to put the matter at rest forever. We are to thank God, that though all should fail, there is an infallible depository of truth, and it lives once a year for three months, in a little chamber below us! We can go there. Now, I understand my duty here to be, to ascertain what constitutional power we have; and when I have ascertained that, I act without reference to what the Supreme Court may do—for they have yet furnished no guide on the subject—but to what the Supreme Court ought to conform with us. I agree with gentlemen who have been so lofty in their encomiums upon that court, that their decision, whether right or wrong, controls our action. But we have not hitherto endeavored to ascertain what the Supreme Court would do. I wish next to ascertain in what mode this wonderful response is to be obtained—not from the Delphic Oracle, but from that infallible divinity, the Supreme Court. How is it to be done? A gentleman starts from Baltimore, in Maryland, with a dozen black men, who have been slaves; he takes them to California, 3,000 miles off. Now, I don't know how it may be in other parts of the world, but I know that in the State of Ohio we do not travel 3,000 miles to get justice. What, then, is the admirable contrivance in this bill by which we can get at the meaning of the constitution? It seems the meaning of the constitution is to be forever hidden from us until light shall be given by the Supreme Court. Sir, this bill seems to me a rich and rare legislative curiosity. It does not enact "a law," which I had supposed the usual function of legislation. No, sir; it only enacts a "lawsuit." So we virtually enact, that when the Supreme Court say we can make law, then we have made it!

But, sir, to have a fair trial of this question, so as to make it effectual to keep slaves out of our territories, all must admit this trial should be had before slaves have become numerous there. If slavery goes there and remains there for one year, according to all experience, it is eternal. Let it but plant its roots there, and the next thing you will hear will be earnest appeals about the rights of property. It will be said: "The Southern planter walked on right to come here. The House of Representatives, a body of gentlemen elected from all parts of the country, on account of their sagacity and legal attainments, did not prohibit us from coming here. I thought I had a right to come here; the Senator from South Carolina said I had a right to come; the learned ex-Senator from Georgia said that I had a right to come here, knowledge-league said that it was a right secured to me somewhere high up in the clouds, and not belonging to the world; the Senator from Mississippi said it was the ordinance of Heaven, sanctified by decrees and revealed through prophesy. Am I not, then, to enjoy the privileges thus so fully sanctioned?" I have property here; several of my women have borne children, who have partus sequitur ventrem born with them: they are my property." Thus the appeal will be made to their fellow-citizens around them; and it will be asked whether you are prepared to strike down the property which the settler in those territories has thus acquired? That will be the case, unless the negro from Baltimore, when he gets there and sees peons there—slaves not by hereditary taint, but by a much better title—a verdict before a justice of the peace—should determine to avail himself of the admirable facilities afforded him by this bill for gaining his freedom. Suppose my friend from New Hampshire, when he goes home, gets up a meeting and collects a fund for the purpose of sending a missionary after these men; and when the missionary arrives there, he proposes to hold a prayer meeting; he gets up a meeting, as they used to do in Yankee times, "for the improvement of gifts." He goes to the negro quarter of this gentleman from Baltimore, and says: "Come I want this brother; it is true he is a son of Ham, but I want to instruct him that he is free." I am very much inclined to think that the missionary would fare very much as one did in South Carolina, at the hands of him from Baltimore. This bill supposes the negro is to start all at once into a free Anglo-Saxon in California—the blood of liberty flowing in every vein, and its divine impulses throbbing in his heart. He is to say: "I am free; I am a Californian; I bring the right of habeas corpus with me." At last he is brought up on a writ of habeas corpus—before whom? Very likely one of those gentlemen who have been proclaiming that slavery has a right to go there; for such are the men that Mr. Polk is likely to appoint. He has prejudged the case. On the faith of his opinion the slave has been brought there—what can he do? There is his recorded judgment printed in your Congressional report—what will he say? "You are a slave. Mr. Calhoun was right. Judge Berrien, of Georgia, a profound lawyer, whom I knew well, was right. I know these gentlemen well; their opinion is entitled to the highest authority; and, in the face of it, it does not become me to say that you are free—so, boy, go to your master; you belong to the class partus sequitur ventrem; you are not quite enough of a Saxon!" What, then, is to be done by this bill? Oh! a writ of error or appeal can come to the Supreme Court of the United States. How? The negro, if he is to be treated like a white man, taking out an appeal, must give bonds in double the value of the subject-matter in dispute. And what is that? If you consider it the mercantile value of the negro, it may be perhaps $1,000 or $2,000. But he cannot have the appeal according to this bill, unless the value of the thing in controversy amounts to the value of $2,000. But, then, there comes in this ideality of personal liberty. What is it worth? Nothing at all—says the Senator from South Carolina—to this fellow, who is better without it. And under this complexity of legal quibbling and litigation, it is expected that the negro will stand there and contend with his master, and coming on to Washington, will prosecute his appeal two years before the Supreme Court, enjoying the opportunity of visiting his old friends about Baltimore!

And now, Mr. President, if we have found upon the opinions of wise ones of old, upon the observations of past and present time, that involuntary slavery is not useful, profitable, or beneficial to either master or slave, that such institutions only become tolerable because, when long established, the evil is less than those consequences which would follow their sudden change, I think it will be admitted that we should prohibit involuntary servitude in the territories over which we have control.

Here, then, the question arises, have we this prohibitory power? I have already said, that where the Supreme Court of the United States has solemnly adjudged any power to belong to any branch of this government, such adjudication should, until overruled, have great if not controlling weight with Congress. What, then, are the adjudications of that court upon this point? I quote from the case so often referred to, American Insurance Company vs. Carter, (1st Peters's Reports, page 511.) On page 542 of that case the court say:

"The constitution confers absolute upon the government the power of making war and of making treaties. Consequent and unrestricted powers over the power of acquiring territory, either by conquest or treaty."

Again, on the same page, the right to make law for a territory is thus spoken of:

"Perhaps the power of governing a territory of the United States, which has been acquired by treaty, may be sustained [illegible] from the fact that it is conceded that [illegible] in the power to legislate over it. But [illegible] inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory; but whether may be the source whence the power is derived, the possession of it is unquestioned."

Nothing can be clearer or more satisfactory on this point.—While this doctrine conforms to the plain dictates of reason, it is satisfactory to know that the principle has been strengthened by the uniform practice under the constitution. The latter class of cases is too numerous to permit even a reference to them all. They have been frequently adverted to in this debate, and therefore I need not again bring them to the attention of the Senate. I therefore find the power of Congress to make law for a territory absolute and unlimited. I have only to consider whether a law prohibiting slavery in a territory where slavery does not already exist, is sound policy for such territory.

No, if we can make any law whatever not contrary to the express prohibitions of the constitution, we can enact that a man with $60,000 worth of bank notes of Maryland shall forfeit the whole amount if he attempts to pass one of them in the territory of California. We may say, if a man carry a menagerie of wild beasts there worth $500,000, and undertakes to exhibit them there he shall forfeit them. The man comes back with his menagerie, and says that the law forbade him to exhibit his animals there; it was thought that, as an economical arrangement, such things should not to be tolerated there. That you may do: he of the lions and tigers goes back, having lost his whole concern. But now you take a slave to California, and instantly your power falls; all the power of the sovereignty of this country is impotent to stop him. That is a strange line of argument to me. It has always been considered that when a State forms its constitution it can exclude slavery. Why so? Because it chances to consider it an evil. If it be a proper subject of legislation in a State, and we have absolute legislative power, transferred to us by virtue of this bloody power of conquest, as some say, or by purchase, as others maintain, I ask—this now we are not? Again—considering this as an abstract question—are there not duties devolving upon us, for the performance of which we may not be responsible to any earthly tribunal, but for which God has created us all will hold us accountable? What is your duty, above all others, to a conquered people? You say it is your duty to give them a government—may you not, then, do everything for them which you are not forbidden to do by some fundamental axiomatic truth at the foundation of your constitution? Show me, then, how your action is precluded, and I submit. Though I believe it ought to be done—see, yet, if the constitution of my country forbids me, I yield. The constitutions of many States declare slavery to be an evil. Southern gentlemen have said that they would have done away with it if possible, and they have apologized to the world and to themselves for the existence of it in their States. These honest old men of another day never could have failed to strike off the chains from every negro in the colonies, if it had been possible for them to do it without upturning the foundations of society.

I do not revive these things to wound the feelings of gentlemen. I know some of them consider this institution as valuable; but many of them, I also know, regard it as an evil. But slavery is not in Oregon, it is not in California; and when I find that you have trampled down the people in order to extend your dominion over them, I feel it to be my duty, when you appeal to me to make laws for them, and the Supreme Court has said that I was so, I have the power to do so to avert from them this evil of slavery, and establish free institutions, under which no man can say that another is his property. I do not doubt this power. I know that it has been considered of old, from 1787 till the present hour, to be vested in Congress. The judicial tribunals in the West have considered it so, and the Supreme Court of the United States have said in that decision, so often referred to, that it was so. Have they found any restrictions upon us? No. And what would you do if you were in Oregon to-day, and it were a State? What would you do, and you, and you? Would any man here, if he were acting in a legislative capacity, say, "I feel myself bound to admit this evil into this country for the benefit of some of the States who are overburdened with slaves?" If this were true, it would be the duty of the free States, in that fraternal spirit which ought to prevail between the various States of the Union, to admit slaves whenever the slave States became overburdened with them. Do we so act in legislating for our States? No; we say, "enjoy your slaves, or free them, as you will, but is is our wish that there shall be no slavery here." You may implore a State, if you will, to take slaves into its bosom for your convenience, but they do not feel themselves bound by any government obligation to do it. Am I not, then, bound to lay the foundations of that State for whose future progress I am to be responsible, in the way which I think the most likely to produce beneficial results to the people there? And when I find myself possessed of this power, and clothed with commensurate responsibility, no threats of dissolution of the Union, no heartburnings here or there, and, least of all—that which we have heard much of out of doors—the coming Presidential election, shall deter me from pursuing this course. I am for making a law in the language of the ordinance of 1787; I would have it enacted that slavery shall never exist in that country. Then, when my black man comes to the Supreme Court of the United States, as provided in this bill, he comes with a positive law in his favor, that court must overrule the decision of the case in Peters, or else such appeal must be sustained. Then we will have acted upon the subject—we will have forbidden slavery.

I observed that some gentlemen who handled this subject were very careful to repeat, with emphasis, that slavery may go where it is not prohibited. That is the reason I prefer the ordinance of 1787 to the so-called compromise bill. I have no doubt that every Senator who assented to that bill convinced himself that it was the best we could pass. I have no doubt that our friends from the North thought it would be effective in preventing slavery in these territories. But I see that the Senator from South Carolina does not think so. He supports the bill for the very reason that it will admit slavery; the Senator from Vermont for the very reason that slavery is forbidden by it. Now, in this confusion of ideas, I desire that Congress, if it have any opinion, express it.

If we have any power to legislate over these territories, how long would it take to write down the sixth article of the ordinance of 1787? Those of us who think that ought to be a fundamental law in the organization of territories will vote for it; and those of us who believe otherwise, will vote against it, and whichever party triumphs, will give law to Oregon and California, bearing the responsibility. But I must say, that I do not like what appears to me—I say it in no offensive sense—a shuffling off the responsibility which is upon us now, and which we cannot avoid. The Supreme Court may overrule our decision; but if we think we have power to ordain that slavery shall not exist in that territory, let us say so; if not, let us so decide. Let us not evade the question altogether.

That honorable Senators who reported this bill had its passage very much at heart, I have no doubt; nor do I feel disposed to deny that every man of them believed that it was just such a measure as was calculated to give tranquility to the agitated minds of the people of this country. Well, I do not care for that agitation farther than it at I will look to it as a motive to inquire carefully what my powers and my duties are. I have heard much of this—I have been myself a prophet of dissolution of this Union; but I have seen the Union of these States survive so many shocks, that I am not afraid of dissolution. Perhaps, indeed, when this cry of wolf has been long disregarded, he may come at last when not expected; but I do not believe that the people of the South are willing to sever themselves from this republic because we will not establish slavery here or there. If we have no power to pass the ordinance of 1787, let the people of the South go to the Supreme Court, and have the question decided. It will only be a few months till the court resumes its session here, and the question can then be tried. If the decision be against us, the gentlemen of the South can at once commence their emigration to these territories. Let us then make the law as we think it ought to be made now.

I am the more confirmed in the course which I am determined to pursue, by some historical facts elicited in this very discussion. I remember what was said by the Senator from Virginia the other day. It is a truth, that when the constitution of the United States was made, South Carolina and Georgia refused to come into the Union unless the slave trade should be continued for twenty years; and the North agreed that they would vote to continue the slave trade for twenty years; yes, voted that this new republic should engage in piracy and murder at the will of two States! So the history reads; and the condition of the agreement was, that those two States should agree to some arrangement about navigation laws! I do not blame South Carolina and Georgia for this transaction any more than I do those northern States who shared in it. But suppose the question were now presented here by any one, whether we should adopt the foreign slave trade and continue it for twenty years, would not the whole land turn pale with horror, that, in the middle of the nineteenth century, a citizen of a free community, a Senator of the United States, should dare to propose the adoption of a system that has been denominated piracy and murder, and is by law punished by death all over Christendom? What did they do then? They had the power to prohibit it; but, at the command of these two States, they allowed that to be introduced into the constitution to which much of slavery now existing on our land is clearly to be traced. For who can doubt that, but for that woful bargain, slavery would by this time have disappeared from all the States then in the Union, with one or two exceptions? The number of slaves in the United States at this period was about six hundred thousand; it is now three millions. And just as you extend the area of slavery, so you multiply the difficulties which lie in the way of its extermination. It had been infinitely better that day that South Carolina and Georgia had remained out of the Union for a while, rather than that the constitution should have been made to sanction the slave trade for twenty years. The dissolution of the old confederation would have been nothing in comparison with that recognition of piracy and murder. I can conceive of nothing in the dark record of man's enormities, from the death of Abel down to this hour, so horrible as that of stealing people from their own home, and making them and their posterity slaves forever. It is a crime which we know has been visited with such signal punishment in the history of nations as to warrant the belief that Heaven itself had interferred to avenge the wrongs of earth.

In thus characterizing the accursed traffic, I speak but the common sentiment of all mankind. I could not, if I taxed my feeble intellect to the utmost, denounce it in language as strong as that uttered by Thomas Jefferson himself. Nay, more—the spirit of that great man descending to his grandson, in your Virginia convention, denounced the slave trade, as now carried on between the States, as being no less infamous than that foreign slave trade carried on in ships that went down into the sea. I speak of Thomas Jefferson Randolph. If you would not go to Africa, and thence people California with slaves, may you not perpetuate equal enormities here? You take the child from its mother's bosom—you separate husband and wife—and transport them three thousand miles off to the shores of the Pacific ocean.

I know that this is a peculiar institution; and I doubt not that in the hands of such gentlemen as talk about it here, it may be made very attractive. It may be a very agreeable sight to behold a large company of dependents, kindly treated by a benevolent master, and to trace the manifestations of gratitude which they exhibit. But in my eyes a much more grateful spectacle would be that of a patriarch in the same neighborhood, with his dependents all around him, invested with all the attributes of freedom bestowed upon them by the common father, in whose sight all are alike precious! It is, indeed, a very "peculiar" institution. According to the account of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] this institution exhibits all that is most amiable and beautiful in our nature. That Senator drew a picture of an old, grey-headed negro woman, exhausting the kindness of her heart upon the white child she had nursed. This is true; and it shows the good master and the grateful servant But, sir, all are not such as these. The Senator concealed the other side of the picture; and it was only revealed to us by the quick apprehension of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. WESTCOTT,] who wanted the power to send a patrol all over the country to prevent the slaves from rising to upturn the order of society! I had almost believed, after hearing the beautiful, romantic, sentimental narration of the Senator from Mississippi, that God had, indeed, as he said, made this people in Africa to come over here and wait upon us, till the Senator from Florida waked me up to a recollection of the old doctrines of Washington and Jefferson, by assuring us that wherever that patriarchal institution existed, a rigid police should be maintained in order to prevent the uprising of the slave. Sir, it is indeed a peculiar institution. I know many good men, who as masters, honor human nature, by the kindness, equity and moderation of their rule and government of their slaves; but put a bad man, as sometimes happens, as often happens, in possession of uncontrolled dominion over another, black or white, and then wrongs follow that make angels weep. It is, sir, a troublesome institution; it requires too much law, too much force, to keep up social and domestic security; therefore, I do not wish to extend it to these new and as yet feeble territories.

Is it pretended that slave labor could be profitable in Oregon or California? Do we expect to grow cotton or sugar there? I do not know that it may not be done there; for, as the gentleman from New York has told us, just as you get out upon this continent, the line of latitude changes in temperature, so that you may have a very different isothermal line as you approach the Pacific ocean. But I do not care so much about that. My objection is a radical one to the institution everywhere. I do believe, if there is any place upon the globe which we inhabit where a white man cannot work, he has no business there. If that place is fit only for black men to work, let black men alone work there. I do not know any better law for man's good than that old one, which was announced to man after the first transgression, that by the sweat of his brow he should earn his bread. I don't know what business men have in the world, unless it is to work. If any man has no work of head or hand to do in this world, let him get out of it soon. The hog is the only gentleman who has nothing to do but eat and sleep. Him we dispose of as soon as he is fat. Difficult as the settlement of this question seems to some, it is in my judgment only so because we will not look at it and treat it as an original proposition, to be decided by the influence its determination may have on the territories themselves. We are ever running away from this, and enquiring how it will affect the "slave States" or the "free States." The only question mainly to be considered is, how will this policy affect the territories for which this law is intended? Is slavery a good thing, or is it a bad thing, for them? With my views of the subject, I must consider it bad policy to plant slavery in any soil where I do not find it already growing. I look upon it as an exotic, that blights with its shade the soil in which you plant it; therefore, as I am satisfied of our constitutional power to prohibit it, so I am equally certain it is our duty to do so.

In the States where law and long usage have made the slave property, as property I treat it. It is there, and while there it should and will receive that protection which the constitution and the good neighborhood of the States afford and require at our hands. But I should be false to my best convictions of duty, policy, and right, if by my vote I should extend it one acre beyond its present limits. I may be mistaken in all this; but of one thing I am satisfied—of the honest conviction of my own judgment; and no imaginary interruption of the ties which bind the various sections of the confederacy shall induce me to shrink from these convictions, whenever I am called upon to act upon them out into law.

But we are told that, when the constitution was made, there existed certain relative proportions between the power of the slave and the power of the free States. I understood the Senator from South Carolina, that we were under obligations to preserve forever these relative proportions in the same way.

Mr. CALHOUN —I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CORWIN.—I am very happy to be undeceived. I understood the Senator to conceive that this is a question of power. It is not so. It is a question of municipal law, of civil policy. The men who framed the constitution never dreamed that there was to be a conflict of power between the slave and the free States.—They never dreamed that the South was to contend that they would always be equal in representation in the Senate to the North. They had no idea of that equilibrium of power of which we have heard so much. The circumstances of that period forbade any such supposition. Looking at all these circumstances, (and I have no doubt those far-seeing men regarded them carefully) you would have had fourteen free States and nine slave States. But every man who had much to do with the formation of the constitution expected and desired that slavery should be prohibited in the new States; and they even expected to have it abolished in many of the States where it existed. They had no idea of conflict; and if the ultra fanatics in the South, as well as those in the North, would let the subject alone, we should have much less difficulty in a proper settlement of the question.

While the extreme fanaticism of the North, it is said, would burst the barriers of the constitution, and rush into the slave States to enforce their abolition views, trampling on your laws and madly overturning existing institutions there, the South vents its fiery indignation in tones of unmeasured reproach. But have southern gentlemen considered their position before the world on this question? You declare the opinion that slavery does not exist either in Oregon, California, or New Mexico; all these immense regions are now, and for many years have been, free from negro slavery. And now what do the ultra fanatics of the South ask? Sir, they avow their determination to rush into these free territories, overturn the social systems there existing, uproot all establishments founded in and moulded by an absence of slavery, and having thus swept away the former free systems, plant there forever the system of involuntary servitude. Sir, southern gentlemen must say no more about the fanatics of the North endeavoring to uproot your institutions, while you imitate the example of those fanatics in your treatment of the free soil part of the Union. Sir, there is no difference between the two cases. The fanatics of the South are but a counterpart of those of the North. If there be any difference, it is only this: The fanatic of the North has this apology—he proposes, at least in theory, to enlarge and extend the boundaries of human rights. The fanatic of the South, strangely inconsistent with the obvious tendencies of the age, seeks to extend, at one sweep, human black slavery over a country, new and sparsely settled, larger in extent than most of the governments of the old world. This does appear to my poor judgment, not merely at war with the spirit of the age, with the better spirit, I would say, of men in all ages; nay, more—I must be pardoned if I declare it wears the aspect of absurdity, arrogance and temerity. Sir, I have spoken out my opinions freely, boldly, but in no spirit of unkindness to any man or any section of our common country. I know how widely different are the views of other gentlemen from mine. I know how habit, usage, time, color our thoughts, and, indeed form our principles often. But I must here repeat my belief, that if we could set about this business in the spirit of those who founded this republic, we should have no difficulty in enacting the ordinance of 1787. Sir, it is best to repeat what they did. In 1787 they made the constitution. In 1787 they made that celebrated ordinance for the northwest. Sir, this doctrine of free territory is not new; it is coeval with the constitution, born the same year, of the same parents, and baptized in the same good old republican church. And now, when we are about to establish these new republics, much larger than the old, why should we not imitate their example, re-enact their laws, and thus secure to this new republic on the Pacific the glory, the prosperity, the rational progress, which have shed such lustre around that founded upon the shores of the Atlantic?

A Senator who sits before me [Mr. FITZGERALD] has, with great propriety, explained to the Senate the position in which he is placed on this subject, as connected with his friend, Gen. Cass, not now a member of this body. The subject, as bearing on the opinions and prospects of both Gen. Cass and Gen. Taylor, has been often adverted to in this debate. While I am yet on my feet I desire to say a word or two on this aspect of the debate.

I speak of one absent from this chamber with every feeling of respect, and with some reluctance. It is said, and I believe truly, that General Cass has, within the last two years, entertained two opinions on this subject, the one in direct conflict with the other. In other words, he has changed his opinions respecting it. Whereas he was at one time in favor of extending the ordinance of 1787 over all new territory; now, he denies the power of Congress to do so. Thus it follows that he would arrest all such legislation by interposing his veto. His position at present is fixed. But, sir, this facility in forming and changing opinions in a gentleman at his time of life, gives some hope that in the future he may not obstinately persevere in his error. Sir, one who on such subjects can change in the two past years his opinion, gives hopeful expectation that he may change back in the two years to come. As Major Dugald Dalgetty would say, "he will be amenable to reason." His opinion, it seems, is, that the whole subject is to be given over to the unlimited discretion of the territorial legislatures. As to General Taylor's position in regard to this and all like subjects of domestic policy, I here declare that if I did not consider him pledged by his published letter to Captain Allison not to interpose his veto on such subjects of legislation, he certainly could not get my vote, nor do I believe that of any northern State.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I would like to be informed by the Senator from Ohio, as he has referred to General Cass's position, and as he is about to give his support to General Taylor, if he can give us General Taylor's views on the subject, and what his opinion be, as expressed in his message to Congress?

Mr. CORWIN.—I cannot.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I [illegible] say, that if General Taylor would interpose a veto upon the subject he would [illegible]

Mr. CORWIN. I would not [illegible] unless indeed we found him opposed to just such another man who had a great [illegible] I think it very likely that I do not believe that General Taylor could get the electoral vote of a free State in America, if it were not for the belief that prevails, that upon this subject, as well as upon any other of domestic [illegible] by the various departments of government, and acquiesced in by the people, he would not, through the veto power, interfere to crush the free will of the people, as expressed through both branches of Congress.

I repeat, sir, that if Congress, having the power as defined by the Supreme Court, acted on by Congress in various cases, as shown by your legislation, sanctioned in so many ways, and till now cheerfully acquiesced in by the people, should enact the ordinance of 1787 over again, and extend it over the three territories in question, and the man in the White House should interpose his veto, and again and again thrust his puny arm in the way of the legislative power, and arrest for a long time the popular will, I will not say he would be impeached, tried, and (if the law were so) have his head brought to the block. Patience might in its exhaustion [illegible] and in spurning [illegible] majesty of judicial trial all fall before the summary vengeance of an abused and insulted people.

I know very well that the Senate is weary of this debate. I wish now only to state another fact, which will show what it is which our brethren of the South now demand. If you take the area of the free States and the slave States as they exist, and compare them, you will find that the latter predominate. When the constitution was formed, and when all the territory which you then had was brought into the Union, the free States had an excess of [illegible] square miles over the slave States. Since then we had acquired Louisiana, Florida, and Texas, and added them to the Union, and when you have added the claim of the South that they will carry their slaves into Oregon, New Mexico, and California, what will then be the condition of the free States? The slave States will have one-third more power in the Senate of the United States than the free States could ever have.

Sir, if this is to be viewed at all as a question of power, what I have stated would be the exact result of yielding to the present claim of the South; and this will be the result, unless you prohibit the introduction of slavery into these territories. Sir, I have seen the working of this system. Plant thirty slaveholders among three hundred inhabitants who are not slaveholders, and they will maintain their position against the three hundred. Let one man out of fifty be a slaveholder, and he will persuade the forty-nine that it is better that the institution should exist. It is capital and social position opposed to labor and poverty. How this war may wage in the future, I will not say; but thus far the former have ever been an over-match for the latter.

But, sir, I do not like this view of such a subject. If it were merely a comparison of strength or contest for relative power, I could yield without a struggle. But I am called on to lay the foundations of society over a vast extent of country. If this work is done wisely now, ages unborn shall bless us, and we shall have done in our day what experience approved and duty demanded. If this work shall be carelessly or badly done, countless millions that shall inherit that vast region will hereafter remember our folly with bitter curse; our names and deeds, instead of praises, shall only call forth execration and reproach. In the conflict of present opinions, I have listened patiently to all. Finding myself opposed to some with whom I have rarely ever differed before, I have doubted myself, re-examined my conclusions, reconsidered all the arguments on either side, and I still am obliged to adhere to my first impressions, I may say, my long cherished opinions. If I part company with some here, whom I habitually respect, I still find with me the men of the past, whom the nations venerated.—I stand upon the ordinance of 1787. There the path is marked by the blood of the revolution. I stand in company with the "men of '87," their locks wet with the mists of the Jordan over which they passed, their garments purple with the waters of the Red Sea through which they led us of old, to this land of promise. With them to point the way, however dark the present, hope shines upon the future, and, discerning their foot-prints in my path, I shall tread it with unfaltering trust.

THE COMPROMISE BILL.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial governments of Oregon, California, and New Mexico.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—Mr. President: I am that member of the committee who was altogether dissatisfied with the provisions of this bill. I rise to discharge a duty which I owe to myself, and to explain to my constituents the policy I advocated.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT,] had proposed before the special committee was raised to apply the Missouri compromise line of 36° 30′ north latitude, to the newly acquired territories of California and New Mexico, in the precise terms in which it had been applied to the country out of which the State of Missouri was formed. I moved to amend, by declaring expressly that emigrants might settle with their slaves south of the line 36° 30′, and should be protected in the use and enjoyment of their slave property, when so settled, so long as the country of their residence remained under a territorial government. When converted into States of the Union, of course they would look to their State governments for protection. I was willing to extend this line, in which the country had acquiesced, to the Pacific; but in doing so, I desired a clear and explicit declaration, that south of the line slaveholders should be protected in their slave property. This I was unable to obtain. There is a marked difference between the territory of Louisiana when we purchased it from France, and the territories of New Mexico and California when we acquired them by the recent treaty with Mexico. In Louisiana slavery was tolerated at the time she was annexed to the United States. So of Texas. But in New Mexico and California slavery had been abolished previous to their acquisition, and when acquired did not exist in either. As a consequence of this state of things, slavery would continue in Louisiana, and could not exist in New Mexico and California without changing the laws which operated upon this particular subject. By the Missouri compromise the law was changed in regard to Louisiana, and slavery prohibited in all the country north of 36° 30′, leaving it to continue south of that line. By our recent acquisition of territory, the boundary of the United States has been extended upon the Pacific ocean from 42° to 32° 30′ north latitude. Thus, by extending the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific, only four degrees of latitude would be set apart into which slaveholders might emigrate with their slaves; while five and a half degrees of latitude of the newly acquired territory would be appropriated exclusively to free labor. This division would leave the States and territories from which the institution of slavery is excluded larger, by more than a half a million of square miles, than those in which it is tolerated; and with such a division it seems to me our northern brethren might be satisfied. Slavery is not favorable to the dense population of a country. The area of the non-slaveholding States, with a population of 9,728,722, according to the census of 1840, is about 450,000 square miles. The area of the slaveholding States, excluding Texas, is about 600,000 square miles, with a population of 7,332,452, of whom 2,700,279 are blacks, according to the same census. True, a large portion of the States to the south has recently been covered by Indian tribes, and closed against white settlements. But, after allowing for this, it is manifest that the non-slaveholding States, in population and political strength, are now, and will always continue to be, more powerful than the slaveholding States. Under such considerations, and with a division of the new territories which set apart much the largest portion to the uses of free labor, I could not perceive any cause of dissatisfaction, or any good reason why the compromise line of 36° 30′ should not be extended to the Pacific.

Members of the committee from the non-slaveholding States, however, could not be induced, in express terms, to declare that slaveholders might emigrate to and settle with their slaves in any part of the territories south of 36° 30′, and hold that kind of property under the protection of the laws of the United States. Ascertaining that it was impossible to obtain a guarantee that slaveholders might settle and hold their slaves south of 36° 30′, I submitted a scheme by which, had it been adopted, the question of slavery would have been disposed of by the people of the territories. The people of Oregon, as the bill now stands, have that privilege. I proposed to confer the same privilege upon the people of California and New Mexico. My plan was to organize in each of these territories legislative assemblies, to consist of two branches or chambers, one to be composed of representatives elected by the male citizens above twenty-one years of age, and the other, of the governor and judges, appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate; each chamber to have a negative upon the proceedings and laws of the other. I proposed to limit and restrict the power of the legislative assemblies thus constituted, in such manner as the committee might agree to be expedient, and in the following particulars, to wit: that they should not interfere with the disposition or sale of the vacant domain or public lands, or contract any debt on the part of the territory, or establish any corporation. In other matters I proposed to confer full legislative powers, and to give effect to laws which might be enacted, and which were not incompatible with the constitution and laws of the United States. I thought there were striking advantages likely to result from the adoption of this scheme. In the first place, we should, by conferring the elective franchise, indoctrinate the people of California and New Mexico with the first elementary principle of American liberty. We should teach them by degrees the responsibility of the representative to the constituent body, and they would gradually learn to admire and practise all the political duties of a republican people. Thus they would become instructed in the principles of self-government, and fitted to take their positions as independent States of our Union at no very distant day. While these advantages were secured, my plan guarded against any possible injury to the interests of our government, by retaining an absolute negative, in the hands of the governor and judges of the territories, upon all legislation springing from the elective branch of the legislature. The legislature, thus constituted, in view of the climate and soil, and their capacity to produce those staples peculiarly suited to the employment of slave labor, would be free to mould the social and civil institutions of the new territories, according to their convictions of duty and interest. They would be free to introduce the institutions of Kentucky or Ohio, of South Carolina or Massachusetts; and, in conferring that liberty upon them, we should but pay just homage to the principle of self-government, which, in our professions at least, we so devotedly reverence.

Why should gentlemen from the North refuse to permit the people of these new territories to decide for themselves the question of slavery? Why not let the people organize their society upon the same basis with that of their neighbors of Texas, when they constituted part of the same Mexican confederation of States a few years since? The refusal to allow the privilege is a reflection upon the understandings of the people of these territories, and reproachful, if not insulting, to the southern States. It is equivalent to saying that the people of New Mexico and California have not capacity to discern their true interest, or lack moral honesty to guide them. By the constitution the institution of slavery presents no barrier to the social and political embrace of the North and the South; and yet northern politicians are now arbitrarily tying the hands of Californians and New Mexicans, and denying to them the right to decide this question for themselves. In this very denial they declare to the people of the slaveholding States that their institutions are unworthy of imitation and adoption. Sir, it is impossible, under such a state of feeling and action, to expect anything but heartburnings and bitter animosities. And as the North assumes the right, without regard to the opinions, or prejudices, if you please, of the South, to dictate, regardless of the conciliatory spirit of offered compromise, it must expect that such conduct will be met by firm resistance, if not revolutionary defiance.

All schemes of compromise and conciliation left by the decease of the committee of thirteen, and the bill which has been reported as the panacea of the healing administration, are distressing aggravations. I have no confidence in the remedy.

I do not doubt the power of Congress to make laws for the government of the people who inhabit a territory belonging to the United States. I shall not enter upon an elaborate argument to trace the power to its source, and to prove the propriety of its exercise. It results necessarily from the power expressly granted in the constitution to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States. It is likewise a necessary incident to the power of acquiring territory, which power emanates from the war and treaty-making powers of the constitution. As the proprietor of the vacant domain, and having the right to survey and sell it and to preserve it from trespassers, Congress may legislate for the preservation of its property and the protection of its officers whilst engaged in surveying and selling it. Having the power to acquire territory and to admit new States into the Union, the power to keep and preserve the acquisition must follow; and how can this be done without government? If there be no power to make laws for the people of a territory by Congress, before it is admitted into the Union as a State, is there any authority to be found in any other body which can prescribe a code of law for the punishment of crimes and enforcements of contracts? Where else does such authority reside, if not in Congress? If it exists in any other body, what shall prevent that body from appropriating and taking to itself the entire territory? Or shall there be a divided jurisdiction, Congress legislating partially, and leaving it to some other legislative body, springing up by magic, to supply our deficiencies? Sir, it is a waste of time to pursue such inquiries. The constitution expressly confers on Congress the power to make all laws necessary and proper to execute any of the powers conferred upon the national government. Legislating for the territories of the United States is no more than adopting measures to accomplish constitutional objects and purposes. It is too late at this day to question a power which has been exercised from the foundation of the government with objection.

If, then, Congress possesses the power to legislate for the territories, the next question that naturally arises is, what limitations, if any, exists upon the power? Is it without restriction? Or, if there be bounds, what are they? I answer, that every limitation prescribed by the constitution upon our legislative powers applies as well to the territories as to the States. Congress cannot grant titles of nobility; make laws respecting an establishment of religion; subject a person to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb for the same offence; compel a man to testify against himself; or do any other thing prohibited by the constitution sooner in a territory than a State. The prohibitions in the constitution are great fundamental principles, to be observed and obeyed at all times and in all places. But there is no prohibition to be found in the constitution in respect to the power of Congress over the question of slavery when legislating for a territory. If, then, the subject of African slavery be one over which the States of this Union have unlimited control and discretion within their respective boundaries and jurisdictions, what reason can be urged against the exercise of similar control and discretion by Congress when legislating for the territories and when there is no constitutional prohibition? I perceive a propriety in submitting the matter to the determination of the inhabitants of the territory, who, for good or ill, are to be affected by the institution; but, as a mere question of power, I perceive no ground of difference between Congress and the States within their respective jurisdictions. It is certain and must be palpable to every one, that a single State, Virginia for example, has no right to legislate for the people of California, and establish African slavery among them; the Californians, either as a conquered or ceded people, have no right to legislate for themselves, without the consent of their new sovereign, upon any principle of national law. It follows that we must legislate for them directly, or confer upon them the power to legislate for themselves. In doing the latter, we may prescribe such terms as we choose. In regard to the Oregon territory, the bill allows their legislature to settle the question of slavery for themselves. But this is a concession made by us. If we can grant the power to them we can exercise it ourselves. Indeed, the provisions of the bill in regard to Oregon cannot be voted for by any Senator without a surrender of all constitutional objections to the power of Congress over the subject of slavery in the territories.

In respect to New Mexico and California, the bill prohibits the making of any law on the subject of slavery. The same power which enables us to prohibit legislation would equally give the right to legislate. The only question, then, in my judgment is, how ought we to legislate? I think we ought to compromise upon the line of 36° 30′. But this is opposed by gentlemen from the non-slaveholding States. I shall now examine the grounds and consequences of their opposition.

The question, says the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] is the establishment of human slavery upon free territory. How do we denounce England for the original introduction of slaves into her American colonies, asks the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN.] Thus are we, according to these Senators, about to perpetrate the same enormities we condemn in others. Sir, I apprehend that gentlemen delude and deceive themselves, by supposed analogies, when none exist. The extension of slavery into our newly acquired territory is not identical in principle with its original introduction into the colonies of Great Britain. While the commercial policy of England was planting human slavery in Virginia and the Carolinas, she did not allow it to take root within her home borders. If it be truly regarded as a social and moral curse, Great Britain exhausted reason in inducing a spotless people (on whom she claimed the power of taxation without representation; upon a people who had not the ability at the time to resist the infliction, and upon a people she was willing to sacrifice for her corporate profit and aggrandizement. She had no slaves at home to send out with her citizen emigrants to inhabit the wilderness, to convert the forests into farms and plantations, to expel wild beasts and savages, and to introduce civilization and christianity. She pushed her trade into the continent of Africa, exciting war, with all its accompanying horrors of blood, conflagration, and kidnapping, to get slaves with which to push forward her settlements, plantations, and trade in the "New World." She desolated the land of the negro to build up her interests in the land of the Indian; establishing slavery abroad without tolerating it at home. Is it possible that gentlemen can look at the origin of slavery and its introduction among our ancestors, and then regard the extension of the institution into New Mexico and California with our emigrating people as bearing the least resemblance to the conduct of Great Britain? I have been intimately associated with slaveholders all my life, but I feel no more responsibility for the existence of the institution than I do for the time and place of my birth. My responsibility in regard to it is the same which I feel in reference to any other existing institution of my country which I found established in coming to years of discretion. As a man and a citizen, it is my duty, so far as I am able, to mould every social, civil, and political institution in such manner as shall produce the greatest amount of individual and public happiness. I may, from my proximity to slaves, be compelled by deeper sympathy and stronger motive of action to consider the subject; but I doubt whether the moral obligation which should prompt and stimulate us all to ameliorate the condition of the slave is as binding upon me as it should be upon the Englishman or the Yankee whose ancestors brought their cargoes of manacled human victims and sold them to my forefathers. The profits of the trade and the criminality of its origin have descended upon them. If there be any guilt from its continuance, that alone has fallen to the portion of my southern friends and myself.

I am disgusted, I am ashamed at the conduct of those who are perpetually goading us on the subject of African slavery, and I beg leave on this occasion to expose their errors, and to suggest what they may do to benefit both the black and the white races, if their benevolence were guided by intelligence and true love of their species. They do not understand the subject upon which they write and speak so much. Certain it is, their opportunities to understand and to comprehend it are not equal to those possessed by us, who live in the midst of slaves, and from necessity have daily intercourse with them.

What are slaveholders required to do by northern abolitionists? We are importuned to repeal all laws which hold our slaves in bondage, and all laws which deny to the black race political and social equality with the white. We are told, he shall not allow intellectual and moral attainments to regulate social intercourse and political rights, irrespective of color, and that it is only a vulgar prejudice to object to a black face and woolly hair. I believe it to be a principle of our nature to love ourselves first and best, and next to ourselves those who most nearly resemble us. There are exceptions, generous and noble exceptions, to the general rule. A man may die for his wife, his child, his friend, his country, and in many circumstances it may be a duty to sacrifice life—a duty which some men will gloriously perform; they may be stimulated to perform it from motives generous and noble, although selfish. The building up a great character is not altogether a disinterested work. The general rule, however, with the masses of mankind, is self-love first; and we honor the exception the more because it is contrary to and a departure from the general rule. Under this rule our affections and intellects find their highest enjoyments in associating with those in all respects most like ourselves. Unity of sentiment and personal resemblance are the fountains of harmony and love; the want of them, cause of distrust and antipathy; hence the hatred so easily generated among castes or different races of men. Abolish slavery, place the slave in possession of every right to which the master is entitled, and what will be the consequence? Will laws be required to keep each other because they are equal in all respects in the eye of the law? Will not the negro, the freedman, and feared or caste assume the place of servile obedience? Let the jealousies, hatred, and wars which in all ages of the world have prevailed amongst castes, answer the inquiry. Why, sir, during this very session of Congress, the Indians of Yucatan have been committing horrible butcheries of the white inhabitants, and in Hayti the negroes have been murdering the mulattoes. Trace these wars to their source, and we find no other cause for them as potent as the difference of color. Let any man of sense look ahead, and contemplate what must inevitably happen in the southern States, especially in those where the black population exceeds the white, in case our slaves are invested with all the rights and privileges of free white citizens.—Let any one contemplate the consequences likely to result from the suffrages of those recently liberated, with their passions inflamed by black or white demagogues, speaking to them of past oppressions and pointing to mansions of elegance, well-stocked farms, and rich plantations as the fruits of their labor and the labor of their ancestors. Can any thing short of dangerous agitations and bitter animosities, if not open civil war, and into the war, spring from such a state of things? Sir, I have witnessed the free white population of my own beloved State at the point of civil war, when divided upon a constitutional question affecting the debtor and creditor classes of society. I have seen my own State distracted between two appellate judicial tribunals, a "new court" and an "old court." I have seen neighbors and families so divided, excited, and infuriated, in regard to relief laws and the constitutional power of their legislature to remove obnoxious judges by reorganizing the acts relative to their courts, as to be almost driven to the shedding of blood. I have heard of anti-rent difficulties and murders in New York growing out of the relation of landlord and tenant. To teach the poor that the rich are their oppressors has become an article of faith in the political creed of demagogues. In view of these things, I never will consent to see political contests between black men and their former masters in my own State or any other southern State. On that subject the opinion of the whole South is unalterably settled, and the northern abolitionist who expects to change it is a philanthropist of the strait-jacket order. Sir, the idea of political, civil, and social equality between the black and white races, in the same community, is an impossibility, and the sooner all ranks of citizens, North and South, perceive it, the better for all.

The conduct of non-slaveholding communities confirms my opinion. The people of the South in refusing to abolish slavery. What has the Senator from New York, [Mr. DIX,] said in regard to free negroes? He has most unequivocally declared that he regarded them as disadvantageous, if not a nuisance, to the white population; and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN,] went so far as to evince a determination to exclude that description of population, and to prevent their settling in his State by force. In this his constituents had taken the lead, and actually put his principle into practice by the expulsion of the Randolph negroes. Illinois has excluded free negroes from her territory by constitutional provisions. I know not how many free negro mobs have been gotten up from time to time in our northern cities. With these northern manifestations of hostility to the doctrine of social and civil equality with the negro race before our eyes, how can gentlemen expect us to welcome and endure a state of things so abhorrent to us?

We are charged with doing violence to the moral, liberal, and regenerating free principles of the age in which we live, when we ask to be allowed to emigrate with our slaves to New Mexico and California. The up-risen people of France and the overthrow of Louis Philippe have been referred to, and those of us who voted applauding sympathy to Frenchmen are charged with inconsistency. In France there is a homogeneous population. The difference in castes does not prevail. No natural jealousies or antipathies exist, growing out of difference of color. Hence there could be in France no objection to placing the entire population upon the basis of political and social equality, allowing intellectual and moral attainments to regulate the grade of individual elevation. I believe there are insuperable barriers to this equality among the black and white population of the United States; and hence I am not inconsistent when I sympathize with Frenchmen in their efforts to establish a republic. But, sir, the recent insurrection in Paris furnishes a most striking illustration of the danger likely to result from the sudden withdrawal of the ligaments by which society is bound, and to which it is habituated. We have seen multitudes, ouvriers, under the fascinating idea of organized labor, living upon the public treasury in idleness, until it was obvious that public bankruptcy would result from the continuance of the system. We have seen the same persons organizing to overthrow the government so soon as their craft was in danger, inscribing upon their insurrectionary banners, "pillage, if victorious; conflagration, if defeated." Sir, if the working classes of France, as soon as they are emancipated from the shackles of monarchy, forgetting their duties to liberty, by the establishment of just laws and social order, and organizing for public plunder, march to the accomplishment of their nefarious purposes through scenes of fratricidal carnage, what may we not expect from the emancipation of three millions of slaves, and immediately conferring upon them equal social and political rights?

It seems to me that gentlemen from the North, in their incessant attacks of our "peculiar institution," are influenced by a zeal without knowledge. Let them coolly look at facts, and they will find ample sympathy to exhaust enough, besides negro slavery to deserve their sympathy. What is the relation between parent and child but a system of involuntary servitude, differently regulated in various countries, but continuing on the part of the child until the period fixed by law arrives when parental control and authority cease? I admit that filial affection induces a willing obedience to a great extent; but there are cases, many of them, where the service is extorted or coerced by the authority of the parent. I concede that this relation of parent and child, founded in nature and regulated by law, deserves the name of holy. I admit the great difference between the relation of parent and child and that of master and slave. I only refer to the former to show that there is a case where the will and actions of one person are, for the good of that person during minority, subjected from necessity to the control of the will of another. The period at which nonage terminates is regulated by law, and hence the service of the child may be continued long after his intellectual and physical capacity have enabled him to provide for and take care of himself.

There is yet another instance of involuntary servitude imposed by law, not for the punishment of crime, but to display the noblest humanity. What are our lunatic asylums but houses, not prisons, in which unwilling subjects, not slaves, are subjected by law to the control of another's will. Their servitude is involuntary, and continues through the lucid interval, and that is justified upon the ground that the patient is not yet thoroughly relieved of his malady. Now, sir, I am well aware that in putting these cases of involuntary servitude, sanctioned by law and not imposed for the punishment of crime, I may be doing little else than laying the foundation for raillery and more indignation in the northern mind and heart. I admit the vast difference in degree between these cases of involuntary servitude and that of negro slavery, but I defy the intellect of man to make them less than cases of involuntary servitude, in which the will or volition of one person is controlled and subjected, according to law, to the will of another. In the parental relation, the father, too, may maintain an action against the seducer of his daughter, and recover damages, upon the idea that he has a property in her service as his servant; and it is this idea of property in the service of his child which alone enables him to maintain the action. Now, sir, these things prove that society, for its welfare, may subject men and women, until they are twenty-one, or any other age, to the control of parents or guardians, and lunatics, even during their lucid intervals, to the custody and management of keepers. I might mention the victims of poverty in county poor-houses as a further illustration. I may be told by gentlemen from the North that I am putting cases where the law acts through benevolence towards those who are restrained in their liberty and volition. Be it so. I am not now dealing with motives; my object is to establish the fact that involuntary servitude may and does exist, in harmony with the welfare and good order of society, even when it is not inflicted for crime. An apprenticeship to learn a trade is another strong illustration. My object in putting these cases is to show that involuntary servitude is not the horrible thing it is represented to be, and that when the permanent safety and welfare of the community require it, negro slavery may be tolerated and regulated by law, especially when those among whom it exists are not at all responsible for its introduction.

Can any good result from the denunciation of slaveholders? Will it benefit the slave to exasperate his master? If the abolitionist could but know that his intemperate denunciation and misguided and ill-digested expressions of sympathy have had no other effect than to tighten the cords of slavery, surely he would allow his reason to control his feelings, and he would leave to the people of the South the entire management of their domestic institutions in their own way. If we have an affliction, an evil, let us judge. We reject obtrusive and gratuitous instruction. I do not doubt but that there are cruel and inhuman masters. I do not doubt but that many individual cases of cruelty have occurred and may occur again. There are cases of cruelty in the matrimonial relation, and for many of which divorces are granted; but will any one assert that the relation of husband and wife is necessarily cruel and inhuman? It is not true, sir, that African slavery is necessarily accompanied by acts of cruelty. In my own State we have laws to take slaves from cruel masters, and apprentices likewise. So also we have laws to take children from cruel parents, and to release wives from cruel husbands. There is nothing more fallacious than to make a few individual cases the basis of conclusions in regard to the whole subject. Now, sir, I do not hesitate to assert that there is not a laboring population to be found on earth who, in the general, are better taken care of than the slaves of Kentucky. Our tables of population prove beyond controversy that the entire slave population of the United States are treated with kindness and humanity. It is the master's pecuniary interest not to abuse the slave, and there is a guarantee for good treatment, if no higher motive existed. But look at the facts. Can a down-trodden, half-starved, half-clothed, miserable, worked-to-death population increase and duplicate their numbers as the slave population and free blacks of the United States have done? In 1790 there were only 59,466 free persons of color in the United States. In 1840 there were 386,303—making an increase of more than six-fold. No other fact is necessary to prove the existence of a strong disposition to emancipate. The importation of slaves from abroad was allowed up to the first of January, 1808. I have no knowledge how many were imported between 1790 and that time. I therefore take the census of 1810 as the basis of calculation to show how the black population, free and slave, has increased. The total colored population in 1810 was 1,377,810. In 1840 it was 2,873,759. Thus in thirty years they increased at the rate of 208¼ per cent. Now, compare this with our free white population. In 1810 we had 5,862,004 free whites. In 1840 we had 14,189,595. Thus the increase with the free whites was at the rate of 242 per cent. making a difference of only 33¾ per cent. in thirty years. But it must be remembered that, during these thirty years, the tide of European emigration has been pouring in upon us at the rate of hundreds of thousands, to help to swell the numbers of free whites, and that, during the greater part of the same period, we have sent out black emigrants to Liberia. Regarding the accessions to our population from abroad, it would materially reduce the 33¾ per cent. of difference, and show that our black population had multiplied nearly if not quite as fast in a period of thirty years as the white. I regard this as demonstration that there is no just foundation for those charges of cruelty and inhumanity which are constantly put forth to the prejudice of the people of the South. I feel assured that there is no southern State but will legislate still further, if it be necessary, to secure humane treatment to their slaves. I hope, therefore, that our northern brethren will dry up their tears and distress themselves no more.

I have said thus much to vindicate my section of the country against harassing and offensive attacks from those who have only done mischief by attempting to interfere in our concerns. I am no advocate for the institution of negro slavery. I believe its existence in Kentucky to be prejudicial to the best interests of the white population, and if I had the power to colonize and remove every slave within the borders of my own State, I would most cheerfully do it. But I am deeply impressed with the conviction, that to liberate our slaves and retain them among us, either with full or partial privileges as free citizens, would be a calamity which would induce every sane man who could escape, to fly from a society so constituted. The reasons for this opinion I have long since published and printed. I am, therefore, only willing to emancipate upon the condition of colonization. But, when the people of the South propose colonization, how are they met by those of the North? We are told that it is inhuman to expatriate free negroes or slaves, and that the scheme is impracticable. I will endeavor to satisfy all reasonable considerate men that one-half the expenses of the Mexican war invested in a six per cent. stock would, by a proper system of African colonization, in less than fifty years extirpate slavery in the United States. I will give the scheme as applicable to my own State, and if its practicability be demonstrated, the demonstration can easily be applied to every other State. Let a future day be fixed, after which every slave child born shall be the property of the State, for the purpose of colonization.—Place the children when weaned in the hands of those who will raise them—females till they are eighteen years of age, and males until they are twenty-four or twenty-five, and upon their reaching these ages send them to Africa. There, in a few words, is the whole scheme. Now as to its practical operation. By sending off the females as they reached eighteen, the race would become extinct in less than fifty years, with the exception of a few old slaves past the prime of life. The departure of the females as they reached womanhood would put an end to the birth of slaves among us. The extirpation of slavery under such a rule is therefore just as certain as the laws of nature. But it would be slowly accomplished. So much the better on that account, as Africa is not fitted for the reception of all at once, and by doing the thing gradually we should accommodate ourselves, in our labor and habits, to the new state of things slowly yet certainly taking place. Where is the money to come from to defray the expense, and who is to furnish it? The colonization society can charter ships and transport adult colonists and take care of them in Africa, until they are sufficiently well capable of providing for themselves, for which I plead. In their own packet they do it for $50 a head. This information is given to me by Mr. McLain, the secretary of the society. Now, I believe that those to whom the children are bound would, in consideration of their services, readily stipulate to furnish the required outfit. Poor white children are bound out by our laws, and the master or mistress is required to teach them a trade, to educate them, &c. Boys are bound until they arrive at twenty-one years of age, and girls till they reach sixteen. They are to be furnished with three pounds ten shillings in money and a new suit of clothes when their term of service expires. I would lengthen the apprenticeship of male colonists so as to raise the funds necessary. Females being apprenticed until eighteen, would serve two years longer than the period required for white apprenticed girls, and therefore their services would be much more valuable. If the apprentice lived and emigrated to Africa, I would make just compensation to the owner; but if the slave died during the apprenticeship, and before his labor had paid for his raising, then nothing would be due.

Under the foregoing plan how many slaves would it be necessary to transport annually from Kentucky? By the census of 1840 there were 30,818 female slaves in the State between the age of 10 and 24 years. Divide by 14, and it gives 2,201 as the birth the year. Now, the slave children at this time in Kentucky would for the next eighteen years supply annually, in growing up, 2,201 females for transportation. But just as soon as the system goes into operation, there will be fewer children born. After the end of thirty years from its commencement, it may be safely affirmed, there would not be a slave born in Kentucky; after twenty years there would be but few births among the mothers remaining in the country. In the nineteenth or twentieth year of the operation of the system there would be fewer females to transport than in the preceding year, and from that time their numbers would rapidly diminish, until not one in her 18th year could be found for transportation. Now, multiply 2,201 by $50, the sum it costs the colonization society in its own packet, and we have $110,050 only as the sum necessary to be expended annually for the certain and gradual extirpation of slavery in Kentucky. But it may be said it would be cruel in the extreme to send off females without sending males with them. Admit it, and double the expenditure in order to send off an equal number of males, and it only makes $220,100. Under such a state of apprenticeship, and by lengthening the periods of service of the males until they arrived to 24 or 25 years, or even longer if necessary, and requiring them to labor the last four or five years in aid of colonization, I entertain no doubt but our slave population can, by their own labor, without costing our white population one cent, transport, settle, and provide for themselves in Africa. But it must be systematically undertaken and persevered in to do it. Now, sir, the entire female slave population of the United States in 1840, between the ages of 10 and 24, amounted to 390,117 only. By the same rule of calculation we have 27,865 in their 18th year, and of the proper age for colonization. This number multiplied by $50 gives $1,393,250, as the annual expenditure necessary to remove, upon my plan, the whole female slave population of the United States as they reach their 18th year. But, under the idea that humanity requires us to send out an equal number of males, let the expenditure be doubled, and it makes $2,786,500. I said half the expenses of the Mexican war, invested in a six per cent. stock, would accomplish the object. A capital of $50,000,000 would produce annually the sum required, and an excess of more than $200,000 for contingencies. I have thus, sir, only sketched the outline of a plan by which united systematic effort can extirpate slavery. I have no time to go into minute details, and obviate every conceivable objection. Only look at the thousands and hundreds of thousands of foreigners annually landing upon our shores from the old world, and then, sir, reflect that it only requires the removal of 27,865 female slaves annually, at a cost of $1,393,250, and no sane mind can doubt the practicability of the scheme. I have made the calculations upon the census of 1840. The increase of population since then would increase the numbers and expense; but I possess no data upon which to give the increased expenditure required with accuracy. In our unbounded schemes of annexation and dominion, we have nothing to do but to annex Liberia, govern her as a colony until we have located the negro race there, and then separate, leaving her an independent republic. Such a scheme, in its execution, would lead to commercial results magnificent in their development; and, while it would be just as constitutional as other schemes of annexation, would be infinitely wiser, because its motive would be peace and good will to man, instead of war, conquest, and national aggrandizement.

But suppose, Mr. President, colonization is rejected, what is to happen then? You cannot divest slavery, from the influence of certain causes which have heretofore and will continue to operate upon it, producing results beyond the control of human legislation. These have been most ably presented by a citizen of my own State of great attainments, John A. McClung, Esq., in a speech delivered before the Kentucky Colonization Society in January last. Our decennial tables of population prove, that in reference to many States in our Union, slavery has been marked by three distinct stages: the first is when the slave population increases at a greater ratio than the white; the second, when the white population increases at a greater ratio than the slave; and the third when the slave population actually decreases. It is remarkable, too, that these changes have progressed with great regularity, establishing beyond controversy, that when the slave population begins to decrease, it must go on until the causes which produced its decline will ultimately exterminate it. New York and New Jersey together had, in 1790, 32,747 slaves. By the census of 1800 the number of slaves in these two States had increased only eighteen; but there was a decrease in New York of 1,000, and an increase in New Jersey of 999. After 1800 the slaves in both States rapidly declined, until in 1840 there were but 678 left, and now in both States the institution has been abolished. In Delaware the number of slaves has decreased from 8,887 in 1790 to 2,605 in 1840. In Maryland the number of slaves increased until 1810. In 1820 they had decreased from 111,502 in 1810 to 107,398. Thus the number for a period of ten years fell about 4,000. In the next period of ten years the fall was a little more than 9,000, and by the census of 1840 the number had come down to 89,737, exhibiting a diminution in number of 12,457 in the last ten years. In the District of Columbia the number of slaves was 6,377 in 1820, had slightly declined in 1830, and came down to 4,694 in 1840. In Virginia the number of slaves continued to increase until 1830, when they reached 469,757. The census of 1840 exhibits a decline of 29,770. Thus we see that slavery reached its height in the States on the Atlantic, including Virginia and all north and east, and commenced declining, making such progress that those farthest north and east have abolished the institution. In North Carolina in 1830 there were 245,601 slaves. In eighteen hundred and thirty there were 245,817, showing an increase of 216 only; so that slavery for the intervening ten years was upon a stand. In Kentucky, we have passed from the first into the second stage of the institution. The census of 1840, for the first time, showed that our free population had increased by a small but greater ratio than the slave. Since 1840 our slave population has been nearly at a stand. Our lists of taxable property, in which the slaves are annually enumerated, show that in 1847 their number was 189,549; showing an increase of only 7,291 since the census of 1840; or an increase at the rate of about half of one per cent. per annum. There has been no enumeration of the whole of our free population since 1840; but from other facts there is no doubt that our free population has increased during the same period at a much greater rate. In 1839 our free white males over twenty-one years, or the voters of the State, numbered 108,500. In 1847 our voters amounted to 136,915, making an increase at the rate of more than three per cent. per annum for the last eight years. In 1847 we had 173,968 free children between the ages of five and sixteen years; showing an increase of 9,773 in one year. These facts, exhibited in the report of our second auditor, show that our white population in Kentucky is rapidly increasing, while the slave population is nearly at a stand; and they likewise prove that the day is not distant when the number of slaves in Kentucky will begin to decrease as in Maryland and Virginia. Our auditor's report already shows a decrease in the number of slaves in twenty-eight counties in the State, comparing the years 1846 and 1847; and our lists of taxable property prove that there are more than three-fourths of our voters who do not own a slave. These results have in part been produced by an act of the legislature, passed in 1833, prohibiting the introduction of slaves into the State, except brought by emigrants, or when they have been acquired by inheritance. If the convention about to be called in Kentucky should, in the new constitution, provide that the further introduction of slaves should under no circumstances be allowed, such a provision, I have no doubt, would tend to the rapid diminution of the slave population.

There are causes existing in the slaveholding States, independent of human sympathies and legislation, which tend to the removal of slaves from those of them furthest north to those situated furthest south. I will enumerate some of them:

First, and chiefest, slave labor can be more profitably employed in the planting States to the South, in rice, sugar, and cotton-fields, than it can be in the grain-growing and stock-raising regions of the middle States; and hence there is a strong motive of interest and gain to transfer slaves where they can be most profitably employed.

Second. As our free population increases, there will be an increased competition among those seeking employment. This naturally brings down the price of labor, and enables the farmer not only to obtain free labor whenever he wants it, but at such reduced rates as to make it more profitable than slave labor. The inevitable consequence is, that the master's interest requires him to send his slaves further South, into newer soils, where labor is more in demand, and commands higher wages, and produces better crops.

Fourth. The climate and mild temperature of the latitudes below thirty-six degrees are better suited to the constitution and habits of the negro race than those north of that line. I believe the negro is better fitted by nature to labor under a southern sun than the white man. All these causes, combined with others, account for the facts exhibited in our census tables, and they will continue to operate, with the same effect, until the cotton, sugar, and rice lands of the South are fully brought into cultivation and adequately supplied with slave labor. Some unlooked-for revulsion may render slave labor more profitable in corn-fields and meadows. In that event, they will be retained in the grain-growing and grazing States where they now are.

But, sir, the time is rapidly advancing when a crowded population will every where reduce the price of labor, and bring about an active competition among those seeking for employment. Long before our population is as dense as that of Europe slave labor will be undermined, subdued, and expelled by free white labor from all those States of the American Union where the white man is not physically enervated by the climate, and rendered thereby unable to enter into successful competition with the negro. When the means of subsistence are inadequate to the full supply of the wants of a redundant population, it is not difficult to foresee that then the sufferings from hunger will fall with greatest severity upon the slaves; if, indeed, they are not all liberated before that time arrives, from the utter inability of their masters to support them upon the products of an exhausted soil.

Now, sir, I hold it to be the duty of a statesman to contemplate this vast subject in all its aspects before the time arrives when necessity will force it upon our children, if not upon ourselves. I have looked at it, and have come to the conclusion that wisdom and philanthropy might unite upon a system of colonization, calculated in its results to bless the white man and the black, to relieve America of a class whose continuance here I regard as an evil, and whose removal to Africa would, under the providence of the Almighty, civilize and Christianize that savage and pagan continent.

Now, sir, with these views, I think that scattering the slaves we have over wider territory would promote a more rapid decrease of that population in those States where it is now diminishing, and hasten the period when with safety they might imitate the examples of New York and New Jersey. We do not make another slave by spreading them over a larger surface. And as slaveholders have contributed in the war with Mexico their quota of men and money, I hold that it is an act of justice to allow them to participate in the enjoyment of the new territories with their slaves. If it be refused, then the slave population will be confined to the limits of the States where slavery now exists. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DIX] has declared his intention so to confine it, upon the ground that, by the laws of population, slaves would increase faster in the excitement, health, and abundance of new territories than they would if penned up where they are.

The gentleman forgets that the laws of population which operates upon free men do not affect slaves. Free men and women are restrained, and will not readily contract marriage until they have before them reasonable prospects of comfortably providing for a family. Hence difficulty in supporting a family is a great restraint upon marriage, and a check to the increase of free population. But no such considerations as these operate upon the slave; he has no care in providing for wife or children. That is the business of the master, and consequently nothing will check the natural increase of the slave but the existence of such deprivation of physical comforts as to produce disease and death. Happily for the slave population of the South, there is not and has not been anything like physical suffering, for want of food and raiment, so as to produce a general state of disease, and to prevent their increase. It will require a long time yet, I trust, before the southern States are incapable of supporting in comfort their whole population; but the day may, and probably will, come when a superabundant population in the South may feel the pinchings of cold and hunger as they have been felt in starving Ireland. My philanthropy teaches me to look ahead, and legislate with a view to postpone those days of pestilence and famine as far as possible. Hence, I desire to reduce the wilds of Africa to cultivated fields, and by scattering slavery to alleviate its pressure. But the gentleman from New York adopts a contrary policy. He is for damming up and confining it to its present limits, and bringing it to the starvation point as soon as possible. Such is the inevitable effect of his policy; and all this is to be done in the name of liberty and philanthropy, under the sanctimous pretence that free soil is not to be polluted by the feet of slaves! Sir, I believe the true motive is to obtain political power, and to secure the whole of our new territory to the use of the redundant population of the non-slaveholding States, and those who entertain strong prejudices, if not antipathies, against slaveholders. Seeing this, I do not wonder that gentlemen representing southern States suffer their indignation to threaten the dissolution of our Union sooner than submit. Now, sir, for myself I shall make no such threat. I will bear almost anything sooner than dissolve the federal ties which bind the States together as one nation. I do not believe that the idea of preserving the institution of slavery by dissolving our Union has the least soundness in it. On the contrary, the dissolution of the Union would instantly emancipate all the intelligent active slaves in the border slaveholding States. From Kentucky they would cross the Ohio river in droves, and on reaching the northern bank would be as safe as they are when they reach Canada. We should be left with the old and helpless to take care of and the young to raise. The same thing would occur in all the border States. Every one must see that slavery cannot exist, after the dissolution of the Union, in those States relying upon dismembered States which would not deliver up fugitive slaves.

The Union will never be dissolved under the idea of better securing slave property. There is no danger to the Union from that source; but the danger lies in this, that northern members of Congress, northern ministers and members of churches, and the whole northern people, will so accustom themselves to speak and inveigh against southern men, southern institutions, and the entire people of the South as to engender sectional feelings and particular sectional jealousies and animosities; and to establish a public sentiment in favor of separation and non-intercourse, in order to avoid the bitterness and hatred which spring from an association between parties, when on the one side arrogant assumptions of superiority are perpetually manifesting their scorn for the principles and practices of the other. Sir, it is just as impossible, in the nature of things, for confederated States to remain united, as it is for individuals to continue their friendly intercourse after every feeling of mutual respect has been supplanted by mutual contempt and abhorrence. Nor can the citizens of a consolidated government, born and raised under such free institutions as ours, with the most perfect enjoyment of the liberty of speech and of the press, adhere to a common government, when they are divided into sectional factions and feel towards each other nothing but rivalry and hatred. Such a state of affairs will be broken up by revolutions and separation. Your last tables of commerce and navigation show that southern ports sent abroad upwards of twenty millions of dollars in value of domestic products more than were sent from the ports of the non-slaveholding States. The conduct of the northern abolitionists towards the South; the feeling of the North which has burst forth in the formation of a free soil party, with Ex-President Van Buren at its head; the refusal of this Congress to allow slaveholders to emigrate with their slaves to any part of New Mexico or California; and the obstructions by mobs and otherwise to prevent the recovery of fugitive slaves, are powerful agencies in alienating the citizens of the South from those of the North, and generating those sectional feelings which may lead to separation. The South knows her mercantile importance in the trade of the world; she knows that, in point of interest, she can do as well, if not better, without the labor and products of the North than the North can do without the rich products of southern soil and labor. I feel and believe that both sections will flourish best by reciprocal kindness, fraternal toleration, and wise forbearance towards the peculiar institutions, opinions, and laws of each other. Sir, it would promote the pecuniary and commercial interest of the North to allow slaveholders to take their slaves wherever they can be most profitably employed. Such a course would swell the already vast aggregate of the great southern staples, and furnish increased employment for northern ships and sailors, factors and merchants. But this good is to be surrendered, and we are to be influenced by a vague, undefined notion that somebody would be benefited by confining our slaves to their present limits, and the idea that by expansion they would more rapidly fulfil the great command to "multiply and replenish the earth."

But our southern democracy affects to believe that the institution of slavery is only safe under the protection of the veto power of the Executive, and that it is only necessary to elevate General Cass to the Presidency to secure all they desire. Sir, I am opposed to that reliance. I will consent to the exercise of the veto power on the part of the President for any purpose, except to save the constitution from violation, or to produce the reconsideration of some act manifestly passed without deliberation. I will not sustain or create any despotic power in one man, to nullify the deliberate will of a majority of the American people, and before I would become a monarchist, asking protection from the throne, I would sooner dissolve all connexion with those who by their numbers had the power, and who by their votes manifested the disposition, to oppress me. Sir, I shall despair of the republic when the Representatives of the American people in Congress assembled can no longer be trusted, and when we are to look to the President alone for safety.

But how is the veto power to save the South? Suppose (what is hardly supposable) that General Cass should be elected by southern votes, and that Congress should thereafter pass a bill prohibiting slavery in the new territories, and he should place his veto upon such bill, how then shall we stand in respect to New Mexico and California? If anti-slavery members of Congress are sufficiently numerous to pass such a bill, it is utterly hopeless to expect that they will, by the application of the Missouri compromise line, allow the introduction of slavery into these territories south of 36° 30′ north latitude. The consequence is inevitable, that if the veto power of General Cass as President should strike dead the positive action of Congress in prohibiting slavery, then we are to be left without any law upon the subject in those territories, except such as may now exist. The only good the veto power can accomplish, therefore, is to keep these new territories without law upon the subject of slavery, and in that respect to give us precisely the blessings which we can derive from this bill; for by it the power to make laws "respecting slavery" in New Mexico and California is interdicted, and on that subject there is to be no change. I will, sir, what have we been told in the arguments and speech of that profound lawyer from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] who warmly advocates the passage of this bill, notwithstanding his open and avowed hostility to the further extension of slavery? He says, and I believe truly, that it is only necessary to prohibit further legislation on the subject of slavery in California and New Mexico, to exclude slavery from their borders forever. The decrees of Mexico abolishing slavery in these States or Provinces, and all other parts of her empire, have been read at our clerk's table. Now, sir, if things are to remain as they are forever, through the application of Executive vetoes or by the passage of this bill, how is it possible that a slave can be held as such in our newly acquired territories? If it be our "manifest destiny," in our progress of enlarging the "area of freedom," to annex Canada and Ireland, as soon as the deed is done can Kentuckians or Carolinians emigrate into either with their slaves, and hold them as slaves in either of those countries? As a Kentuckian, I should be content and pleased to secure to them the privilege of doing so, upon the ground that, if slavery is a blessing, I was conferring it, and making our new fellow-citizens the happier thereby, and it a curse, that I was only dividing it, and throwing part of the burden from my own shoulders upon those who, as conquered or purchased subjects, might rightfully be compelled to submit to their control. In the latter case, however, I think it would be but an act of liberality to give our new brethren a voice in the matter. I offered to do so, but the proposition was rejected.

The position taken by the Senators from the South who advocate the passage of this bill is, that, in virtue of the constitution of the United States, as soon as a new territory is annexed, any slaveholder may emigrate to it with his slave, and there hold him just as he may do in the State whence he emigrated, although there is no law in the territory annexed tolerating the existence of slavery, and even if the law up to the instant of annexation positively prohibited it. The bill under consideration proposes to submit the truth of that proposition, as a question of law, to the decision of the Supreme Court. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PEELPS] says it is so utterly untenable, so manifestly violative of the plainest principles of national law as laid down by Vattel, and in the decisions of the Supreme Court heretofore pronounced, that he will not hesitate to submit the question to that court. I have my opinion, but if this bill is to pass, I see no propriety, regarding my position, in sustaining that opinion by advancing arguments adverse to a decision in favor of the southern side of the question. It is enough for me to say, that I coincide with the gentleman from Vermont. I believe that slavery cannot exist without law, founded on municipal usage, or statute. I therefore perceive no advantage to the section I represent from the passage of the bill. On the contrary, I apprehend it surrenders everything to the North. I therefore wash my hands of it.

But, Mr. President, let us look at facts, and consider for a moment longer how vain a thing it is to hope for the extension or perpetuation of negro slavery by relying upon the veto power. Look at the preponderance of representatives from the non-slaveholding States in the other branch of Congress. Look at the fact, that the State of Delaware, from her diminished slave population, is just at the point of abolishing slavery, and must in a year or two more imitate her neighbors, New Jersey and Pennsylvania; look at the fact, that even if my proposition to apply the line of 36° 30′ had been accepted, the North, after conceding all the territory south of that line to the use of the slaveholders, would have territory south of that line to the use of the slaveholders, would have an excess of more than half a million of square miles of territory. Look at all these facts, and it is impossible to obscure and hide from our vision the superior political strength of the non-slaveholding States now and forever. They can vote us down, if they will. They can elect a President, if it be their pleasure, who will not veto "Wilmot provisoes." Now, sir, in view of these things, I ask if it is not madness on the part of the South to stake their interests and their peculiar institutions upon an Executive veto, and to be hunting "northern men with southern principles," or with the profession of such principles before the election, as their candidate for the Presidency? Does not every one perceive that such a course on the part of the South is calculated to aggravate the anti-slavery feeling of the North, and to bring upon us those insults, reproaches, and arrogant assumptions which will, unless checked, divide us into sectional parties and ultimately sever the Union?

For myself, I never will adopt such a line of policy. I shall attempt to reason with my fellow-citizens of the North, and their representatives, and when I find reason is vain, that ambition and selfishness are covered under mock philanthropy, and that the condemned institution of slavery, for which the people of my State are no more responsible than those of Massachusetts, has effectually alienated the hearts of northern men and women from the people of the South, I shall look to other reliances than Executive vetoes. I shall refuse to associate in these halls with any set of men who are unwilling to recognize me and those whom I represent as their equals because we hold slaves. Sir, this may be strong language, when I have just acknowledged that the South can never hope to equal the North in political power. Strong as it is, I adhere to it. I will continue no connexion when I am to be dishonered by it.

We are urged to pass the bill reported by the committee as a compromise, and as the only thing which can be agreed upon. We are told that its passage will quiet agitation and give repose. As a compromise, I regard it as conceding nothing whatever to the South. It provides for a lawsuit between master and slave, and gives the right to bring it by appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court. I am unwilling, when I return home and am asked by my constituents whether they can emigrate with and hold their slaves in New Mexico or California, to answer "you may do so at your peril and at the risk of having your slaves manumitted by the decisions of the courts." Who will take slaves there under such discouraging circumstances? Who will incur the costs of the litigation, when the opinions expressed here by the lawyers from the North are unanimous against the master and in favor of the slave; and when, to say the least, the lawyers from the South are divided in opinion? What master so unwise as to risk his slave property under such circumstances, and to incur the certain expense and trouble of litigating with his slaves, as provided for by this bill?

But we are promised peace and quiet, in regard to the question of slavery, after this bill passes. If this bill contains one soporific quality, my alchymistic skill does not enable me to detect it. Sir, it will throw a new, a stimulating ingredient into the effervescing political caldron. What have we already heard in debate? The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN,] speculates upon the workings of that strangely constructed and curious organ, the human intellect, and wonders how it is that in this Senate all the members north of Mason and Dixon's line think one way, and nearly all South the other way, upon the questions which this bill proposes to submit to the decision of the Supreme Court. And then, sir, we have it gravely counted up and ascertained that five of the nine judges of the Supreme Court live south of Mason and Dixon's line. What is all this for, but to suggest to the American people that the Supreme Court will decide, not according to the law of the case, but according to the feelings and wishes of the neighbors of the respective judges, and that they will be influenced by the slaveholding communities in which they live. Well, suppose the judges should decide that the constitution, per se, establishes slavery in California and New Mexico, what then? The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr CORWIN,] will be ready to exclaim, "I told you so; I knew they could not be trusted; I foresaw the wonderful influence which geographical lines possess and exercise over the human intellect!" And what will the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] say? He has already told us that the question was too plain to admit of doubt, and if the court should decide against his view, will he not exclaim, "stupidity, stupidity! corruption, corruption!" And what will the great northern public say and do? Sir, they will denounce the Supreme Court and clamor for Congressional interference to avert the consequences of a corrupt decision. In all these steps I foresee the deepest and bitterest agitations and criminations, and the danger is that they will progress and increase until their intensity melts the bands of union and dissolves society into its original elements. We have power to refer the question to the decision of the Supreme Court, have we not the power to settle it ourselves? In my judgment there is no peace to be had until the American people shall deliberately settle down upon some policy which all parts of the country can adhere to; and it is idle to suppose that a judicial decision, based upon the laws as they now exist in New Mexico and California, will settle what shall be the law in regard to slavery in those territories for all time to come.

Mr. President, when I was a member of the House I voted against all rules which restricted debate upon the subject of slavery. My votes at the commencement of the session show that I have been unwilling to silence any northern Senator, or to prevent the presentation of petitions. I hold that the attempt is preposterous to stifle inquiry or to keep down agitation by restrictions on debate or petitions. Such a course only incenses the public mind. Knowing, as I do, that no moral guilt can attach to the South for the institution of slavery, I have always thought that it was our best policy to say to the North, "talk as much as you please; we are not afraid to hear you, and we are very desirous to understand your designs and plans, so far as they are calculated to affect us." Sir, the discussions upon this bill have demonstrated the designs and plans of the North in reference to slavery. They loom upon our vision like the waterspout of a stormy sea, threatening to burst upon us and sink the ship.

Mr. President, if I know my own heart I feel for the distresses and calamities of all men, and I am not only willing, but consider it a duty to do all I can, in private and in public, to alleviate wretchedness and better the condition of my whole race. But, sir, I have, I trust, no morbid sympathies or antipathies. I feel for the voluntary slave as intensely as I do for the involuntary. What is the man or the woman but an involuntary slave, who, under the grinding poverty of a dense and crowded population, is compelled from necessity to work according to the will of his employer for coarse bread? Nakedness and hunger are as potent stimulants to the starving laborer of the old world as the overseers lash to the involuntary negro slave, and they secure just as abject service. The soldier and the sailor, by their enlistment, subject themselves to the will of their commanders, and may be shot and hung for mutiny or disobedience of orders. It is well that the honors which they acquire in time of war reconcile and compensate them for the hard servitude they contract to perform. In our mercantile marine, the sailor, after his engagement, cannot release himself from the contract, except by personal service; and if he deserts, he may be arrested, confined in jail until the vessel sails, and then delivered up to the master, and compelled to serve during the voyage. The cat-o'-nine-tails secures order and obedience on board the ship. Sir, the world is full of voluntary servitude, forced upon the subjects of it by the inexorable circumstances which surround them and no philanthropist as strong claims for sympathy and legislation as the condition of the involuntary slave from birth. It is the business of a benevolent statesman to regard the actual state of things, and, by his legislation, so to regulate the affairs of society which fall within the scope of his legitimate powers, as shall secure to each class and every individual of each class all the privileges and enjoyments suited to their condition, and which may not be dangerous or incompatible with the safety, welfare, and happiness of the great whole. This is a rule which no one questions when applied to voluntary servitude in the the army and navy and domestic service in families or the avocations of life. We apply the same rule, without objection, to involuntary servitude as it exists in penitentiaries and asylums, and to the relations between parent and child, master and apprentice. Why shall it not be applied to the case of African slavery, as it exists in the United States?

I have indicated my line of policy. I have shown wherein this bill is mischievous, and why it will accomplish nothing. It can do very little harm to postpone action on the subject of territorial governments for New Mexico and California for three or four months, when we shall meet again, after conferring with our constituents, and when we shall be better informed. I have presented a scheme by which, whenever it is the pleasure of the southern States, they can rid themselves of the institution of slavery without feeling the change; and whenever they indicate that purpose, aid from the North in accomplishing the plan adopted by the South will be thankfully received. But all obtrusive interference will be indignantly rejected. Having thus fully explained the position I wish to occupy, I am prepared to vote.

[The debate was continued until late in the evening, by Messrs BUTLER, FOOTE, and WESTCOTT, whose speeches will, at their request, be given in the Appendix.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, then obtained the floor, and said before he proceeded to offer the remarks he intended to offer, and which would apply more particularly to what fell from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. CORWIN] yesterday, he wished to present two amendments to the bill, to remedy the alleged defect in the 24th section, although, in his opinion, there was nothing to prevent the Supreme Court of the United States from taking cognizance of the cases likely to grow up, even if the matter in controversy did not amount to $2,000, should such be the pleasure of Congress; and, as an instance, Congress gave the power of appeal to the Supreme Court, in cases of $200, brought in the District of Columbia.—Mr. J. read his amendments, which stated, that cases brought for the recovery of slaves, shall be brought before the Supreme Court free of costs to the slave. He moved further to amend the 26th section, so as that the prohibition, in the cases of California and New Mexico, against legislating on the subject of slavery shall be confined to African slavery, whereby the said territories will be left free, if so disposed, to act in the suppression of peon slavery, or slavery for debt. Mr. J. said he would prefer, now (6 o'clock P. M.) to address the Senate upon these propositions and the general subject, if they were willing to hear him.

Mr. CLAYTON moved that the Senate adjourn; and the yeas and nays being ordered, it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Bradbury, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dix, Dodge, Greene, Hamlin, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Jones, Mangum, Metcalfe, Moor, Pearce, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, Wales, Westcott, and Yulee—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Borland, Bright, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Douglas, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Mason, Miller, Rusk, Sebastian, Turney—20.

Whereupon,

The Senate adjourned.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to furnish the Senate with an account of the gross amount paid or allowed each officer, or person whose name appears in the Army Register for the current year, and also to inform the Senate why such information is not contained in the Army Register for the present year, agreeably to the requirements of a resolution of the House of Representatives passed February 16th, 1843.

Fremont in Oregon and California, with a view to develope the geography of those countries, and to discover the practicable lines of communication, by railroad or otherwise, between the valley of the Mississippi and the Pacific ocean; the results of the original explorations to be published under the direction of Congress, as a national work, without copyright.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE LEGISLATURE OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. WALKER presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, instructing the Senators, and requesting the representatives of that State in Congress, to use their influence to procure the insertion of a provision in the organic law of any territory now held, or which may hereafter be acquired by the United States, prohibiting the introduction of slavery or involuntary servitude in such territory except as a punishment for crime.

The resolutions were read, and it was

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives granting a pension to William Pittman, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

RECESS.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to proceed to the consideration of the motion submitted by him yesterday, that the Senate take a recess this day from 4 to 5 p. m.

Mr. HANNEGAN said he would modify the motion, so as to read from "four to six."

Mr. BERRIEN thought the resolution very well as it was; one hour was sufficient.

Mr. HANNEGAN wished to give time to those who lived at a distance from the capitol, and he did not think two hours too long a period, but he would modify it so as to read from "four to half-past five."

Mr. BENTON desired to inquire if the resolution was offered with a view to a night session; for if so, he should oppose it. It was bad enough to be here all day during the dog-days, without adding in the "dog-nights;" besides being subjected to the effluvia arising from unpleasant gas.

Mr. HANNEGAN said his sole object was to have some disposition made of this bill, in order that the session might be brought to a close. According to present appearances, it seemed as if the session was about to reverse the order of nature, "that all earthly things must have an end." It was not likely that this bill would be disposed of without a night session, and we might as well go to-night as to-morrow night.

Mr. UPHAM said, if it was intended to press this important measure through with such precipitancy, it was the most extraordinary course he had ever witnessed. No Senator could be more desirous than himself to bring the session to a close; but he owed it to his constituents and to himself to give his views on the bill. He had not been very eager to obtain the floor, for he always felt a reluctance to enter into a competition to catch the attention of the chair, and, therefore, others had obtained the opportunity, when he desired to speak. He thought it hard, however, that while some of the friends of the measure had spoken twice and thrice, he should be compelled to address the Senate in the evening, when every man was worn down and exhausted. His state of health did not permit him to do this. He did not often address the Senate, and when he did, it was with great brevity. To others he had listened with great pleasure, and he did not think it unreasonable, if he claimed for himself a hearing on a subject of such great importance, in which not only his own constituents, but the whole of the non-slaveholding community, were so deeply interested.

Mr. CLAYTON hoped that his friend from Vermont would have ample opportunity to address the Senate during the day. He was perfectly satisfied that there was no disposition among the friends of the bill to prevent any Senator from being heard. But it was very desirable to have the bill disposed of in one way or another, and without delay. Congress had been already in session nearly eight months, and every one must see the propriety of bringing it to a close. He expressed his willingness to vote for the resolution.

Mr. MANGUM asked if it was reasonable that a question of such immense magnitude, and which was presented to Congress in an entirely new aspect, should be thus precipitated to a decision. There was great interest and excitement throughout the whole country, in relation to this subject; and he should exceedingly regret to see it pressed through when the Senate was in a complete state of exhaustion. Many members were in an enfeebled state of health, and could not endure a late sitting; and to urge the measure, under such circumstances, seemed to be a denial of their rights. It was very well to say it was desirable to terminate the session, and all that—and all that! But he would say to Senators, there was a prodigious excitement throughout the country, and they would be held responsible for the consequences of haste or error. Still, he was ready to acquiesce in the decision of the Senate; but he would again suggest that it would be unwise to precipitate the measure, without allowing proper time for deliberation and discussion.

Mr. HANNEGAN contended that this was no new principle which was under consideration. It was the same that had been before the country for three years. The subject had been exhausted, and he was exhausted, and he thought the Senate must be wearied.

Mr. NILES said, he supposed this resolution constituted a part of the much talked of compromise, in which the bill was said to have been framed. It was all of apiece—a compromise entirely for the benefit of one party, whilst the other was to take nothing. One party here, relying on its numerical strength, had magnanimously come to a conclusion that no one should be permitted to debate the question, except those who were friendly to the bill;—and in this spirit, even on the day when the bill was introduced, it was attempted to press it through. Now, he believed it was the usual practice, whenever a majority had determined to push a bill through, and "to sit it out," that they carefully refrained from taking any part in the debate themselves.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Will the Senator allow me? I withdraw the resolution. I withdraw it, sir. Any thing to stop debate, and prevent further delay.

Leave being granted, the motion was withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Finance.

An act for the relief of Alfred White.

An act for the relief of the heirs of Moses White.

THE COMPROMISE BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial governments of Oregon, California, and New Mexico.

The question pending was upon the motion by Mr. HALE to amend the bill by striking of section 5, in lines 1 and 2, the words "free white," and inserting after the word "act," in the 4th line, the words: "and qualified to vote by the existing laws now in force in the territory of Oregon, under the authority of the provisional government established by the people thereof."

Mr. WALKER gave notice of an amendment which he proposed to offer to the sixth section, which was, to strike out the words "nor shall the lands or other property of non-residents be taxed higher than the lands or other property of residents."

[Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, addressed the Senate at length in explanation of the amendments offered by him, and in an exposition of his views upon the important subjects presented by the bill. A report of his speech will be given in the Appendix.]

Mr. BADGER.—I am very sorry that my honorable friend who reported this bill, [Mr. CLAYTON,] felt himself compelled, by considerations of duty, under the influence of which I know he always acts, here and elsewhere, to press the measure through the Senate, and to prevent, so far as depended on his action and influence, a full, ample, and thorough investigation of the subject in all its bearings. What is the character of the measure? It is a proposal to settle a most difficult and anxiously considered subject, upon a plan entirely novel—one heretofore proposed by no one, and, so far as is known, thought of by no one. It is a measure of immense importance, relating, as it does, to a subject in itself of vast concern and complicated by many incidental difficulties. Now, it does seem to me, that when the gentlemen composing the committee, after the various diversities of opinion among themselves, which were stated by my friend from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] at last hit upon and concluded to present, as a compromise, a measure before unknown and unconjectured, it was due to the importance of the occasion—the high, solemn, and lasting interest at stake—and, in an eminent degree, due to this body itself, that, instead of being introduced to us with a significant notification that it was to be pressed through in hot haste—

Mr. CLAYTON, (in his seat.)—Nothing of the kind.

Mr. BADGER.—I will show there was, though perhaps it was not intended. I was about to say, when interrupted by the Senator, that in these circumstances, instead of such an announcement being made to the Senate, we should have been informed that the committee, unable to agree upon any thing else, and acting from the best motives, had thought proper to present a new and unheard of plan of pacification on this momentous question, that they desired no haste; that, on the contrary, they invoked from every member of the Senate the fullest scrutiny; that they not only wished and hoped, but demanded as due to themselves, the Senate, and the country, the application, on the part of every member of the body, of his best understanding to this subject, and a full, deep, thorough and searching investigation of the plan presented, in all parts and bearings; that full time should be afforded to enable Senators both to reflect and to debate; and that, so far from the usual order of the Senate being reversed, and this question pressed upon a weary and exhausted Senate—motions to adjourn, after a continued sitting of seven and eight hours, resisted, and the yeas and nays demanded—no opportunity for deliberation and discussion would be withheld.

My honorable friend from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] says that no intention was announced to press this measure through in haste. If by that he means that no such terms were used, he is undoubtedly correct. But, in point of fact, how stands the matter? My friend announced that he would press this bill upon the consideration of the Senate. It was first called up, if I recollect aright, on Saturday afternoon; and, after a long and laborious session, my honorable friend resisted a motion for adjournment, and on the yeas and nays, voted against it. The Monday after was spent in the consideration of the bill, and precisely the same result took place. My honorable friend in charge of the bill, to whom its friends naturally looked for the course they ought to pursue upon motions for adjournment, still declined to adjourn. Yes, after a session of full seven hours, nearly eight, I may add, when my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] rose to address the Senate, himself a member of the committee; when many Senators were exhausted, and some prostrated; and when even I, with a constitution of iron, and youth besides on my side, felt some respite to be necessary, a motion to adjourn was carried, upon the yeas and nays, against the vote of my friend from Delaware. The proceeding was, in my opinion, unfortunate—very unfortunate—though I attribute nothing of impropriety of intention to the gentleman, or those who acted with him.

Mr. CLAYTON.—It is very extraordinary that the gentleman does not recollect that when the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who was exhausted and unwell, desired the Senate to adjourn, I, in opposition to the wishes of the friends of the bill, expressed a cesire that the motion might succeed, and gave it my support. That the gentleman calls "hot haste."

Mr. BADGER.—Unfortunately the honorable gentleman confounds two different cases. I know that the gentleman assented to the motion to adjourn last evening, for the accommodation of my friend Maryland; but how was it when my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] who was supposed to be opposed to the bill, desired an adjournment for his accommodation? It was to this case that I referred. Allow me, sir, to add what I was about to say when interrupted by the honorable gentleman, that I regard his course as peculiarly unfortunate with regard to such a bill as this. The great end and object of the bill, as avowed by the gentleman and the committee, is to pacify the public mind, to settle this agitating subject, and to restore harmony to the country. How? Only by its moral power. You cannot change the opinion, or settle the discontents of free America, by the mere force of law. On occasions of this kind, it is all important that the moral influence which accompanies a measure, should be as extensive as possible in its operation; and therefore, I think, there should have been shown no disposition to cut off any gentleman from a discussion of the question, by pressing a vote here until the physical energies of the Senate should be broken down, and the members be compelled by exhaustion to submit. This is the long session, and the Senate have refused to fix any day for its termination; and, therefore, there is no excuse, in my judgment, for the course which has been pursued. The session, it is true, has been a very long one; and the weather is very hot and exhausting. I am as anxious as any gentleman to return to my home and my children, but I see no reason why this great and important measure should be hurried through the Senate. If, indeed, the Senate had passed the resolution from the House, and the House had adopted its amendment fixing the final day of adjournment for the 31st, we should have stood in a very different condition. In that case, I should myself have given a silent vote, or should, at most, have made a very brief statement of the grounds upon which I have formed an opinion adverse to the passage of the bill. But, under present circumstances, with an unlimited session before us, I feel justified in presenting my views fully and at large. I shall undertake to show that this compromise measure, which my honorable friend has reported and recommends, involves a total and absolute surrender, on the part of the South, of whatever rights, feelings, or interest we may have in the subject, without any advantage being gained thereby to us, or to the country.

Mr. President, on the first day of June, in this present year of salvation one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, a speech was delivered by an honorable member of the other House, representing a district in my own State, which I find in a pamphlet published in this city, and entitled, "Speech of Hon. A. W. Venable, of North Carolina, in the House of Representatives, June 1, 1848," and headed, "Slavery in the Territories." In this speech are some remarks in reference to myself, and I read them because, as the Senate will see, they have an immediate connexion with the subject under consideration. The passage will be found, [on important subjects I like to be precise,] on the 7th page, near the foot of the left hand column, and is in these words:

"A distinguished Senator of my own State, [Mr. BADGER,] a gentleman of high attainments and extended reputation, in a recent speech on the Oregon bill admitted the right of Congress to legislate for the exclusion of slavery in the territories, but placed the Santa Fe upon the principle of expediency and the sense or justice of the federal legislature."

Now, to those who are curious in such matters, it may be somewhat interesting to learn, that in this speech, distributed in North Carolina about the middle of this month,* and delivered, as stated on its face, on the first day of June, reference is made in the passage which I have read to some remarks submitted by me in the Senate upon the second day of the same month of June. My first impression was, that the gentleman was incorrect in his chronology; but before committing myself on this point, I thought I would follow the example commended to us by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] several times this session, and have a peep at the dictionary to ascertain what this world "chronology" means. I found that I was mistaken in my first notion; for the definition of "chronology" is satisfied by arranging events according to the proper year; and, therefore, the gentleman was guilty of no violation of chronology when he represented himself as referring on the first of June to what was said on the second, both days being in the same year. Some persons, on reading this reference in the speech to my remarks, and finding, from the proceedings and debates of the Senate, that I had not said one word on the subject until after the speech was made, might suppose that a slight inaccuracy had crept in, and that those remarks were not made at all in the House of Representatives on the first of June, which refer, as a past event, to a speech of mine, made on the second of June, but were inserted for the first time in the printed speech in the month of July; but I draw no such inference. The whole matter may be satisfactorily explained without any such uncharitable supposition. In ancient times, when the prophetic spirit descended upon a man, the seer, "rapt into future times," often saw events with such force and distinctness, that in prophetic strain, he spoke of them as past already.

Again: This is the age of progress. In the olden time, it was said that "coming events cast their shadows before;" and now, in the mighty improvements of the day, amidst the wonders of steam and electricity, it may well be that "coming words cast their sounds before!" And thus it happened that my colleague of the House, in the dark hour of midnight, had his spirit troubled with a vision so clear of the atrocity which I should commit on the second of June, that it became impressed upon his mind as a past event, and, as such, he alluded to it on the first. And then, his patriotic horror, in this clear foresight or forehearing of my offence, impelled him to make a pious appeal to heaven in these words, immediately following those which I have quoted:

"Gracious heaven! are we reduced to this? Is our only hope here the verdict of a jury whose interest, whose feelings, and whose organization fit that verdict against us?"

And a little after, still referring to me, he exclaims—

"And do southern statesmen sound the first note of retreat? Does the flag fall last in their hands?"

Now, as I intend to advance again that atrocious sentiment which, delivered by me on the second day of June, awakened the prophetic horror of my colleague of the House on the first, and as his speech, no doubt with the kindest feelings towards me, was printed and circulated extensively in the State of North Carolina, the Senate will see why I have made this reference, and that it is demanded of me, as a matter of respect and grateful consideration to him that I should state the grounds on which my opinion rests; an opinion, by the expression of which I have, according to his phrase, "sounded the first note of retreat" from a position which I have never assumed, and thrown down a flag which I never raised.

In order to a full understanding of my views, it is necessary that I should go back a little in the argument, and show that this government has a right to acquire territory, and whence that right is derived. Upon this point different opinions have been expressed. My friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] in a very able speech on this subject, treated this as a casus omissus in the constitution, held the power to acquire an assumed one, and the right to govern as a consequence, merely, of the acquisition. In my opinion, the power to acquire territory is expressly conferred upon the government of the United States by the constitution. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, has power to make treaties. Congress has power to declare war. The constitution specifies no particular kind of treaties, as included in or excluded from the grant. Nor does it specify the purpose for which war is to be waged, or the manner in which it is to be concluded, but leaves these as necessary incidents to the treaty-making and war-making powers respectively. Again, the constitution has not only omitted any express restriction upon the treaty-making power, but declares that "all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." Whatever limitations, therefore, may from the necessity of the case be inferred—as, for instance, that a treaty cannot be made to destroy the government or the constitution, or any integral part of them, or to introduce any new element of political power—it is certain that the treaty-making power is subject to no express limitation whatever. When the constitution was formed, various kinds of treaties were known among nations; and all these were undoubtedly included in the granted power. Among these were treaties of cession, by which the United States might acquire as well as cede territory. The power is a large one, and the limitations upon it, whatever they may be, have not yet been defined or applied. The extent of this power may be judged from a few instances furnished by the history and practice of the nation.

First. By treaty the President and Senate can exercise a power expressly conferred upon Congress. For example, they can regulate commerce, and confer citizenship. Again, by treaty the United States can exercise a power not conferred upon the general government at all, but undoubtedly reserved to the States. Of this examples are found in the treaties with France and the Netherlands, by which the subjects of those powers were enabled to succeed to the inheritance of lands in the United States without becoming naturalized, and thereby the laws of the States excluding aliens from the succession were repealed and abrogated. Again, by treaty the United States can set up a demand for a debt which has been by due course of law paid and satisfied. This was done with regard to the British debts which had been rightfully confiscated by State authority during the revolutionary war, and the amount paid into the treasuries of the respective States. And, again, by treaty the United States may acquire authority to erect judicial tribunals and confer judicial power within the territory of a foreign and independent nation. Of this we have an example in the bill now on our table—to erect such tribunals and confer such power—to be exercised in the empire of China. It seems, therefore, to follow necessarily, as well from the express grant of power as from the practice of the government, that the President and Senate, by treaty, may acquire territory for the United States. When that acquisition is made, by the exercise of the power thus granted, the constitution confers expressly upon Congress the power to legislate for the government of the territory so acquired. For it confers on Congress the power "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the "powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." To my understanding it is therefore plain that, by the treaty-making power, we have express authority to acquire territory; and, by the provision I have cited, Congress has express authority to legislate for it when acquired. Now, sir, upon this power, what are the restrictions, and where are they to be found? There are plainly none in the constitution itself. It is one thing for us to think that certain restraints upon the exercise of this power would be convenient, would at this particular time be reasonable, would subserve the interests of that section of the country in which we happen to live, or, if you please, the general interests of the whole; and it is another and a very different thing to show an actual restriction upon the power itself. The former relates to a just and proper mode of exercising authority, and addresses itself to those in whom the power is vested. The other implies an actual exclusion of the power, which leaves nothing for the exercise of discretion at all. The honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] remarked that, although it seemed to him an absurdity to deny Congress the power to govern the territory, yet that power must be exercised in subordination to some general rule given in the constitution. He undertook to specify one case, and certainly it was a very unhappy illustration of the rule he had laid down. He was very unhappy illustration of the rule he had laid down. He was a very unhappy illustration of the rule he had laid down. He was a very unhappy illustration of the rule he had laid down. He was a the source from which the right of acquisition is derived, and the nature and extent of the power over what is acquired. In delivering the opinion of the court in that case, Chief Justice Marshall says:

"The constitution confers absolutely on the government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties; consequently, that government possesses the power of acquiring territory either by conquest or by treaty. If it be ceded by the treaty, the cession must be made in the form which is recognised by the nation from which it comes. The language used in the treaty of cession, or in any other public act necessary to consummate the transfer, must be interpreted according to the usage of the United States, which has been, to conform to the stipulations of the treaty. The words which have been used in the treaty ceding Louisiana, and which are similar to those used in the treaty ceding Florida, are well understood. They have never been supposed to convey political rights, which are not secured to the inhabitants of the ceded country until they are admitted into the Union. They are associated with the right to property, and secured to the inhabitants of Louisiana to the same extent that property held under the Spanish government was secured. But the political rights were to depend entirely on the will of congress. Whether they would grant the whole, or any part, or none, depended on their own view of the condition and circumstances of the people. This is a political question in which the judicial department has no concern. The same words have been used in treaties by which other territory has been acquired, and the universal understanding of the American people, as well as the practice of their government, explains the meaning of the words. Congress has never thought itself bound to admit all the territory acquired, into the Union, but has always conceived itself at liberty to admit such portions of it as they thought expedient. The relations between the territory thus acquired and the United States, resulting from the power of congress over it, and the limitations on that power, are considered in the case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter, 1 Peters's Rep. 511. There the court says that the province of Florida may maintain the character of a distinct political society, and remain a territory of the United States for any length of time, retaining its own laws, until Congress shall think proper to change them. Different modes of thinking exist on the subject of slavery, but it is impossible to doubt the power of congress over the territory ceded by France, after the cession has been made, and before the relation subsisting between France and her colony is changed. The act of taking possession may perhaps be considered as changing the relation between the parties. The majority of the court may think that slaves are property, as well as any other property, and may consider the act of congress which prohibits a man from holding property of a particular description throughout a large territory, as a prohibition to settle there with property of that description. Be this as it may, the power of congress seems to be universally conceded to include the power to prohibit the introduction of slaves, and to be limited only by the treaty by which the country was acquired."

Mr. Justice Johnson, in his opinion, delivered in the same case, when in the circuit court, thus expresses himself:

"The next, the only, inquiring relates to the limit incidental to the treaty making power, and, perhaps, to the power of admitting new States into the Union. And the government of such acquisition is of course left to the legislative power of the United States, as to every other power in relation to it. By the latter we comprehend positively or exclusively under the Union, the power of acquisition or cession, and of course of such acquisitions, I see nothing in which the power acquired over the ceded territories can vary from the power acquired under the law of nations by any other government over acquired or ceded territory."

Now, sir, here is, if I can understand it, a clear and decided opinion of the court, delivered by the eminent man who at that time presided over its deliberations, and who was himself the embodiment of all judicial excellence—that, under the treaty and war powers, the United States have, under the constitution, the right to acquire territory; that they acquire it upon the same terms as any other nation; and that it is subject, in their hands, to such terms and conditions as they may deem proper to impose, subject only to such restrictions, if any, as may be contained in the treaty of cession. Now, how do we expect, after this decision, to procure from the Supreme Court of the United States an adjudication that, independently altogether of legislation by Congress, the instant any territory becomes ours, the institution of slavery goes there by the mere force of the constitution of the United States? Gentlemen say that every American citizen has a right to go into the newly acquired territory. It is needless to examine that, for no one proposes to exclude them. But it is another and different question, whether he has a right to carry a slave there, and, because the slave was recognized as property in the State from which he came, to insist that, therefore, such slave shall be recognized as property in the territory to which he goes. The affirmative of the question cannot, in my opinion, be maintained. Suppose, which is not at all unlikely, that within a few years we should follow the example of Great Britain, and procure the cession of some station or post within the dominions of the Emperor of China, in order more effectually to promote our commerce and protect our citizens in that country, could it be maintained that, instantly upon the cession, from the nature of our constitution itself, negro slavery would spring up and become a recognized institution there? This would seem to be absurd. Yet it stands upon the same arguments, applying with equal force, upon which rests the alleged constitutional propagation of slavery into these Mexican territories. Sir, the inquiry must present itself, whether slavery was an institution of the territory before, in point of fact, any slave was carried there by one of our citizens. If so, then the slave carried would be recognized as property in the State from force of its own institution, and not that of the State from which the slave was brought. Thus, in my own State, though, in point of fact, there were not a single slave to be found to-day, still slavery would be a recognized institution of the State; and the man who should go there with his slave to-morrow, would not carry any new institution with him, but would merely carry there a recognized subject of property under the existing law.

Now, it seems to me, that the gentlemen whose opinions I oppose must maintain one of two things: either that by force of the constitution of the United States the moment territories are acquired slavery becomes there a recognized institution, or else, that whether it will be an institution of the territory or not depends upon the fact whether or not a slave shall be carried there; that, when carried, the law of slavery springs up, and when removed the law ceases. Now, sir, this latter proposition seems to me an absurdity. The law which recognizes slavery must exist, or can exist, independently of the conduct of individuals; and as, in my judgment, the constitution does not of itself establish slavery where it did not exist, we must, in order to ascertain its existence or non-existence after our acquisition, resort to the previous law.—There seems to be some doubt, as I collect from the remarks of honorable Senators on this subject, what was the state of the law in the territories acquired from Mexico. By some it is alleged that all slavery was absolutely prohibited; by some, that a species of slavery, called peon servitude, existed under certain modifications, about which gentlemen are not agreed; but it is conceded on all hands, that African slavery, as recognized in certain States of the Union, was not an institution recognized in these Mexican territories.

Now, I hold upon this concession, that the law in Mexico not having recoized slavery as it exists with us, such slavery stands prohibited in Mexico until it shall be allowed by law. Nothing, I apprehend, is clearer than that, by the acquisition of a territory, whether it forms a part or the whole of a foreign nation—whether subdued by arms or ceded by treaty—no laws are repealed except those which are inconsistent with the relations which the subjugated people bear to their new sovereign; that such acquisition implies only a change of dominion and allegiance—a transfer of legislative authority and executive control; and that all laws not necessarily inconsistent therewith remain in full force until the new sovereign shall modify, alter, or abolish them. On this subject Vattel thus expresses himself:

"The fundamental regulation that determines the manner in which the public authority is to be exercised is what forms the constitution of the State. In this is seen the form in which the nation acts, in quality of a body politic, how and by whom the people are to be governed, and what are the rights and duties of the governor." "The laws are regulations established by public authority, to be observed in society." "The laws made directly with a view to the public welfare are political laws, and in this class those that concern the body itself and the being of the society, the form of government, the manner in which the public authority is to be exerted; those, in a word, which together form the constitution, or fundamental law. The civil laws are those that regulate the rights and conduct of the citizens among themselves."

Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, in the case to which I have before referred, speaking of the effect produced by the cession of territory, says:

"On such transfer of territory it has never been held that the relations of the inhabitants with each other undergo any change. Their relations with their former sovereign are dissolved, and new relations are created between them and the government which has acquired their territory. The same net which transfers their country transfers the allegiance which was before due to the former sovereign, and substitutes political tie is necessarily changed, although that which regulates the intercourse and general conduct of individuals remains in force until altered by the newly created power of the State."

And again, in the same opinion, he says:

"Upon the cession of territory to the United States, the relations subsisting between the people and their former sovereign are changed," because the new relations between the territory and its new sovereign; that the necessity of the case alone produces any change; and that all other laws, whether described as the municipal laws, the civil laws, or the laws regulating "the rights and conduct of the citizens among themselves," remain in force until altered by the new sovereign.

Now, sir, it is agreed by all the writers on national law, by all judges who have treated upon this subject, that slavery owes its existence to positive law, to municipal law; that, independently of law authorizing it, it does not exist any where; from which it necessarily follows, that whether African slavery be expressly prohibited in these territories or not, it does not exist unless by their law it be allowed, which no one pretends. Whether it shall be introduced or its exclusion continued depends, in my judgment, upon the will of Congress. If nothing be done by Congress, it remains excluded, and their power over the subject is complete and perfect. It seems to me that some confusion has resulted in the views of gentlemen upon this subject, from the fact that we heretofore have not made acquisitions of territory except with a view to the formation of States; but we have just as much power to acquire territory and keep it in perpetual pupilage as we have to bring it into the Union as a State. Our right to acquire springs out of the treaty power and the war power, and when we acquire we are to decide for ourselves what shall be done with what has become ours, by cession or by conquest. If we should obtain that El Dorado of some gentlemen, the island of Cuba, would we be bound to admit it into our Union? By no means. We should have a right to keep it as a territory, a province, and regulate it as we please. And if we deemed it best for the interest of the United States, we might rightfully so keep it, even, to use an extravagant phrase, "to the last syllable of recorded time." The constitutional restrictions were intended to protect us against our own government; they were intended to regulate us among ourselves, to define and distribute the powers which exist between the United States and the several States, and to secure to the States and to the people powers not granted to the United States. There is not an article which looks to the restraint of power, except as it is to be exercised over us; not an article designed to shorten our hands or diminish the aggregate of our power in contending externally with foreign territory. Therefore, I hold, that among those subjects falling within the constitutional power of Congress, is the entire regulation of such territory as we may acquire, to make such laws for it as we may think best, and to give it a political organization of such kind and with such restraints and limitations as we may prescribe. Within this power is included the introduction or exclusion of slavery, according to our own judgment, entirely independent and irrespective of the wishes of the people of the territory or any body else. My friend from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN,] in his speech yesterday, stated that I was the only gentleman sustaining the same relation to the subject upon this floor who entertained this opinion. Since that remark was made, my friend from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has expressed the same opinion; and I hazard nothing in saying that the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] now in my eye, than whom no man is more capable of forming a sound judgment, holds the same opinion without qualification. If I do him injustice, I hope he will say so. The opinion is by no means novel. Why, sir, when the bill admitting Missouri passed the House, it contained an express provision, as a fundamental condition on which that State was to be admitted, that slavery should be excluded. When the bill came into the Senate that provision was stricken out, and the Missouri compromise, excluding slavery from the territory north and west, was agreed to; and so far were southern members from having discovered at that time that Congress had no power over the subject, the amendment was adopted apparently without a division, at all events, without the yeas and nays; no southern member appearing to have thought it necessary or important to record his vote. Nor was this an instance of hasty and inconsiderate action. Among the southern Senators present on that occasion was the late William Pinckney. It would be idle for me to say here, or any where in the United States, who William Pinckney was, or to what respect his opinions are entitled. In a letter written to his son-in-law, and preserved in his life by Mr. Wheaton, he said:

"The bill for the admission of Missouri into the Union without restriction as to slavery may be considered as passed. That bill was sent back from the House with the restriction as to slavery. The Senate voted to amend it by striking out the restriction, 22 to 15; and proposed, as another amendment, [which I have all along been the advocate of,] a restriction upon the vacant territory to the north and west as to slavery."

Now, here we learn that Mr. Pinckney voted for this exclusion of slavery from the territory, not reluctantly, because nothing better could be obtained, but because he had all along been an advocate of it, and must, therefore, have thought it both constitutional and expedient.

Mr. KING.—Does the Senator intend to convey the idea that Mr. Pinckney was in favor of a restriction upon a State entering the Union by which slavery was to be excluded from it?

Mr. BADGER.—Why, certainly not. He says directly the contrary.

Mr. KING.—That he was opposed to any restriction upon the State of Missouri?

Mr. BADGER.—Let me state again what Mr. Pinckney said: That he was opposed to the restriction upon the State, but that he was in favor of the restriction upon the territory north and west of the State.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I believe Mr. Pinckney was an abolitionist.

Mr. BADGER.—I hope that the honorable Senator, having made a remark of that kind with reference to a distinguished gentleman, once a member of this body and now in his grave, will give us some proof it, or retract it.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The fact is as I have stated,

Mr. BADGER.—The very paper which I read refutes the charge that Mr. Pinckney was an abolitionist.

Mr. CALHOUN.—No charge was preferred. I only stated that Mr. Pinckney is known to have entertained views favorable to abolition.

Mr. BADGER.—If he had been an abolitionist, he would have been in favor of excluding slavery from the State of Missouri. But let me add, that with regard to the opinion of Mr. Pinckney on this subject, it cannot be in the slightest degree important whether he was an abolitionist or not. If Mr. Pinckney was in favor of abolishing slavery, he must nevertheless have understood the difference between his wishes as to what should be done, and the power of this government to do it. I must therefore infer, out of a decent respect, to say nothing of a high admiration, for the extraordinary ability and legal acumen of that gentleman, that he did not doubt the power of Congress when he wrote that letter. Sir, he could not be excused, his moral character could not be preserved, he would stand charged in his grave with having violated his oath, and committed foul wrong upon the constitution of his country, if he had advocated and voted for that restriction—permanent, perpetual, and looking to all time—while he doubted the power of Congress to impose it. If Mr. Pinckney's opinion upon the propriety of abolishing slavery, referred to by the Senator from South Carolina, is supposed or understood to have any effect in determining what his judgment was, or impairing the weight of that judgment as authority, I must say it was referred to to no purpose.

Mr. CAHOUN.—It was stated for what it is worth.

Mr. BADGER.—Well, then, it is worth nothing.*

I stand upon this subject on what I understand to be the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, and upon the opinion of the southern statesmen who adorned this Senate at the time of the Missouri compromise. I stand upon the theory and practice of the government upon this subject; and occupying this position, I am called upon to vote for a bill by which, in my opinion, the South makes a total surrender of all the interests and wishes of her people in this question. We are to submit to the judgment of the Supreme Court to determine whether, by virtue of anything in the constitution of the United States, the moment these territories become ours by treaty the institution of negro slavery is established, in them. Now, I have not the remotest idea that the Supreme Court will ever hold the affirmative of that question. I look upon the bill as calling upon me, representing, with my honorable colleague, the interests of one of the southern States, to make this total surrender on her behalf. If gentlemen will show me what we are to gain by that surrender, if they will point out to me any countervailing advantages, if they will make me understand how, upon the principle of compromising a disputed question as to the disposing of these territories, I shall surrender the whole to the opposite party, I shall be able to give this measure my support. My friend from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] has said that we only asked to save our honor. Sir, I would be just as willing, so far as the interests of my constituents are concerned, to vote for a bill in terms excluding slavery, and should think it more manly to do so. In my judgment, a total surrender on the part of the South would follow as effectually from the passage of this bill, as if the Wilmot proviso, or any other form of exclusion, were adopted. How, then, is my honor saved? If I am disposed to give up, on any consideration I am willing to yield the interests and feelings of my constituents, why not do so at once? I can see nothing on the score of honor to be gained by this measure.

Mr. BUTLER.—As I have had some of the difficulties under which the Senator from North Carolina appears to labor, I beg to ask him what would be the state of our rights in New Mexico and California, if the laws now in force there were left unchanged? Can he point out any mode by which our rights would be more secure, without repealing the laws now in force?

Mr. BADGER.—I think I could point out a very just and equitable mode, which would save the honor of all the parties to this agitating question. We have, however, now to do with the measure before us, which is recommended to me, as I have remarked, because it saves our honor. I say, according to my judgment, it saves no such thing.

Mr. BUTLER.—I ask if any other remedy, which has been indicated here, would not be obnoxious to the same objection?

Mr. BADGER.—I think I could mention one. I repeat, sir, that, in my opinion, by this measure we surrender the whole and gain nothing in return. If it were to be the means of putting an end to this dangerous and disorganizing agitation—if it would bring peace and quiet to the country—I would go home among my constituents, appealing to them as citizens descended of the old original thirteen, of whose gallant sons some died upon the battle-fields of the revolution, and others went down to their graves covered with honorable scars, and hundreds and thousands did battle in vindication of their country's cause, I would say to them—to the people amongst whom I was born, amongst whom I have lived, to whose kindness, promotion, and patronage I owe everything of distinction and prosperity that I enjoy, amongst whom I expect to die, amongst whom my children, I trust, will live after I am gone—I would say to them, I made this surrender because I knew your deep devotion to the institutions handed down by our forefathers; because I knew your resolute opposition to everything by which the union of these States may be severed or weakened; because I felt assured that you would justify me in giving up whatever of interest or feeling you might have in this question, in order to preserve the constitution, cement the Union, and perpetuate the freedom of our country.

But have we the least reason to believe that peace and harmony will be the result of the passage of this bill? Sir, we have none. On the contrary, we have convincing evidence that its passage would be the signal for a new and bitter agitation. Sir, I could not stand up before my constituents, patriotic as they are, willing as they are to make large concessions, and tell them that I had voted for a bill by which, in effect, they were excluded from the new territories; by which all their interests were surrendered, and nothing gained in return. Is it not plain that this is so? Do gentlemen from the North accept the surrender in good part? On the contrary, do they not repel it with scorn? And do we not almost [illegible]

Mr. President, I do not regard the surrender of which I have spoken as a matter of such entire insignificence as some gentlemen appear to consider it. We have had various accounts as to California and New Mexico; but, according to the best information I have been able to obtain, there are portions of the former suited to the cultivation of cotton and sugar. If so, it is my deliberate conviction that slaveholders should be allowed to settle there. I do not deny, I have expressly admitted, that Congress has the power to prohibit slavery there. Believing this to be so, I have made no attempt to support the cause of the South by denial or evasion. But I say to our northern friends, that if the country is adapted to the cultivation of cotton and sugar, slaveholders should be allowed to people it, and I desire to obtain for

*Since this speech was delivered, I requested the Hon. James A. Pearce, of Maryland, to ascertain, if he could, from some authoritative source, the true opinions of Mr. Pinckney on slavery, in order to vindicate him, who, I deemed, an imputation upon his memory. Mr. Pearce wrote, in consequence of this request, to William Pinckney, Esq., of Baltimore, the only Senator [illegible] from whom he could obtain an answer, the following extract from which I have received. Mr. Pearce, in publishing the correspondence, has made to Mr. Calhoun's error was derived, and correct the error:

"It is very true that, in the speech made by my father in the Legislature of Maryland, when a very young man, there are expressions which might give slight grounds of suspicion for the inference which Mr. Calhoun has arrived at; but surely his speech on the Missouri question, delivered in the full maturity of his years, would annihilate any supposition of his being an abolitionist."

"I remember when the Missouri question was agitating the country, and it was understood that Mr. Pinkney would advocate the principles he subsequently enforced in the Senate, a gentleman of this city, well known as a most zealous and ultra abolitionist, called on Mr. P., and reminded him of the very speech referred to by Mr. Calhoun, and hoping at the same time that his course in the Senate now would be in harmony with his supposed feelings on the occasion referred to. My father assured him that the speech in question was that of a young man just entering into political life, and that any expectations of the friends of abolition derived from that speech were wholly delusive, as far as regarded his opinions or action on the question in the Senate."

them that advantage. Certainly I cannot consent to surrender it for nothing.

I have been extremely pained at the course of observation which has been indulged in by several gentlemen in speaking upon this bill; and having expressed, fully and frankly, my own opinion upon the question of power, I will add some remarks addressed to what I consider the expediency and propriety of admitting into these territories the slaves of the South. I claim no exemption from those biases which belong to my particular position, but I will say this, that if I know myself, (a very difficult matter, I am aware,) what I am about to say is the honest conviction of my understanding. What is the true position, then, of this question, upon which our friends from the North have spoken in such indignant terms? In the first place, it is not proposed to introduce an additional slave upon the soil of America. We ask no such thing. On the contrary, I venture to say that no man can be found in the northern portion of the Union, though he be the most ultra of all abolitionists, who is more thoroughly, absolutely, and totally opposed to the introduction of African slaves into the country, than are the entire population of the South. Northern gentlemen take up this subject upon some theory, in itself not sound, and not very soundly reasoned from, as it appears to me; they tell us that slavery is wrong, is an evil, and, therefore, they are resolved that those who are slaves shall not, under any circumstances, be removed into territory now free; that free soil shall forever remain free. Now, in this, are they dealing with the subject as practical men? It is a great question, and is entitled to a fair and practical consideration. We have among us slaves; they are there, for which we are not responsible. It was forced upon our forefathers by avarice and power from abroad. But, however produced, here is the institution, and among us are nearly three millions of slaves. Now, what is to be the consequence of allowing their masters to take them into such portions of this territory as admit of their profitable employment? Whom will it injure? Those who live remote and have no slaves? Certainly not; for if the country is suited to the cultivation of cotton and sugar, they do not propose to go there to pursue this cultivation with free labor. If, on the contrary, this territory is not adapted to this cultivation, no man will willingly carry his slaves where their employment will be injurious or unprofitable to him. Yet gentlemen, upon some fanatical notion, (I use the term in no disrespectful sense,) upon some general elementary opinion that slavery is an institution which ought not to be introduced among mankind, close their eyes to the fact that it is here; that it must continue to exist; agitate the question of free soil, and refuse or neglect to consider the practical effect of the measures they propose upon the condition of the slaves for whom their sympathy is awakened. I was, I confess, deeply hurt when I heard gentlemen say, that they wished to confine this institution within its present bounds until it should become intolerable; that they wished this "festering evil," instead of being scattered, should be confined until it should burst and discharge its social corruption upon the South. Is this to wish for good? Is it to desire the mitigation of evils which cannot be removed? Is it not, on the contrary, to desire the utmost aggravation of calamity, involving both slave and master in a common ruin?

Sir, the expansion of the slave population is of the highest importance to the welfare and improvement of the slaves. What do our friends expect, supposing their utmost wishes to be gratified? Are they, or their constituents, acting upon any of the principles which in times past have governed well regulated minds in the pursuit of truth and social improvement? My honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN,] a friend I feel him to be, much as I differ from him on this subject, and deeply as I grieve to hear some of his sentiments, is familiar with the history of the olden time; familiar with that book which teaches us the orderings of God's providence in the days that are past. Now, sir, in that history does my friend find any warrant for this species of uncompromising and instantaneous extirpation of even admitted evils? When Moses led out the Israelites from Egypt, polygamy was established among them. They had addicted themselves to it from their commerce with the eastern gentiles, and derived it, indeed, from the example of their father, Abraham. When Moses, under the influence of divine inspiration, proclaimed the laws for the government of their civil polity and internal conduct, why was not polygamy instantly prohibited? How did it happen that for many hundred years it was tolerated by the institutions of the Jewish law-giver? Sir, the reason given by our Saviour for this toleration may afford us an instructive lesson. In answer to an inquiry from his disciples respecting the law of divorce, we learn that Moses suffered this evil to continue on account of the Jews' hardness of heart. The human race began with a single pair, one man and one woman, and that institution divinely established, was ordained to be perpetual. Yet Moses, that wise law-giver, perceived as he was for the honor of God and the purity of his people, sought not an instantaneous correction of the evil. Hence, for hundreds of years, the divine institution of marriage remained suspended, and polygamy was tolerated and openly practised, until the Jews, by a long course of training under the divine dispensations, had become gradually prepared for the restoration of the original law in all its purity, and to bear, without rebellious dissent, its authoritative re-establishment by our Saviour.

Take another instance, having a precise analogy to the case under our consideration. When the apostles went forth to preach the religion of salvation, they found the institution of slavery existing everywhere—and existing everywhere in a form more oppressive, with authority in the master far larger, and the exactions upon the slave far greater, than in our own country. Yet, the laws of the Roman empire not only placed no restriction upon emancipation, but encouraged and favored it; and the slaves being of the same color with the master, the same difficulties did not exist with them as with us to an immediate restoration of liberty to the whole, or any considerable portion, of the slave population. Now, the undoubted object of the Christian religion was to denounce all sin, and to extirpate all moral evil, and to bring in universal moral good. This is its undoubted tendency, and this was the undoubted purpose of its first inspired teachers. If slavery is an evil which ought not to be at all tolerated, but is of such a detestable nature as to be utterly irreconcilable with religious faith and practice, it was so in the times of the apostles, and, as inspired men, they knew it to be so. Yet, what was the course pursued by them in reference to this institution? As they made converts, who were slave owners, did they direct, or even recommend, the immediate or even gradual emancipation of their slaves? Did they teach christian slaves that they owed no obedience, as such, to their christian masters? Did they encourage them to escape from the dominion of their masters? Far, very far from it. They taught all slaves the duty, the religious duty of obedience to their masters, and urged this duty upon christian slaves towards christian masters by the affecting consideration of their being brethren in Christ. They urged upon christian masters the duty of kindness, justice, moderation, towards their slaves, by reminding them that all christians, masters as well as slaves, were the subjects of one common master—"even Christ." They treated this relation like all others which they found existing among men, enforcing the duties which sprung out of it, respectively, to the parties, by religious motives and considerations. They did not make haste to abolish what they might have conceived an evil, but, exercising a wise forbearance lest greater evil should result by a sudden revolution in an existing institution of society, they sought only to bring all under the influences of christian principles, and left the inherent tendency of those principles ultimately to remove whatever was evil in the institution, and, if evil altogether, the institution itself.

Now, what a contrast to all this is found in the conduct of anti-slavery men at the present day. The cry is "immediate abolition"—"away with slavery from the face of the earth." And those States, which took a half a century gradually to emancipate a few slaves, now seem to require or expect the immediate restoration to liberty of more than two millions of slaves! Now, sir, if a gentleman tells me that slavery is a sin of a dye so deep that the existence of it for a day is utterly inconsistent with the divine law, and, therefore, he feels bound by every means in his power to seek its immediate extirpation, disregarding all constitutional obligations which may stand in his way, I should know that he was opposed to the Apostles, and might think that he was mad. But, at the same time, I should perceive that though his premises were false, his reasoned conclusion was logical, because it is clear that the divine law cannot be superseded by mere human authority. But they who maintain that slavery has in itself this malignant wickedness of character, which puts it in irreconcilable conflict with Divine law, and yet feel bound, by the obligations of the constitution, in the States where it exists, to support it, reason falsely from their own premises. They would be more consistent with themselves, though more remote from truth, if they became one of the abolitionists. Sir, the true reasoning upon this subject is pursued by neither of the classes to which I have referred. Slavery, in itself, is an institution forbidden by the Divine law, as is incontestibly proved by the conduct of the Apostles. It may be an evil. It may be proper that it should be removed. But the time when, and the manner how, must be determined by wise and temperate considerations of expediency, lest, in a rash attempt to remove one evil, we introduce greater and more unmanageable ones in its place.

Mr. President, I wish that our northern friends would re-examine the ground which they have assumed, and allow Apostolic precept and example to have a just influence upon their deliberations. Would they do so, I cannot but hope they would see ground to change their position. I cannot believe, notwithstanding the strong expressions used by some of them, that they wish to do us injury, or, notwithstanding the tendency of their measures, that they wish to make harder the condition of our slaves. Slavery with us is not an institution of such unmitigated evil as to require, if it allowed of, immediate extirpation. It exists in a mitigated form, tempered by humanity, and modified and softened by the influence of Christianity. True, there are cruel masters, as there are cruel husbands and cruel fathers, but is that a reason for immediately destroying the authority of all masters, fathers, and husbands? I assume on broader that humanity towards slaves is with us the rule, and inhumanity the exception; and we look upon the exception with as little toleration as they do. Now, the plan which they propose of confining the slaves of the United States within the territory now occupied by hem thas nothing to recommend it, but is in every respect objectionable. It does not diminish the number of slaves—it does not add to the number of freemen—it tends not to produce emancipation, except possibly at a remote day, and then by a convulsion, the consequences of which are too horrible to be adequately conceived. The present and continuing effect of that plan will be either to diminish or delay every improvement in the condition of the slave, physical and moral; and while it may produce some loss of comfort to the master, it will assuredly bring great and positive evil to the slave. On the contrary, what we ask has every good, and so far as I see, no evil tendency. All we desire is, that you allow the present slave population, without any addition thereto, to spread itself over such territory, if any, as is particularly suited to slave cultivation. By this we rob you of nothing; for such territory is not suited to the free laborer of the North. By granting what we ask, you ameliorate the condition of the slave and improve that of the master, and do injury to no class of our population.

Mr. President, I beseech our northern friends to let these views have a just influence upon them. Sir, let them follow the wise example of the Apostles—have a just influence of their capacity to devise a better mode of doing great and ultimate good—allow slaveholders with their slaves to occupy such territory as I have described—and not seek by extreme doctrines and practices to prevent this harmless and beneficial expansion. Let them permit the principles of Christianity, the influence of divine charity, to be gradually still more diffused amongst masters and slaves, force nothing forward by undue and premature exertions, and they may rely confidently that in God's good time it will be seen—not by this generation, but by those that come after us—that every thing has, upon this Apostolic pattern, worked out well, and produced the largest attainable amount, to both master and slave, of virtue and happiness.

Sir, I occupy a peculiar position upon this subject, and have felt it my duty to myself and my constituents to make, so far as I was able, that position understood. So far as I know myself, I have no private ends to serve inconsistent with devotion to the public good. My friend from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] has referred to some supposed connexion of this measure with the pending Presidential election. No such connexion would be allowed to have any influence to direct my conduct independently of great national considerations. To any argument which should show that the adoption of this measure will settle a most agitating question, and give peace, harmony, and mutual confidence to the different sections of the country, I would yield a ready submission, and gladly surrender to it the opinions I have expressed. I would then go heart and soul for the adoption of the measure, if its certain result would be the defeat of the party to which I belong in the coming election, and, I had almost said, its defeat now and forever.

Mr. DIX.—Mr. President: It is with great reluctance that I throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate a second time in this discussion. But since I spoke, positions have been taken in the debate, and assertions made, which I cannot pass by without comment; and especially am I unwilling to be silent when the whole subject is presented to us under a new phase by the report of the committee of eight, and brings up a train of considerations, having an important bearing upon the question.

Before I proceed to notice, as I shall very briefly, the provisions of the bill reported by the committee, I desire to say something on other topics which have been introduced into the discussion.

The northern States have been repeatedly charged in this debate, and on many previous occasions, with aggression, and violations of the constitutional compact, in their action on the subject of slavery. With regard to the surrender of fugitive slaves—the case most frequently cited—it is possible that there may have been some action, or inaction, in particular States, not in strict accordance with the good faith they ought to observe in this respect. I know not how it is; but we know there is an effective power to legislate on this subject in Congress; and I am sure there will be no want of cooperation on our part, in carrying out the requirements of the constitution, by providing all reasonable means for executing them.

The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] in the remarks he addressed to the Senate yesterday, made repeated allusions to me in connection with the suggestion of a superior civilization in the non-slaveholding States. I have made no such suggestion. I have drawn no parallel. I have made no distinction, in this respect between the North and the South. And in the case to which he particularly referred, and in which I spoke of "spires pointing to the skies," in language perhaps somewhat more flowery than I am accustomed to use, I expressly said that I made no distinction between the two great sections of the Union.

But this is a matter on which I shall not dwell. I am but an individual, and a misapprehension which concerns only myself, is comparatively of little importance. But when the Senator, turning from me, assails the State I have the honor to represent; when the misconception does injustice to those who have given me their confidence, he wounds me in a more tender point, and I cannot pass his remarks by without a more extended notice.

Mr. President, I endeavored to get the floor yesterday when the Senator took his seat, and I made repeated attempts afterwards, in all of which I was unsuccessful. I wished to notice, at the moment and on the spot, the imputations which he had cast on the State of New York, in language I regretted to hear from any Senator on this floor. He said a requisition had been made, some years ago, on the governor of the State by the executive of Virginia, for the surrender of persons convicted of stealing a slave within the jurisdiction of the latter State; that the governor had refused to surrender them, and that this refusal had been sustained by both branches of the legislature; and on this statement, he charged New York with a want of "common honesty." Sir, these are harsh epithets—epithets which should not have been applied to us without a full knowledge of the facts. The Senator labors under a great misapprehension. The responsibility, which he charged on the State, rests upon the governor alone. The facts are these:

In 1841 a requisition was made by the executive of Virginia on the governor of New York, for three persons, charged with stealing a slave in the former State. The governor refused to surrender them, for the reason assigned in the following resolution, which was adopted by both branches of the legislature of New York early in 1842:

section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States.

These resolutions, as I have said, passed both branches of the legislature. I am unable to state the vote; but I was then a member of the assembly, and I remember that it passed [illegible] by a very decided majority.

Thus it seems that the legislature of New York, in both its branches, representing the people of the State in a double capacity—for the Senate was at that time the high court for the correction of errors—the highest judicial tribunal in the State—disclaimed and condemned the act of the governor, and left the responsibility to rest on him alone. Beyond this it could not go. The act to be performed was executive, and the legislature had no control over him to compel the performance.

But the Senator did not stop here. His speech was replete with reproachful allusions to New York, too indefinite to be met with a distinct reply; and he concluded by saying that he expected nothing good from her. Sir, there have been periods in the history of the country when she was neither inactive nor inefficient in her efforts for the public good. In 1837, when the whole banking system throughout the Union exploded; when the president of the Bank of the United States was putting forth manifestoes and employing the whole strength of that institution to continue the suspension of specie payments; and when, I believe I may say, most other portions of the Union were disposed to yield—New York stood almost alone in opposing it. She compelled her own banks to resume the discharge of their obligations under the penalty of a forfeiture of their charters: she became the centre of all that was sound in the currency and finance; and through the influence and the power of her example, the country was saved from years of dishonor and pecuniary embarrassment.

In 1814, when the whole southern coast was at the mercy of the public enemy, and portions of it ravaged and laid waste; when the administration here was too weak to defend the capital; and when the very edifice in which we sit was given to the flames by British vandalism, New York stood again almost alone and unassisted, and carried on the contest upon her own frontier chiefly with her own means. She raised money and men, and contributed to sustain the honor of our arms in a series of the most desperate engagements ever fought on this continent.

Of her institutions, social and political, I need say nothing—the monuments she has reared to science and to the arts, her great artificial channels of intercourse, and above all, her system of common school education, embracing every child that is born or is brought within her limits. These are well known to all who hear me; and they say for her more than any words of mine can speak.

Less than a year ago too noble spirited bands stood, side by side, on one of the bloodiest battlefields of Mexico. They were led on by chivalrous men, animated by the single resolution of upholding their country's honor and their own. They were the New York and the Palmetto regiments. The blows they gave fell upon the ranks of the enemy with equal force; those they received were sustained with equal firmness. More than a third of these gallant combatants fell together. The grass which has grown up rich and rank upon that battlefield can tell where their blood was poured out in common streams. The noble leader of the Palmetto regiment was among the slain—borne from the field of carnage perhaps by the united hands of those whom he led, and those who, though coming from a distant part of the Union, fought by his side with the same devotion as his own followers. Sir, there should be something in these sacred memories to disarm reproach—at least of its injustice. Let me commend them to the calm reflection of the Senator from South Carolina, who has so deep an interest in the glory and the grief of that battlefield. He is neither ungenerous nor unjust. Let me ask him to think of the these things and say whether some good may not come from New York.

But I pass to a charge more immediately connected with the subject under discussion—the application of the principles of the ordinance of 1787 to the territories of the United States. This charge concerns the whole North; and I am ready to meet it.

In 1846 and 1847 most of the non-slaveholding States, on high considerations of moral and political principle, declared that no new territory ought to be acquired without a fundamental provision excluding slavery. These declarations had an express and an exclusive reference to acquisitions from Mexico, where slavery had long been abolished, both by executive and constitutional acts. They amounted practically to declarations against the extension of slavery to free territory, and no more. New York did not take the lead in these declarations. The first legislative resolutions received here came from the State of Vermont, and were presented to this body on the 28th of January, 1847. The New York resolutions were presented on the 6th February ensuing; those of Pennsylvania on the 8th; of Rhode Island on the 10th; of Ohio on the 16th; of New Hampshire and New Jersey on the 19th; of Michigan on the 1st of March; and of Massachusetts on the 3d—the last day of the session. Connecticut passed resolutions on the 24th of June; but Congress had then adjourned, and they were presented at the commencement of the subsequent session. Delaware, a slaveholding State, followed, and requested her Senators to vote for the exclusion of slavery from territory thereafter to be acquired. Here are eleven States which have passed resolutions on this question. It was a spontaneous movement on the part of the non-slaveholding States, neither led on by New York, nor set on foot by her, but arising out of indications in Congress of an intention to acquire territory from Mexico, and leave it open to the introduction of slaves; and every one knows they will be carried wherever they are permitted.

On looking at the dates of these several resolutions, I find New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Pennsylvania preceded New York, in the order in which I name them, in acting on this subject in their respective legislatures. Three of the small New England States, which the Senator from Virginia, who spoke first on this question, [Mr. MASON,] would have us believe New York was seeking to seduce, and in the end to swallow up, were actually the pioneers in this movement. Pennsylvania was next in the field. New York did but follow and sustain them in their declarations against the extension of slavery to territory in which it does not exist.

Such is the history of this movement, commencing as far back as July, 1846, almost coeval with the war with Mexico, and originating in a charge of intending to conquer territory for the purpose of planting slavery upon it. And these public declarations may perhaps be properly regarded in a two-fold light, so far as motive, on the part of the legislatures, is concerned: first, to exonerate themselves from the imputation; and, second, to array their influence against such a design, if it should be entertained in any quarter.

Let me now take a somewhat larger view of this whole subject of northern aggression. It was said, I think, by a southern member of the federal convention, though it may have been in Congress after the adoption of the constitution, that no slaveholding State would thereafter be admitted into the Union; that there were eight States interested in abolishing slavery, and five interested in maintaining it, and that they would act accordingly in voting for the admission of new States. This prophecy had no foundation in truth. The members of Congress from the North have voted as freely and readily for the admission of slaveholding as for non-slaveholding States into the Union. If we look around us upon this floor, we shall find all prognostics founded upon the supposed prejudices or the unkind feelings of the North utterly falsified.—Sir, there are ten Senators here representing slaveholding States formed from territory acquired since the constitution was adopted. How many are there representing free States formed from new territory? Not a single one! But for a domestic difficulty in Iowa, it is true, that State would have been represented here, and we should then have had two Senators from free States against ten from slaveholding States formed out of territory purchased by the common treasure and maintained by the common blood of the whole Union. We have given up the territory constituting these States to the South. We have not required of them to restrict northern emigration, except the misshapen strip of Texas north of 36° 30′, which, so far as extent and productive value are concerned, is, for all purposes of a fair and equitable division, the merest mockery. The area of these five States is equal to two-thirds of the entire area of the thirteen original States. This the North has done for the maintenance of slavery—sir, I might say for the extension of slavery and the multiplication of slaves; for this vast surface was almost uninhabited when it was acquired, and it is now filled up with a slaveholding population. There are more than half a million of slaves in these five States, not one-tenth part of whom would have been there, if the right to exclude them had been insisted on. But we have stood on the ground of non-interference. Where we have found slavery, we have left it. We have not countenanced any measure of abolition or emancipation. On the contrary, we have uniformly opposed all interference with slavery in the States. With the single exception of the Louisiana territory, we have left it to spread itself over the areas on which it existed only nominally. We have almost gone, at the North, to the extreme of mobbing abolitionism, when it contemplated interference with the question of slavery in the States, and of instituting a scrutiny of the public mails to arrest the circulation of incendiary publications. And now, after all this active co-operation in the promotion of the objects and interests of the slaveholding States, how are we met? By charges of aggression, of hostility, and of violating the constitutional compact.

Sir, we stand firmly upon the compromises of the constitution. We have ever done so. We shall continue to do so. We have gone further. We have opposed all interference by Congress with slavery in the District of Columbia, over which Congress is empowered by the constitution to "exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever." Beyond this we cannot go. I deny that any compromise in framing the constitution, or any guarantee arising under its provisions, extends, or was designed to extend, to the regulation of slavery in the territories. What were the compromises of the constitution? They were three: 1. That the small States should be equally represented in the Senate with the large States. 2. That the slave population in the States should constitute a part of the basis of representation in Congress. 3. That the importation of slaves into the States then existing should not be prohibited prior to 1808. These were the three great compromises on which the adoption of the constitution may be considered as having turned. In settling them, some reference was naturally had to the distribution and regulation of the powers vested in the federal government and reserved to the States and the people respectively.

Now, sir, what was the security sought for by the South in the adoption of these compromises? Was is that Congress should impose no restriction on the extension of slavery to the territories? No, sir. That power I have no doubt was left, so far as it was contemplated at all, to be exercised by Congress, according to its own views of humanity and justice. I humbly think this construction sustained by what I said on a former occasion. It is shown also by the deed of the cession by North Carolina of western territory now constituting the State of Tennessee, in which it was provided, "that no regulations made, or to be made, by Congress shall tend to emancipate slaves"—a prohibition implying a right to regulate, restrict, and exclude them.

The Senator from Florida, [Mr. WESTCOTT,] read to the Senate yesterday the fac simile of an original paper found among the manuscripts of Mr. Monroe, and in his handwriting, by which it appears, that when the Missouri compromise act, as it is called, was passed, he took the opinions of the members of his cabinet, in writing, in respect to the constitutionality of that act. The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] was one of the cabinet; and as I took, and endeavored to sustain, on a late occasion, the position that Congress possesses the right to prohibit slavery in the territories of the United States, I am naturally desirous of fortifying it with all the authority I can command; and I shall be particularly gratified, if it shall be found that the distinguished Senator alluded to, though now denying the right, was then in favor of it. I will read to the Senate all of this paper which relates to the subject:

(From Mr. Monroe's manuscripts.)—A paper endorsed "Interrogatories, Missouri—March 4, 1820. To the Heads of Departments and Attorney General."

Questions, (on opposite page:)

"Has Congress a right, under the powers vested in it by the constitution, to make a regulation prohibiting slavery in a territory?

"Is the eighth section of the act which passed both Houses on the 3d instant, for the admission of Missouri into the Union, consistent with the constitution?"

With the above is the original draft of the following letter, in President Monroe's handwriting, on half a sheet of paper, but not endorsed or addressed to any one. There are interlinications, but the text, as left by the writer, is as follows:

"DEAR SIR: The question which lately agitated Congress and the public has been settled, on what seems to be the passage of the act for the admission of Missouri as a State, unrestrained, and Arkansas likewise, when it reaches maturity, and the establishment of the 36° 30′ north latitude as a line, north of which slavery is prohibited, and permitted to the south. I took the opinion, in writing, of the administration as to the constitutionality of restraining territories, [and the vote of every member was unanimous one,] which was explicit in favor of it, and as it was that the 8th section of the act was applicable to territories only, and not to States when entered into the Union. On this latter point I had at first some doubt; but the opinion of others, whose opinions were entitled to weight with me, supported by the sense which I was led to entertain of all who voted on the subject in Congress, as will appear by the journals, satisfied me respecting it."

This letter has been supposed to have been written to General Jackson, though there is no evidence of it.

Mr. FOOTE.—Were these interrogatories sent? or was it merely a statement for his own private convenience?

Mr. DIX.—It is impossible to say, except so far as the paper may be considered as indicating the use made of them. I state the facts as they have been related to me. The paper was found among Mr. Monroe's manuscripts, and is in his hand writing. It was read to the Senate yesterday by the Senator from Florida, [Mr. WESTCOTT,] for another purpose, and the evidence of its authenticity I understand to be in his possession.

Mr. CALHOUN.—If the Senator will give way, it will be perhaps better that I make a statement at once respecting this subject, as far as my recollection will serve me. During the whole period of Mr. Monroe's administration, I remember no occasion on which the members of his administration gave written opinions. I have an impression—though not a very distinct one—that on one occasion they were required to give written opinions; but for some reason, not now recollected, the request was not carried into effect. He was decidedly opposed to the imposition of any restriction on the admission of Missouri into the Union, and I am strongly of the impression that he was opposed in feeling to what was called the Missouri compromise.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—Is this the original letter?

Mr. DIX.—I understand it to be a fac-simile of the original. As a long period (nearly thirty years) has elapsed since the act to admit Missouri into the Union was passed, it is quite natural that the Senator from South Carolina should have forgotten the circumstances attending the discussion of it in the Cabinet. Having heard, some days ago, of the existence of such a paper, and being very desirous of ascertaining the facts, I wrote to Mr. C. F. Adams, of Boston, a son of the late ex-President, inquiring of him if his father's diary contained anything on the subject. In reply to my inquiry, I received an extract from the diary of the father, certified by the son, which I will now read, and which confirms fully the statement contained in Mr. Monroe's letter:

* The words in italic are erased in the original draft.

Extracts from the diary of J. Q. Adams

"MARCH 3, 1820.—When I came this day to my office, I found there a note requesting me to call at one o'clock at the President's house. It was then one, and I immediately went over. He expected that the two bills, for the admission of Maine and to enable Missouri to make a constitution, would have been brought to him for his signature; and he had summoned all the members of the administration to ask their opinions in writing, to be deposited in the Department of State, upon two questions: 1. Whether Congress had a constitutional right to prohibit slavery in a territory? and 2. Whether the 8th section of the Missouri bill, which interdicts slavery forever in the territory north of 36 and a half latitude, was applicable only to the territorial state, or would extend to it after it should become a State? As to the first question, it was unanimously agreed that Congress have the power to prohibit slavery in the territories."

This is the first extract; and before I proceed to to the others, I will state that, in respect to the second question, there was a diversity of opinion—Mr. Adams contending that a State would be bound by such a prohibition after its admission into the Union, and the other members of the cabinet, that it was only operative during the territorial term. In order to secure unanimity in the answers, the second question was modified, as will appear by the remaining extracts which I proceed to give:

"March 5.—The President sent me yesterday the two questions in writing upon which he desired to have answers in writing, to be deposited in the Department of State. He wrote me that it would be in time, if he should have the answers to-morrow. The first question is in general terms, as I stated at the meeting on Friday. The second was modified to an inquiry whether the 8th section of the Missouri bill is consistent with the constitution. To this I can, without hesitation, answer by a simple affirmative, and so after some little reflection, I concluded to answer both. * * *

"March 6. * * * I took to the President's my answers to the two constitutional questions, and he desired me to have them deposited in the department, together with those of the other members of the administration. They differed only as they assigned their reason for thinking the 8th section of the Missouri bill consistent with the constitution, because they considered it as only applying to the territorial term;—and I hastily gave my opinion, without suggesting for it any explanatory reason. The President signed the Missouri bill this morning."

These extracts are certified to be "a true copy from the original by me,

"CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS."

Mr. CALHOUN.—Has any search been made in the State Department for these written opinions?

Mr. DIX.—The State Department has been examined—how thoroughly I do not know—but they have not been found.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I made an examination, as I stated yesterday, myself, but could find none. This letter is in Mr. Monroe's handwriting, and from its tenor is supposed to have been intended for addition to General Jackson. I understand that upon examination of General Jackson's papers, a letter was found from Mr. Monroe, containing everything which is contained in this draught, except that part which relates to the action of the cabinet. The letter was also dated the same day. I presume, therefore, that upon writing the letter to General Jackson, ultimately, unless it was intended for some one else, Mr. Monroe left out that portion relating to the action of the cabinet in relation to the "Missouri compromise."

Mr. DIX.—I have examined the letter referred to, as addressed to General Jackson, and find that it was written in 1821, while the paper containing the interrogatories was dated the 4th of March, 1820; and the former has only two of the last paragraphs of the letter before us; all the rest being different.

Mr. CALHOUN.—If any written opinion was ever given by me, it has entirely escaped my memory; and I feel satisfied, if ever given, it was very little more than an assent or dissent to the course adopted by the administration. Mr. Adams had the advantage of keeping a diary, which no doubt may be relied upon, as far as he is individually concerned; but which, of course, is liable to mistakes, as far as it represents the views and acts of others. In this case there may be some explanation, if all the facts were known, which would reconcile his statement with my recollection. But of one thing I feel perfectly sure, that I could never have directed my attention and formed an opinion on so important a subject, as a member of his cabinet, and reduced it to writing, for the purpose of being preserved, without recollecting it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, was understood to say, that on examining the letter, he did not think it sustained the fact the Senator from New York was endeavoring to prove. He observed that Mr. Monroe had first stated that the opinion of the administration was unanimous, and that he had erased the word unanimous, and substituted the word explicit, which had quite a different meaning.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I feel justified in saying, from all the circumstances of this case, including the facts stated by the Senator from Maryland, and the absence of any written opinion on the file of the State Department, that notwithstanding the certificate from Mr. Adam's diary, no such opinions were given as it states. There is some mistake about it, but how it originated I am at a loss to conceive. Perhaps it may be explained by the vague impression, as I have stated, on my mind, that the opinions were called for, but never formally given in writing, at least not beyond a mere assent or dissent as to the course ultimately adopted. I know well all about the compromise; the cause which led to it, and the reason why, that the northern men who voted against it were universally sacrificed for so doing. It is quite a mistake, as some suppose, that they were sacrificed for voting for the compromise. The very reverse is the case. The cause I will proceed to state: During the session of the compromise, Mr. Lowndes and myself resided together. He was a member of the House of Representatives, and I was Secretary of War. We both felt the magnitude of the subject. Missouri, at the preceding session, had presented herself for admission as a member of the Union. She had formed a constitution and government, in accordance with an act of Congress. Her admission was refused on the ground that her constitution admitted of slavery, and she was required, among [illegible] the objectionable provision expunged. She refused to comply with the requisition, and at the next session again knocked at the door of Congress for admission, with her constitution as it originally stood. This gave rise to one of the most agitating discussions that ever occurred in Congress. The subject was one of repeated conversation between Mr. Lowndes and myself. The question was, what was to be done, and what would be the consequence if she was not admitted? After full reflection, we both agreed that Missouri was a State made so by a regular process of law, and never could be renanded back to the territorial condition. Such being the case, we also agreed that the only question was, whether she should be a State in or out of the Union? and it was for Congress to decide which position she should occupy. My friend made one of his able and lucid speeches on the occasion; but whether it has been preserved or not, I am not able to say. It carried conviction to the minds of all, and in fact settled the question. The question was narrowed down to a single point. All saw that if Missouri was not admitted, she would remain an independent State on the west bank of the Mississippi, and would become the nucleus of a new confederation of States extending over the whole of Louisiana. None were willing to contribute to such a result; and the only question that remained with the northern members who had opposed her admission was, to devise some means of getting from the awkward dilemma in which they found themselves. To back out or compromise, were the only alternatives left; and the latter was eagerly seized to avoid the disgrace of the former—so eagerly, that all who opposed it at the North were considered traitors to that section of the Union, and sacrificed for their votes.

Mr. FOOTE.—The gentleman referred to, and from whose journal an extract had been read, as is well known, has been always regarded as a most violent partisan of the peculiar views he held in relation to this subject. I beg leave most respectfully to inquire of the honorable Senator from New York, whether this statement or extract read has been sworn to or not?

Mr DIX.—The statement was, as I have said, taken from the diary of Mr. Adams, certified, but not sworn to, by his son, a gentleman of the highest respectability.

I do not intend to enter into any discussion concerning the Missouri compromise, or the testimony I have presented. I leave it to speak for itself, and to others to say how far it shall be considered to outweigh the recollections of the Senator from South Carolina. I will only add, that there is the strongest possible coincidence between Mr. Monroe's letter and Mr. Adam's diary in all the important facts. Both state the questions to have been "in writing;" both show that they were submitted in the shape in which they were to be answered, on the 4th of March, 1820. The identity of the questions is another striking coincidence. The only material variation is that suggested by the Senator from Maryland. Mr. Adams states, that the opinion of the members of the cabinet was "unanimous" in favor of the power of Congress to prohibit slavery in the territories of the United States. Mr. Monroe wrote "unanimous" in the first instance, and then substituted "explicit"—an alteration he might very naturally have made, on reflection, in writing to a friend, in order to avoid giving a clue to the opinions of individual members of his administration. The answers were very brief, as Mr. Adams shows; but from the manner in which the questions were drawn, the answers, whether affirmative or negative, must either have asserted or denied the constitutional power of Congress to prohibit slavery in the territories. But all this I am willing to submit to the candid judgment of others.

Let me now cite a few of the remarks made in the federal convention on the subject of slavery and slave representation. On the 12th of July, Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, said:

"That exp[illegible] representation. He [illegible] the numbers of it [illegible] to be left at liberty."

In the convention of Virginia, by which the constitution was ratified, Governor Randolph entered into an elaborate argument to show that Congress had no right to abolish slavery in the States. It was feared that under the power of prohibiting the slave trade, or under the power to regulate commerce, or under some implied power, slavery within the States might be abolished by Congress. To this Governor Randolph replied:

"The security the [illegible] from them, which some [illegible] do."

This was the tenor of the discussions in the State conventions by which the constitution was ratified. They looked to security from abolition or emancipation by Congress within their own limits. Extension of slavery beyond their limits was hardly thought of; and I have no hesitation in saying, from the tone of the debates, that if it had been fully discussed, it would have been to brand it with general disapprobation.

On the 22d of August, a very full and interesting debate arose in the federal convention on the question of prohibiting the importation of slaves. The only objection contended for in any quarter were the right to import them, and an exemption of the States from all interference with slavery within their own limits on the part of the federal government. It was generally conceded except by the extreme South, that slavery would ultimately be abolished. And not one slave population has gone on steadily increasing, from 600,000 to 3,000,000 of souls; and now we are engaged in a struggle to enlarge the area of slavery, or to prevent its exclusion from territory in which it does not exist.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I must beg the Senator from New York to state me more correctly. We are not contending for the extension of the area of slavery; and it is the poorest support that ground, he places us in a very false position. What we do contend for is, that the southern States, as members of our Union, are entitled to equal rights and equal dignity, in every respect, with the northern; and that there is nothing in the constitution to deprive us of this equality in consequence of being slaveholders.

Mr. DIX.—The Senator contends for the right of carrying slaves into the territories. I understand this to be an extension of slavery, and, with all deference to him, I can call it by no other name.

In connection with this subject, we are asked by the Senator from Virginia, whether any one believes that State would ever have come into the Union if the right to exclude slaves from the territories had been insisted on? I answer, yes. And on the strength of the known opinions of her delegates in the convention.

Mr. Madison would not consent "to admit in the constitution the idea that there could be property in man." He was unwilling to postpone the prohibition of the slave trade twenty years. "So long a term," he added, "will be more dishonorable to the American character than to say nothing about it in the constitution." His language and his action then, and on all occasions, were in favor of the restriction of slavery, and not in favor of its extension. The opinion of General Washington, the president of the convention, on that subject, is well known. I have already referred to the opinion of Mr. Jay. Colonel Mason was still more decided and explicit. His language may be quoted now with the more confidence, when those who have come after him differ with him so widely in opinion:

"This infernal traffic originated in the avarice of British merchants. The British government constantly checked the attempts of Virginia to put a stop to it. The present question concerns not only the importation from Africa, but the future increase of slaves by those who have them already. As he should be glad to know what influence this unnatural traffic has had on the minds of our people, as well as on the general welfare, he was sorry to find from the state of it that the importation of slaves into North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, has increased in the last four years, and is still increasing with a rapidity which ought to excite the attention of every friend to his country. Maryland and Virginia, he conceived, had sufficient slaves for their own use; and, by stopping the importations, would enhance the value of those slaves to the amount of fifty millions of dollars, which would be the gain of Maryland and Virginia only, and would be sustained by the loss of it by South Carolina and Georgia. Slaves, he remarked, formed the greatest part of the property of the latter. Their numbers have increased, are increasing, and will continue to increase, while they can be got cheaper than whites. Consequently the whites will be more and more excluded from those States. Slaves also prevent the immigration of whites, who will not come to a country where they are to work with slaves. Those slaves will produce the most pernicious consequences. Prudence forbids our laying ourselves under such expectations. As to the States being in possession of the right to import, as was the case in Virginia, only as to a few years, he thought it the true interest of every State, and of the whole, that the general government should have power to prevent the further importation of slaves."

To this declaration in the federal convention I might add, that in the convention of Virginia, he alleged, as one of the objections to the constitution, that it continued the slave trade for twenty-two years.

The Senator from Virginia wears, with equal dignity and grace, the name of the illustrious statesman I have quoted. It is quite probable that there is a closer bond of connection between them. But how different is their language, and the causes they have espoused, at the distance of more than half a century from each other! The patriot of the Revolution denounced the British government for forcing slaves upon Virginia against her remonstrances. The Senator from that State is contending here, in her name, for the right to carry slaves into Oregon, against the wishes and prohibitions of its inhabitants.

But to return from this digression. The four distinguished individuals I have named constituted a majority of the delegation from Virginia, and I believe I am authorized, from their avowed opinions, to say, that if there had been a positive provision in the constitution authorizing Congress to prohibit the introduction of slavesinto territories thereafter to be acquired, it would not only not have been deemed an impediment to the the accession of Virginia to the Union, but that it would have met their decided approbation. But in this case, as in many others, the framers of the constitution fell far short of the reality, when they looked forward to the future progress of the country. The period in which they lived was enveloped in uncertainty and doubt—and it was only reserved to a few of the more sanguine to obtain some partial glimpses of the prosperity and fame to which their country was destined. It was the very limited foreknowledge of her growth and extension, which led so many of the exigencies we have met unprovided for by direct and positive regulation.

Mr. President, it was chiefly in the school of Virginia that the little knowledge I possess of the theory of our institutions, and of the principles of political liberty and justice, was acquired. I have been accustomed to regard Mr. Jefferson as a standard, to which we might safely refer for the settlement of most questions of political power and duty; and it is with something more than ordinary pain and regret that I have seen his principles assailed, and his acts repudiated and condemned.

I was not a little surprised, too, to hear the Senator from Virginia rest the legal justification of slavery upon the right of conquest, and its introduction into that State during her colonial dependence on the common law of England. I had supposed that Blackstone had furnis-hed sufficient evidence of the mistaken pretensions which had been set up on both these foundations to support the fabric of slavery in the American colonies and their successors, the States. I hold in my hand a volume of the English commentator, edited by St. George Tucker, who was a precursor of law in the University of William and Mary, and one of the judges of the general court of Virginia. To this volume is appended an article or tract written by him, "on the state of slavery in Virginia." Sir, it is in this edition of the writings of the great English commentator that many of us of the North have studied the principles of English law, and from the tracts, which are appended to the several volumes, that we have learned to consider Virginia as the great enemy of slavery extension. I propose to read a few extracts from this volume, to show how widely different are the grounds now assumed and those on which the young men of Virginia and of the country generally, were instructed, half a century ago, in the principles of political liberty and justice.

And, first, as to the origin of slavery. Judge Tucker quotes largely from Blackstone, denying that slavery rests either upon the law of nations, by which, according to Justinian, "one man is made subject to another contrary to nature," or upon captivity or conquest, or upon the civil law, by which a man may suffer himself to be sold "for the sake of sharing the price given for him."—He then proceeds:

"Thus, by the most clear, manly, and convincing reasoning, does this excellent author refute every claim upon which the practice of slavery is founded, or by which it has been supported to be justified, at least in modern times. But were we even so disposed, that a captive taken in a just war might by his conqueror be reduced to a state of slavery, this could not justify the claim of Europeans to reduce the natives of Africa to that state. It is a melancholy, though well known fact, that in order to furnish supplies of those unhappy people for the purposes of the slave trade, the Europeans have constantly, by the most insidious (I had almost said infernal) arts, fomented a kind of perpetual warfare among the ignorant and miserable people of Africa, and instances have not been wanting where, by the most shameful breach of faith, they have trepanned and made slaves of the sellers as well as the sold. That such horrid practices have been sanctioned by civilized nations; that a nation ardent in the cause of liberty, and espousing as blessings, in the fullest extent, objects proper to vindicate a right established upon such a foundation; that a people who have declared, 'that all men are by nature equally free and independent,'* and have made this declaration the first article in the formation of their government, should, in defiance of so sacred a truth, bring and keep in their own bosom a number of human beings, equal to one-fifth of their whole number, subjected to a condition more miserable than that of the meanest animal, and to a degree of which the most unfeeling heart can scarcely form an adequate idea; that a people who have no sooner formed themselves into a government than they establish a court of admiralty for the purpose of trying and punishing the crime of piracy, should, in defiance of the express law of nature, continue to carry on a commerce which is little else than a continued piracy; that a people who have made the most generous provision for the establishment of schools throughout the country, for the purpose of instructing their children in the rudiments of learning, should neglect to provide for the education of those unhappy children, whose parents are compelled to labor for the benefit of others; that a people who have made the most liberal provision for the poor, the aged, the sick, and the infirm, should leave unprovided for the numerous offspring of those who are obliged to labor for the support of others; that a people who have shown the most jealous regard for the liberty of the press, as the great palladium of their own liberties, should grudge the expense of printing the laws in more than one publick gazette, or even in the German language, for the benefit of those who are to be bound by them; that a people who have made the most ample provision for the free exercise of religion, should neglect to provide for the religious instruction of those who are compelled to labor for the benefit of others; that a people who have made the most generous provision for the relief of the distressed, should leave unprovided for the numerous offspring of those who are obliged to labor for the support of others; that a people who have made the most liberal provision for the poor, the aged, the sick, and the infirm

[Here follows an enumeration of other acts; "by prompting our negroes to rise in arms against us—those very negroes whom by an inhuman use of his negative, he hath refused us permission to exclude by law."

Judge Tucker adds:

"The wishes of the people of this colony were not effectual, to counteract even the interest of the English merchants trading to Africa, and it is probable our legislature disposed to put a stop to so inhuman a traffic by duty, would be negatived, were they to effect it, so long as we might have connexion dependence on the British government, an object sufficient of itself to justify revolution."

And now, sir, I ask, will Virginia insist on extending to other communities an evil which she deplored, and thus be guilty of an act which she considered, when done by the British King, as a sufficient justification of revolution? an act enumerated in the first clause of her constitution among the reasons for separating from Great Britain? Mr. Jefferson, as we all know, introduced into the original draught of the Declaration of Independence a clause reprobating the conduct of the British King in forcing slaves upon the American colonies; but it was struck out, to use his own language, "in complaisance to South Carolina and Georgia, who had never attempted to restrain the importation of slaves, and who, on the contrary, still wished to continue it." Sir, are we willing to do towards other communities dependent on us what we condemned in the British King? what we relied on as one of the grounds of our justification in appealing the sword to a vindication of our rights and the assertion of our independence? What matters it to the inhabitants of Oregon, or New Mexico, or California, whether slaves are introduced from Africa or from the States of the Union in which they are bred? Sir, let us abstain from this injustice and wrong. If we insist on carrying slaves to those territories; if the arm of the public authority is employed, directly or indirectly, for the purpose of placing them there, and in upon rooting, in two of the territories, the fundamental law of Mexico, which declares slavery to be forever prohibited, it would not be surprising if, in the progress of events, when those distant communities shall have grown to manhood, that they, like us, should declare themselves "free and independent," and among the causes of the separation, charge us, as we charged the British King, with forcing slavery upon them, against their wishes and their remonstrances. If this were a just cause of separation for us, why would it not be so for them? God forbid that history should record such a passage as this, to confound and shame our descendants!

It has been said, that this territory should be divided, so that a portion of it may be left open to the introduction of slaves; that it has been acquired by the common treasure and the common blood of the whole Union, and that it would be unjust to exclude a portion of the citizens of the Union from it.

In the first place, I do not admit that there would be any exclusion if slavery were prohibited. It would be open to every freeman in the community. But even on the score of an equitable division—if the propriety of such a division could be admitted, when the question is, whether laws abolishing slavery shall be abrogated—I hold that the territory should be, as it now is, free. When Florida was acquired, we did not ask that any portion of it should be set apart for immigration from the free States. We claimed no division. We gave it all up to the South. And yet it was purchased by the common blood and the common treasure of the whole Union. The soil of Florida has been crimsoned by the blood, and whitened by the bones of northern men sacrificed in the wars waged to secure it. Including the price paid for it, it has drawn forty millions of dollars from the public treasury, to be reimbursed, for the most part, by the toil and contributions of the North. What have we received in return on this principle of an equitable division? Nothing; nothing.

It is the same with Texas. It is true, the Missouri compromise line was drawn across the States, leaving to the north of it a strip, narrow, misshapen, barren, and broken, for northern immigration. For all purposes of an equitable division, it would have been a deception, if it had been pretended. Why, sir, this very war, which has just terminated, grew out of the annexation of Texas. It is part and parcel of the acquisition. What will it cost? At least eighty millions of dollars, when arrears are liquidated, bounty lands set apart, and pensions fully paid. For this acquisition the North has contributed its full share in blood, and from its greater ability for consumption, will pay the largest portion of the treasure by which it has been purchased. Taking Texas into the account, with its three hundred thousand square miles, and its capacity for production, I hold that an equitable division—if the propriety of it were to be conceded—should leave California and New Mexico free.

Let us look at the money account, and see how that stands. Florida has cost us forty millions of dollars, and Texas eighty millions. For New Mexico and California we are to pay, including claims of our own citizens, twenty millions. Deduct this from the other, and we have a balance of one hundred millions, which we have paid for new territory given up wholly to the South. The blood, the treasure, the sacrifice—everything taken into the account—there is an overwhelming balance in favor of the North; and on every principle we are entitled to New New Mexico and California. But, sir, I will not put it on this narrow ground. I hold that if we acquire territory which is free, it should remain so, and this on high principle—that the United States shall not be instrumental to the extension of slavery, and stand before the world, in this age of intellectual light and of moral elevation, in the attitude of ministering to the propagation of an evil, for the presence of which among us we can only justify ourselves by necessity.

There is one argument on the other side against restriction—if it may not rather be termed a complaint, or an accusation—which I cannot pass by in silence. Gentlemen have represented us, who oppose the extension of slavery, as intending to hem their slaves in, to "pen them up," to surround them with "walls of circumvallation," to crow] them together and leave them to perish; and we have been [illegible] upon as it has never before been my pleasure to hear on this floor. Pens and [illegible] of slaves! I [illegible] Spanish, some unnatural scheme of penning up or walling in this unfortunate African race. Now if gentlemen will consider the facts, I think they will find not the slightest occasion for any exuberance of feeling, either in its higher phases of indignant passion or in its lower tones of commiseration and sympathy. What is the area of the slaveholding States? What is the size of the enclosure in which the negro race is to be shut up by those who oppose the extension of slavery? More than nine hundred thousand square miles—more than the entire surface of France and Spain, Portugal, Germany proper, Prussia, Switzerland, and Italy, combined nearly equal to two thirds of the entire surface of Europe, Russia excluded—a greater area than that which, in the eastern hemisphere, sustains a population of one hundred and fifty millions of souls!! Let us turn to the non-slaveholding States, and see how their surface compares with that of the slaveholding. What is their area, Mr. President? But little more than one hundred thousand square miles—not half the geographical extent of the slaveholding. Thus, we [illegible] as compared with the slaveholding States, the free States are charged with aggression and injustice, because they will not consent to the extension of slavery beyond its present limits into districts of country in which it does not exist. And, what is more extraordinary, we are accused of inhumanity because we propose, in the language of our accusers, "to pen up" the African race on an area nearly a million of square miles in extent!! Really, this subject is hardly susceptible of being treated with becoming gravity, and I dismiss it.

Let me now look a moment at the provisions of this bill, so far as they profess to offer us a compromise of the question of slavery in the territories. And here I desire to say, that I intend no reflection upon the conduct or motives of the committee, collectively or individually. I deal only with the measure; but of that I must speak freely and frankly.

There are but two direct references to slavery in the bills they are contained in the twenty-sixth and thirty-third sections, and both are to the same purport. They prohibit the territorial governments of California and New Mexico from legislating on the subject.

There is one indirect reference to slavery. It is contained in the twelfth section of the bill, which declares the laws now in force in Oregon to be valid and operative for three months after the legislative assembly meets; and, as we all know, one of these laws prohibits slavery.

These, then, are the great provisions of this bill. They leave the whole of New Mexico and California open to the introduction of slaves, and prohibit the territorial governments from legislating on the subject, even if disposed to legislate for their exclusion. And, in consideration of this abandonment of all the territory we have acquired from Mexico to slavery, we have received from the hands of the committee the boon of freedom for three months in Oregon. This is the great concession to the non-slaveholding States; and this is presented to us as a compromise—a compromise which surrenders everything on one side, and considers nothing on the other. Let me pursue this subject, by examining some of the propositions with which this bill was ushered into the Senate chamber, by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] as chairman of the committee of eight. They are so extraordinary, that I cannot [illegible] I had them to be a true exposition of the meaning and the object of the bill by the one who, of all others, is best qualified to interpret it—the one by whom it was drawn. I give the most credence to his interpretation of it, because, on a careful examination, I can put no other construction on it myself.

The first proposition is this: (I read from his remarks:)

"We [illegible] was [illegible] with [illegible] [illegible] that portion."

I consider this proposition unsound in all its parts. In the first place, our own experience teaches us that slaves will be carried wherever they are permitted to go; that no soil will be free where they are not excluded by law. They were taken into the territory northwest of the Ohio river. There are now five slaveholding States north of 36° 30'; Missouri, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, and Kentucky. On a former occasion, I said that slaves would be valuable in any part of the country, in the early stages of settlement, where the demand for labor is urgent. And I have no hesitation in saying, that if this bill passes both Houses, and becomes a law, they will be carried into every part of New Mexico and California which is habitable. This will be its practical effect. Even if the northern portion shall in future years abolish slavery, it will be left with a black population—a burden and an incumbrance to the white race, and an impediment to its moral and physical development.

But the latter part of the proposition is far more objectionable than the first; and I regret exceedingly to learn that it was conceded with unanimity. I deny that there is any portion of these territories where free labor can never be introduced. I deny that there is any portion of the globe which nature designed for slavery. It would be an impeachment of the character and purposes of the great Author of the universe to concede that there is any portion of the earth in which we cannot "stand fast in the liberty" wherewith God has made us free. I deny that there is any portion of Oregon, or New Mexico, or California, to the cultivation of which slave labor is indispensable. The suggestion is as unsound in fact as it is in philosophy. I do not admit that there is any portion of those territories to which African, much less slave labor, is indispensable. There is no portion of it less suited to white labor than the southern portion of Spain—none which has a more fiery sun than Andalusia—where slavery does not exist. Besides, there is a free Indian population, natives of the climate, willing to work, singularly docile, and adequate to all the demands for labor for years to come.

I regret exceedingly to have heard the admission that slave labor is necessary in these territories. But I have ceased to be surprised at anything from any quarter. I have heard of one of the principles of the Declaration of Independence impugned, and its author charged with error in advocating the exclusion of slavery from the territories of the United States. I have heard negro slavery defended as founded in right, as justified by the laws of God, and lauded as "the mildest species of bondage which labor ever bore to capital on the face of the globe." I confess I have been astonished at these declarations, so different from all I have heard and read of the sentiments of the great men of the republic from its foundation to the present day. I have been taught, and taught by the South, to regard slavery as an evil to be got rid of, and not as a good to be communicated to other communities.

The Senator from Delaware, after proposing to organize governments for California and New Mexico, by the appointment of a governor, secretary, and judges, to compose a temporary legislature, without the power to legislate on the subject of slavery, proceeds: "It was thought, that by this means Congress would avoid the decision of this distracting question, leaving it to be settled by the silent operation of the constitution itself; and that, in case Congress should refuse to touch the subject, the country would be slaveholding only where, by the laws of nature, slave labor was effective, and free labor could not maintain itself!"

This proposition is subject to the great fundamental objection I have taken to the other. It contains a direct admission, that by the laws of nature a portion of the country or territory will be slaveholding. I deny that nature has any such law. It is the law of man, doing violence to all the dictates of nature, that makes a country slaveholding, either by its own voluntary act, or by the act of others forcing slavery upon it.

But the chief and radical objection is, that it contains a further admission that the territories are to be left open to the introduction of slaves—that they will be slaveholding wherever slaves can be carried. It is an admission that the "silent operation of the constitution" will be to make the country slaveholding, where slave labor will be effective. I consider it an entire abandonment of northern ground. What is the ground taken by the North? It is, that slavery shall be prohibited in the territories. The act contains no such prohibition. It is a complete surrender to the theories and claims of our friends of the South. All they contend for is, that the territories shall be open, and they left to the unrestricted enjoyment of the right they assert to carry their slaves into any territory belonging to the United States. It is the very extent of their demand. It leaves nothing for them to ask or desire. The distinguished Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] commenced his speech with the assertion that all the South desired was—no legislation. This has been conceded most fully conceded. Indeed, something more has been given up. It was not enough to yield all that was asked. The territorial government is prohibited from legislating on the subject of slavery. This I should not object to, constituted as that government is likely to be, but for a single consideration—as a precedent, it may be of importance. It will constitute an argument in favor of extending the same prohibition to the legislative assemblies, when they shall be hereafter created. But I will not dwell on this at present. I take it as it is. The territorial government is prohibited from legislating; Congress does not legislate; and slavery will extend itself over the whole of New Mexico and California. It will enter the great basin; it will take possession of the maratime valley of California—the American Italy; and when planted there, neither you, sir, nor I, nor our children, will live to see it eradicated.

And, with this assurance, which no man can reasonably doubt, we are invited to leave this matter "to the silent operation of the constitution;" when we all know that the constitution does no more than vest in Congress the power to legislate for the territories. It is an invitation to us to leave this power unexercised, and to let slavery extend itself wherever self-interest can carry it. It is the same argument that was used in the federal convention against the abolition of the slave trade. Our fathers were invited to leave the whole subject to the laws of nature. It is the argument which has been employed on all occasions to resist every attempt to prevent the extension of slavery. It was urged against restrictions upon Louisana, against restrictions upon the territory northwest of the Ohio river, against restrictions upon the territory west and northwest of the Mississippi, when Missouri was admitted into the Union. Did those who have gone before us yield to these persuasions of self-interest? No, sir, they refused to accede to them. They prohibited the introduction of slaves into the territories. They considered it as a political question, proper only to be decided by themselves, and not to be shuffled off upon the judiciary. They met the responsibility like men, and decided it according to the dictates of duty and right. This scheme of the committee, so far as it professes to be a compromise, secures nothing to the North. To the South it yields up all. It concedes all that is asked, all that is desired. It imposes no restriction; it sets up no barrier; it leaves the whole field open to be entered and taken possession of, unresisted and unopposed. It is an unconditional surrender; it has not even the grace of a capitulation upon terms.

If gentlemen suppose this proposition will calm the prevailing excitemnt, they are greatly mistaken. What does it contain calculated to allay agitation in the North? Does it concede anything to the non-slaveholding States? No, sir. It excludes slavery nowhere—not even in Oregon. It only continues her prohibition in force for three months after the first meeting of her legislative assembly. The prohibition is then to cease. From that moment slaves may be introduced, unless the prohibition is re-enacted. They will not be excluded then, if Congress shall disapprove the re-enactment. Oregon comes here with an organic law prohibiting slavery forever; and we throw it back upon her with a mere temporary vitality. We virtually invite her to reconsider it, as if it had been passed without reflection, or as if, on further deliberation, she may think it advisable to receive slaves into her bosom. Indeed, it is not necessary for her to do any act. She has only to be passive. We virtually repeal the prohibition. And this the committee give us to calm excitement! Sir, I consider this whole scheme of legislation unworthy of the high character of the country, unworthy of our fathers, unworthy of ourselves. It is commended to us, that Congress may avoid the decision of the question. It is an evasion of responsibility, which will defeat its own purpose. It is sowing the seeds of a future agitation, vastly more profound and exciting than this. It is a temporary colonization of this controversy, to be sent out to the Pacific to stir up dissension among the first settlers, and then to be brought back here, after a time, to renew agitation among ourselves. It will turn out, like every other device of timidity, which shrinks from one embarrassment only to plunge deeper into another.

But, sir, we have reason to be thankful that our case is not utterly void of hope. We are flattered by the chairman of the committee with the assurance that Congress will be at liberty hereafter to give us the Missouri compromise, and run out the line of 36° 30' to the Pacific. He considers the arrangement temporary.

It is not so with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] He has pronounced it permanent. And, what is eminently worthy of attention, the bill was to speak for itself. It was so announced. Well, sir, it has spoken for several members of the committee; and it is artfully or inartificially contrived, that it speaks a totally different language in each case.

But let us pause and survey this bow of promise which the chairman of the committee has hung out in the distance for our encouragement and hope—the Missouri compromise. When it presents itself, I shall be opposed to it—utterly, irreconcilably; because it will extend slavery where it does not exist; because it would subvert the laws of Mexico which have abolished slavery, and introduce it where it is prohibited. It bears no analogy to the compromise of 1820. That settlement of the question, which was confined to Louisiana, contracted the area of slavery. This would extend it. The whole of Louisiana was open to the introduction of slaves. Slavery nominally existed there. But beyond the limits of the State of Missouri, north of 36° 30', the territory was nearly uninhabited. The compromise conceded no right. It was the law of abolition or emancipation; but it prohibited the extension of slavery to areas over which, without such a prohibition, it would have been extended. How widely different is this proposition? It is to extend slavery where, without the sanction of the public authority, direct or indirect, it cannot go or exist. It is a proposition to establish slavery by law in a district of country more than two hundred thousand square miles in extent, equal to the entire area of France or the Spanish peninsula. On every principle of justice and right I shall be opposed to it; justice to ourselves, to our national character, and to the future millions who are to occupy the great Pacific, or maritime valley of California—literally the Italy of America, in all but the monuments and classical recollections of the other. Let us look at this question practically. The proposed compromise would carry out the line of 36° 30' to the Pacific, and prohibit slavery north of it. Let us see the geographical divisions it would make. It would divide New Mexico just above Santa Fe, leaving that city and two-thirds of the entire State or territory to the South. How is the distinction between slave and free territory to be maintained? Are we to have two territories with separate political organizations, or only one with an astronomical line separating the bond from the free? Passing New Mexico, the compromise line would cross the Sierra Madre, or Rocky Mountain chain, and enter a district but little explored, but, so far as known, barren, and almost worthless—leaving a strip of three parallels of latitude to the south. It would next graze the great basin of California—one of the most remarkable features in the geographical conformations of this continent—represented by Fremont as Asiatic rather than American in its character. It is five hundred miles in extent in all directions, enclosed by mountains—the Sierra Madre on one side and the Sierra Nevada on the other—and has its own systems of lakes and rivers. It is for the most part sterile, but with numerous and in some cases extensive tracts capable of cultivation. Passing the great basin without touching it, the compromise line would cross the Sierra Nevada, and enter the maritime valley of California, five hundred miles in length and one hundred and fifty in width from the summit of the mountain chain, which forms its eastern boundary, to the coast range on the Pacific. This valley—the finest in the western hemisphere—is represented by Fremont as bearing a close resemblance to Italy in extent, in climate, and in its capacity for production. It is the natural region of the vine and the olive, and of the infinite variety of grains and fruits which the earth brings forth in tropical climates. Though much further north, it has all the mildness of the tropical regions on the eastern face of this continent. The compromise line would sever this noble valley latitudinally, leaving four hundred miles to the North and one hundred to the South. It yields nothing to the production of which slave labor is necessary. Slavery would go there as a bane and a hinderance, rather than as an aid, even to production. Why, then, seek to introduce it, when no good purpose is to be answered—when it can only prove an element of unmixed evil? Why sever a region which nature designed for unity in its geographical conformation, its climate, soil, and capacity for production? How is the social distinction which the compromise line would introduce to be preserved inviolate? Will you have two governments, or one with an imaginary line to define the boundary between slavery and freedom? Sir, this whole scheme of division is wrong in all its elements—geographically, politically, morally wrong—and I will have no part in it.

Such, Mr. President, would be the Missouri compromise line, applied to New Mexico and California. Bad as it would be, the bill reported by the committee is still worse. It leaves all open: it surrenders all. It will dedicate the whole of this noble valley to slavery, and exclude from it the freemen of the North, who will not go where their labor is to be degraded by mingling it with the labor of blacks. Sir, there were gallant bands from the North and West, who "coined their hearts and dropped their blood for drachmas" on the ensanguined plains of Mexico, to make this acquisition. They are gone beyond the reach of sympathy on the one hand, or injustice on the other. But against their fathers and their children you will by this act put forth an edict of perpetual exclusion from an inheritance purchased by filial and paternal blood.

There is another consideration which ought not to be overlooked. We have been accused, for the last two years of making war on Mexico to obtain territory for the extension of slavery. We have denied the truth of these imputations. We have resented them as doing injustice to our intentions. And yet, sir, the treaty is hardly ratified before we are engaged in a struggle in the American Senate to extend slavery to the territory we have acquired. How can we stand up, in the face of the civilized world, and deny these imputations, if the proposition of leaving these territories open to the introduction of slaves is consummated?

I do entreat our southern friends earnestly, solemnly, not to press this measure upon us: I mean that of insisting on the right to carry slaves into New Mexico and California. I say to you in sincerity and with the deepest conviction of the truth of what I say, that the northern feeling can go no further in this direction. I appeal to you, through the memory of the past, to do us the justice we have rendered to you. You asked for Florida. You said it shut you out from the Gulf of Mexico. It was an inlet for political intrigue and social disorganization. It was necessary for your safety. We united with you to obtain it. Our blood, our treasure was freely shared with you in making the acquisition. We gave it up to you without reserve. You asked for Texas. It was said to be in danger of falling under the control of your commercial rivals. It was necessary to your safety. You said it would become a theatre for the intrigues of abolitionism. Your slave population might be endangered without it. We united with you again, and gave you back, by legislation and arms, what you had lost a quarter of a century before by diplomacy. We have now acquired free territory. We ask only that it may remain free. Do not ask us to unite with you in extending slavery to it. We abstain from all interference with slavery where it exists. We cannot sanction its extension, directly or indirectly, where it does not exist. And if the authority of the United States is exerted for this purpose—if slavery is carried into and established, as it will be by this bill, in the territory we have acquired—I am constrained to say—I say it in sorrow—the bond of confidence which unites the two sections of the Union will be rent asunder, and years of alienation and unkindness may intervene before it can be restored, if ever, in its wonted tenacity and strength. Not that I have any present fears for the integrity of the Union. I have not. It is capable of sustaining far ruder shocks than any possible settlement of this question can give. But what I fear is, that the current of reciprocal kindness and confidence which runs through every portion of the community, pervading, refreshing, invigorating all, may be turned out of its course, and forced into channels to which the common feeling is alien, and in which it may be converted into a fountain of bitterness and strife. I conjure you, then, to avoid all this. Ask us not to do what every principle we have been taught, and taught by your fathers, to venerate, condemns as unnatural and unjust.

[Mr. BUTLER made a brief explanation of his remarks of yesterday, [alluded to by Mr. DIX,] which will be given, in connection with his speech, in the Appendix.]

Mr. DAYTON.—Whatever may have been my intention once, I can assure the Senate that at this hour of the day or night, and under existing circumstances, I shall not venture upon an elaborate speech. I understand, however, that a majority of gentlemen on this side are particularly interested in the passage of this bill, have determined to sit it out, and therefore, the little I have to say I will say now. I have no purpose, I repeat, to enter into a discussion of the general question of slavery. It has been traced, I believe, from the legislation of Moses down to the legislation of Congress, and from a system of ethics dating back to the time of Israel, down to a system of ethics of which we are ourselves the authors. If any practical purpose is to be attained by this course of argument, I, at least, am ignorant of it, while I cannot but see that it is productive of much asperity of feeling. For myself, proposing to do little else than to justify the single vote which I shall give to my constituents, I shall [illegible] such topics. The bill has been reported by the committee, to whom the subject was referred as a bill of compromise, and for one, I am disposed to look at it as so intended. It is at least a mode of settlement of this controverted question, if not a compromise.

Mr. MANGUM.—If the Senator will yield the floor for a moment, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAYTON assented, though he added, not on his own account; and the yeas and nays being taken upon the motion, it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Benton, Clayton, Dawson, Miss Dickinson, Dix, Foote, Mangum, Mason, Morris, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Sebastian, Soulé, and Underwood—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cass, Chase, Clarke, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dodge, Dodge, of Iowa, Fitzpatrick, Hamlin, Hale, Houston, Hunter, Jameson, of Louisiana, Jameson, of Georgia, Johnson, of Louisiana, Pratt, Rhett, Seward, Spruance, Turney, Wales, Westcott, and Yulee—30.

Mr. DAYTON, proceeded. It is no affectation, when I say of the result of this motion, that it is entirely a matter of indifference, as I shall not attempt an elaborate speech, and I have only to hope that those gentlemen who are so sparing of time to others, will not at a later hour of the day make sure of a little more time for themselves, and that in point of fact they may dispose of the question before another sun shall rise.

This bill has been reported by the committee as a compromise bill. I do not participate in the slightest degree in the feelings of those gentlemen on either side of the chamber, who have denounced the course of this committee, or of any member of the committee as "evasive, cowardly, or skulking." Nothing of the kind. Although I shall vote against this bill, I am yet disposed, I repeat, to do justice to the committee; to look upon the measure as a fairly meant effort at settlement. It seems to me, sir, in many of its aspects to be straightforward, manly and bold. The South, and gentlemen who represent the feelings of the South, put themselves distinctly upon their notion of the constitution and the law as it now is applicable to the territories of Oregon and California. If they have erred in judgment and the case can be fairly tested, their hopes are gone and gone forever. My honorable friend from New York, [Mr. DIX,] who has just taken his seat, seems to think that this bill yields to the South all that they ever asked, to wit, that the matter remain as it is. Sir, they have asked much more. They have asked that the provisional law which excludes slavery from Oregon, shall not be ratified in the bill before us. The South has asked, furthermore, that by dint of affirmative legislation they should be secured the privilege of taking slaves to New Mexico and California. This bill provides in substance, that the law shall remain there as it now is, putting the South upon their constitutional rights for power to carry their slaves there. If they have erred in regard to the law, as I believe in my conscience they have, and the matter can be fairly got into the courts, their case is gone. For one, then, I am disposed to exempt all engaged in concocting this bill, from the imputation of "skulking or dodging" the question in controversy; and more particularly would I exempt the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS.] of all others from this charge. He stands in a position which should at least shelter him at the hands of friends and foes from all such imputation.

It seems to me, too, that there is nothing evasive in the conduct of those who distrust litigation, or who believe there may possibly be a doubt as to the result, or who think it expedient at once by public law to end the question, and conceive that Congress has the right to do so, there is nothing wrong in their saying to Congress, legislate, act upon the subject according to your rights. I feel the force of a remark made by the Senator from Vermont. Believing, as we do, that the law is as we contend for it, to wit, that slavery can exist only by municipal law, and there being no municipal law there, I feel it to be some degree of assistance-ness when we shrink from the position in which the [illegible] ness when we shrink from the position in which the [illegible] It may be, though I trust not, that the time may come when we may have cause to regret that this plan of settlement was not [illegible] adopted. Still, I propose voting against this bill, and to justify myself to my constituents, I shall assign a few reasons. In doing so, I address myself rather to them than to the Senate. I shall assume, therefore, that which southern friends would say ought to be proved. I shall assume, in the first place, that slavery and the existence of slavery is an evil; and, in the second place, that it is calculated to retard the growth and to interfere with the prosperity of any country where it may fix itself. I go into no argument for the purpose of proving these positions. If the appearance of those lines of country, bordered up on one side by slave and on the other by free institutions, do not prove it—if the market value of the land on the respective sides of such lines do not prove it—if the more speedy settlement of the one, as compared with the other, do not prove it—if the more productive labor, man for man, of the one side, as compared with the other, do not prove it—no system of argument can prove it. If it be not self-evident that a system which affords to labor at least the chance of personal reward, and the hope of an improved condition, be not better than that which holds out no hope—which says only to its subjects, eat, drink, and die!—if it be not self-evident that the one is preferable to the other as a means of developing the resources of a country—I repeat, that no system of argumentation can prove it. On the other hand, experience warns us that all this discussion upon slavery, upon its merits or demerits, as a moral or political institution ends in nothing, except in exasperating and destroying the kind feeling that ought to exist in this chamber.

Sir, I mean, too, for the purpose of my vote, to assume the other position, which has been so much discussed in this chamber, to wit, that Congress has the legislative right to inhibit the introduction of slavery in the territories. I have discussed that question on one if not on two occasions before, and have proved it, at least to my own satisfaction; and other gentlemen who have discussed it around me have proved it, I think, to the satisfaction of the world. There has been nothing, indeed, in the course of my legislative experience that has given me so much surprise as the diversity of opinion which I have found suddenly to spring up upon this question—a diversity of opinion, separated by a political, or rather a slave and free line. I have found able lawyers, sound jurists, taking one or the other side of this question, as they happened to be North or South of Mason and Dixon's line! It is a melancholy comment on human nature. The fault must be on one side or the other, or perhaps on both; but, unfortunately, the fact is so. But, sir, so far as precedent or as judicial authority is concerned—so far as adjudicated cases settle anything—there is not a case or a dictum to my knowledge which sustains the position that municipal law is not necessary to protect slavery, or that you have not the right to inhibit the introduction of it into the territories. And I am now happy to understand, if I am able to understand the views of gentlemen who favor this compromise, that they practically abandon the principle for which they had before contended.

It had been argued here by the Senator from South Carolina, by my honorable friend before me, [Mr. BERRIEN,] and by other Senators of the South, that the power to inhibit slavery in the territories does not exist. Now, what is this law? Do you not here, by legislative act, recognise the existence and validity of a law which excludes slavery, for three months at least, from the territory of Oregon? Clearly so. And if it can be done for three months, I need not say it can be done for a thousand years. But you go further, and you provide that the territorial legislature may re-enact the law.

Mr. CALHOUN.—[Remark not understood, but supposed to dissent from Mr. DAYTON'S position.]

Mr. DAYTON.—And does the Senator from South Carolina represent the committee as holding out a compromise or arrangement which, when the time comes, they will not feel themselves bound to keep; thus "keeping the word of promise to the ear, but breaking it to the hope?"

Mr. CALHOUN.—Not at all. The committee did not decide the question of constitutionality.

Mr. DICKINSON.—We did not suppose that a legislative act by Congress could make it constitutional or otherwise.

Mr. DAYTON.—Exactly; but the Senator from New York and the Senator from South Carolina will see, that if they vote for the continuance of the local laws of the territory, it is assuming that they are constitutional.

Mr. CALHOUN.—We did not decide whether they were constitutional or not.

Mr. DAYTON.—Then the Senator from South Carolina and those who go with him are just in this position. They vote for extending a law now in existence in the territory of Oregon which they believe to be unconstitutional.

Mr. CALHOUN.—We inserted the words if not inconsistent with the constitution.

Mr. DAYTON.—Then the Senator puts himself in the awkward position, that when this law is re-enacted in Oregon, and comes back for our approval, these southern gentlemen, who hold out to us this measure as a means of settling the question, will turn round and say, the law is unconstitutional and vote against it!

Mr. DICKINSON.—The court may say otherwise. We do not call upon the courts to decide for us. It is a matter aliunde the question of slavery. We are now on a question of constitutional power.

Mr. CALHOUN.—[Not heard.]

Mr. DAYTON.—Will the Senator from South Carolina be good enough to answer me one question? When this law comes back from Oregon, forbidding the introduction of slavery, do southern gentlemen, who tender this measure to us as a compromise, mean to sustain it?

Mr. CALHOUN.—Southern gentlemen are perfectly indifferent on the subject.

Mr. DAYTON.—The Senator does not answer my question. I beg, very respectfully, again to ask, if the law be returned here again for our approval, whether the Senator from South Carolina with his friends intend to vote for it?

Mr. CALHOUN.—I do not. I believe it to be unconstitutional.

Mr. DAYTON.—I have at last got my answer. Then let me say, that this action of the committee, so far as it applies to Oregon, amounts to nothing; its effect will only be to delay action upon the question, and thus drive us round and round in a circle. The three months are nothing; for after the law has been re-enacted by the territorial legislature, and southern Senators, when the law is returned to us for our sanction, are asked to sustain it as part of the compromise they now offer, they say no, we cannot; it is unconstitutional.

Mr. CLAYTON.—If the Senator from New Jersey will permit me, he is under a misapprehension. He seems to entertain the idea that the laws of Oregon must come here to be approved by Congress. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in this. Congress reserves to itself the power to disapprove or annul the law; and unless Congress does this, it remains in force. The affirmative action of Congress is not necessary to give to the territoral enactments the operations of laws.

Mr. DAYTON.—I do not think so, but if so, it is a mere play upon terms, or rather an evasion of the point. It amounts to precisely the same thing. Any person in Congress can raise the question for affirmative or negative question.

Mr. BERRIEN.—If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, the difference is a most essential one. If the approval of Congress were required to give force to the territorial laws, it would require the concurrence of both Houses, and the Executive, but since the law is valid, unless disapproved by Congress, if either House, or the Executive, refuse to disapprove it, the act is valid. It is a difference of one to three. It may be rejected by a union of the three, but not by one branch of the legislative power.

Mr. DAYTON.—But, sir, are we to remain in peace under the force and effect of this compromise, or are we not? It would seem that the Senator's notion is that it merely increases our chances. If we can have the aid of our southern friends for the purpose of carrying this settlement into effect; if we can be assured of that, then there will be something effected by the compromise, but the Senator from South Carolina says we cannot have his vote on this question.

Mr. BERRIEN.—What assurance do you require?

Mr. DAYTON.—The assurance that we require is, that they who now sustain this compromise, will here announce their intention, their willingness hereafter, to sustain all laws made in conformity with it. Here is the act: the 26th article requires that "all the laws" (of the territorial legislature) "shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States, and if disapproved, shall be null and void." They are to come here to be submitted to us for what? Only for action in some way; not to be laid simply on your Secretary's table and never afterwards heard of. It implies that there is to be action affirmative or negative on the subject; but whether so or not, if they be submitted here, I ask again, whether our southern friends, who now hold out to us the olive branch, may not move that negative action be had against this law as unconstitutional? and if so, will you sustain the law? If not, we do not advance one step by this bill. I thought, in the innocence and simplicity of my heart, that this matter, being settled upon the basis of what you call a compromise, that when this law had been returned to us, there would be no further difficulty; that all gentlemen would come forward to its support in conformity with the provisions of the compromise. But it seems I was mistaken; and if so, I must say, there is less in the compromise, and in the action of the committee, than I had originally supposed.

I have said that I shall assume for the purpose of my vote at least, that slavery is an evil; and that I shall assume also the right of Congress to inhibit its introduction into the territories. Under these circumstances it will leave the question of such inhibition one of mere expediency. And here, permit me to say, as I have said before, that I cannot but believe, that we, by our excited discussions, have been instrumental—and I say it not as a sin to one side of the chamber, rather than the other—but we have been instrumental to a great extent, in exciting upon Congress such excitement upon this subject. I believe that in the nature of the question, there is no serious call for this deep feeling which it is said pervades the country. No man pretends to believe, that slavery can ever get into the territory of Oregon, and I think very few believe that slavery can ever to any considerable extent fix itself in California. That a few slaves will get there in the early settlement of the country, I have no doubt; but that slavery will ever fix itself permanently, as a settled institution in that country, I do not believe. From all accounts we are given to understand, that it is physically adapted to none of those sources of industry to which the planting States devote themselves. It grows no cotton, sugar, tobacco, or rice; it is a grain growing and grazing country. Besides, California is qualified for agricultural purposes only by means of irrigation through portions of the year. They have rains there for six months, and drought for the balance of the year; it is either feast or famine with them. The growth of grain or anything else by process of irrigation is not calculated for slaves, and, in my judgment, this fact, with others, will forever prevent California from becoming permanently a slave State. Still I am not disposed, the North is not disposed to take the chance; we are not disposed to leave the country open, if by any fair act of legislation we can shut it against the admission of slaves. But we are here met with the general charge against the North of aggression upon the rights of the South; we are charged heretofore and now as faithless to our compromises. This has been rung in our ears from month to month, and from year to year. Sir, I deny it in the whole and in all its parts If we look at our past history, we will see that while the South has lately made immense strides in the acquisition of territory, the North, the free North, has, in comparison at least, made none at all. So far from the North forsaking her compromises, they have always remained steadfast, but I cannot say the same for the South. The first compromise on the question of slave territory, as I have on a prior occasion said, was at the adoption of the constitution. Then the two parties in this country had before them the ordinance of 1787, and the North and the South saw the respective portions of country to which free labor and slave labor would thereafter be confined; and they compromised the question with a view to the state of things which was then before them. A quarter of a century passed by and the South had filled up all its slave territory, when with a southern Executive we acquired Louisiana—then Florida—all slave territories. This opened the question anew; but after an agitation unparalleled in our political history, the matter was again settled by the Missouri compromise, the line of 36° 30′. The North has not now one solitary foot of country, except that which they had under this compromise of 1820.

A SENATOR.—We have Iowa.

Mr. DAYTON.—Yes, sir, and we have Oregon, but all the title that we have now to either of them we had then. At the time of that compromise we had all the country we have now. But another quarter of a century passed by, and the South again filled up every foot of territory allotted to her by the Missouri compromise; not an acre remained for the further spread of her institution. Without Texas or some other foreign acquisition, not another slave State could have been added to the Union through all time; you had got to "the end of your tether." But then, through the agency of another slave administration, disregarding past compromises, you annexed Texas. And on that occasion I felt assured you would not stop there, and so expressed myself.

I then put myself on record, (and it will be so found in my printed remarks then made,) I ventured my character with posterity upon the prediction that the South would never rest content with a limit this side of the Pacific ocean. Little did I suppose, that less than three short years would verify the prophecy. I say with all respect, that so far as compromises upon this question of free and slave territory are concerned, the North from the beginning has stood by every compromise, whilst the South has stood by none; as soon as the territory allotted to it by past compromises was filled up, it has reached out its hand to grasp at and secure more. And yet the North is constantly berated as faithless to its compromises; as aggressive in its policy. Never was there a more unjust and groundless clamor; and yet I regret, even under these circumstances, that this question of slavery is now here; that it is made a matter of excitement in the country at large. I would have been willing almost (if it could have been silently done,) that we should have trusted the settlement of these territories to the effect of natural causes. But, sir, we are here in the midst of this excitement, we are driven to vote upon the question, and, as I have said on other occasions, whenever I am forced into a position which compels me to vote upon a question involving, or seeming to involve slavery, I can vote but in one way. My honorable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] who so eloquently addressed the Senate, tells us that we do not multiply slaves at all by extending them over these territories; that it is a mere diffusion and not an increase of slaves, he appeals to us, asking whether we desire that they shall be penned up within their negroes and squalid poverty come over them, until negro and white man shall be buried in one common grave. No, no, God forbid! I have heard from no man from a free State anything that looks like such a position. But is it not a received principle, or at least an admitted fact, that a frontier population will increase faster than one in a crowded interior? Is it not certain that the increase of the slaves of the South depends much upon their market value? I speak it with all respect, but do or do not masters encourage marriage on their plantations to a greater or less extent with reference to this circumstance?

A SENATOR.—Not at all.

Mr. DAYTON.—Senators from the South certainly know much better than I do as to this; but will they say to me that, in their judgment, slaves would increase as fast as they now do in Virginia and Maryland if there were no such outlet, no such demand, no such high prices? Do not these give encouragement to a multiplication of slaves? It would be strange, it would be a violation of all that we know of the nature of things if this were not so. I take it for granted, that their numbers will increase as the numbers of whites increase, which is in a degree proportioned to the facilities afforded them for increase—the ready means of support and their market value. But as to penning them up until the South shall become one great charnel house, no man with the feelings of a man ever dreamed of it. But as the country of the South is yet sparsely settled, it will be centuries before anything of the kind could occur. But again, Mr. President, I hold that there has been undue excitement on this subject at the North, because I believe the law is as we have contended that it was, to wit: assuming that there is no slavery now in Oregon or California, slavery cannot be introduced there without municipal law. It is the creature of the statute book. That slavery is there now I do not believe; we have had the law of the Mexican government read at the table, declaring in express and precise language that no slavery shall exist in any of its provinces. That is the system of peon servitude is but another form of slavery. If I understand it at all, it consists in nothing more than this, that the creditor has a personal lien on his debtor and his services, to the extent and value of his indebtedness.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—And upon his posterity.

Mr. DAYTON.—Well, even if that be so, it does not constitute what we hold to be slavery. The peon or debtor can work it out and so can his posterity; it is a mere question of time.—The Mexican government declares by public law that it is not or it regarded as slavery.

I repeat, that it is a mere lien upon the personal services, the labor of the debtor; and permit me to say, badly as it has been denounced, it is not worse, nor indeed so bad as that law which existed in England and in many of the States, entitling the creditor to seize upon the body of the debtor, and keep him in prison until the debt was paid. He had not the privilege nor the power, indeed, to work it out. Yet I need not argue that this right of seizure, and holding of the body of the debtor constituted no slavery in the eye of the law—nothing of the kind. If a man owe one dollar, he is subject to this system of peon servitude; and yet it can hardly be pretended that this debt of a dollar, which he has the right to work out, can make him a slave; and although the effect may be different, the principle is the same where the debt is a thousand

The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN,] inquires if we will permit this obnoxious system of servitude to remain; and whether we will not abolish it at once? While this system rights are connected—contract rights, according to the Mexican laws, and the wisdom of at once abolishing even this system of peon servitude, interwoven as it must be with the social rights and business relations of the country—may well be doubted. It is suggested—and rightly suggested—that the proper mode of getting clear of the system will be to pass a law upon the subject relating to future contracts. But that is not now the question; that law may be and doubtless is a bad law. By force of this law capital may tread labor under foot; yet, notwithstanding this, it is in no sense of the word slavery. Slavery does not exist, therefore, at all in that territory. If a man take a slave there from a slave State, he takes him where he cannot hold him; he loses the power over him, and, in my judgment, the slave becomes free.

Mr. President, I may have asked, and with some pertinency, believing, as I do believe, that the law is as I contend, why I am unwilling to vote for this bill? I will tell you why. I am unwilling, as I have before said, to go upon record in a position which makes me appear as consenting to the extension of slavery. Again, I am unwilling to do so, because I may be mistaken in my judgment as to what the law is, or rather what it may be decided to be. But here I am reminded by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] that our action will make no difference, that we will have to leave this subject—as a constitutional question—for the Supreme Court of the United States to settle. Be it so, but it is left to be settled under very different circumstances if we pass this act prohibiting slavery, or pass none at all. The decision of the Supreme Court may be very well one way without a law, and another way with it.

Again, sir, I am opposed to this bill on account of other objections on the face of the bill. In the organization of these territories, we know little or nothing of the population of California or New Mexico, or the boundaries of either. New Mexico is a mere fragment of a territory—and hardly that—if Texas be entitled to the boundary of the Rio Grande, which she claims, and will ultimately [illegible]. And yet under these embarrassing circumstances, we are called upon now to organise these territories—while there is nothing in the nature of the subject, or in the position of the territories which demands action now. There is no need of speed upon this subject. But, again, for one, I feel an utter aversion, an invincible repugnance to throwing unnecessarily, the decision of this exciting question upon the Supreme Court of the United States. Let us blow off our own political steam, and that of our excited constituents if we can. That court is the sheet anchor of the hopes of conservatism in this country; if public feeling be excited—as it is said to be—I do not wish unnecessarily to see that court stagger under the weight of this question. I do not want to see that court forced into a position where it will have to decide an exciting question, having fifteen States of this Union upon one side, and fifteen upon the other. Drag that court and your judges into this scene of political strife, and the consequences may yet be deplored by us all.

We cannot even hope, if we judge of the mind of the Supreme Court, from the contrariety of opinion we have had here, that there will be unanimity upon that bench; and if not unanimity, this question will be tried over and over again. Appointments to the bench will be made in reference to it. You will then, sir, have dragged this tribunal, our last, our only hope, into the scene of political strife, and the end may be that you will see its dead body fastened to the triumphant car of one political party, as it shall ride over the prostrate principles and down-trodden battlements of the other. Sir, I do not want to see it. But again, sir, I have yet another reason which operates upon me somewhat in reference to this question, and it is this: I have before me the instructions of the New Jersey legislature upon this subject, asking that all territory to be added, shall be made free territory Now, sir, gentlemen around me well know that I am no believer in the doctrine of instructions, whether they come from my political friends or foes. But I do not hold that legislative instructions are to be entirely disregarded. I do not hold that upon a question of comity or of expediency, that they are not entitled to a respectful consideration. Where I can, without violating my own sense of duty, it will always give me pleasure to conform my action to the sense of my State legislature as I do now. But, sir, let this matter be determined as it may, whether by the Supreme Court of the United States, or by any other tribunal, legislative or judicial, we of the North represent a law-abiding, peace-loving people, and there will be no threats of disunion from us. That is a kind of talk, peculiar, as it seems to me, to Congress; we hear little of it at home. There are no large masses of persons anywhere who contemplate anything of the kind. Yet so excited and perverted are the minds of some here. that they hold the Union just on the verge of dissolution. I regretted to have heard a few days since, a sentiment proclaimed on this floor, which shocked me beyond measure. We were told that in the judgment of the speaker, if the knife were at the throats of our brethren of the South, no help would come from the North, provided only the knife was in the hands of a negro. I hope, sir, I misunderstood the meaning of the speaker; if not, from the bottom of my heart, with my whole soul, I repudiate the sentiment. In the Union or out of the Union, here or elsewhere, now or hereafter, they are our brethren; and as such, though in prosperity we complain, yet in the day of their adversity, if it shall come, they will find we will never forsake, never desert them.

[Mr. UPHAM addressed the Senate at some length in opposition to the bill. His speech will be given in the Appendix.]

[Mr. BELL followed in opposition to the bill, and argued that the period was not propitious for a settlement of the question, in consequence of the excitement existing and the unsettled condition of the public mind. A report of this speech will also be given in the Appendix.]

Mr. BERRIEN.—Mr. President: It is with great reluctance that I consent to occupy the time of the Senate, even for a very brief period, at this late hour of the night, and after so long and laborious a sitting. In doing this, sir, I yield to the wishes of others, rather than consult my own inclination, and will esteem myself particularly fortunate, if, after the very discursive debate which has taken place, I can recall the attention of the Senate to the real question which this bill presents for our consideration. This will be accomplished in the simplest manner, by recurring to the state of the debate on the Oregon bill at the moment when the select committee was raised, and the motives then openly avowed as influencing the Senate in raising it.

Sir, we had before us a bill providing for the government of the territory of Oregon, in which there was contained a provision which asserted indirectly the power of Congress to legislate on the subject of slavery, and to inhibit its existence in a territory. I advert to this fact as well for the purpose of recalling it to the recollection of the Senate, as to repel an assertion which has been reiterated in the course of this discussion, that it has been provoked by the South; and I avail myself of the occasion to say that such an imputation is entirely inconsistent with the fact. A brief reminiscence will prove the truth of this assertion. The Territorial Committee presented to us a bill for the establishment of a government in Oregon, and Senators pressed upon us the consideration that the condition of that people imperatively demanded the protecting arm of this government. We of the South replied to you, give to Oregon such government as her necessities require, but do not taunt us by the useless assertion of a power which can have no practical operation there. The provision in relation to slavery was inserted in the bill for one of two purposes. It was either a wanton exercise of power to accomplish no legitimate object, or it was introduced to acquire the authority of precedent for the exertion of the same power in relation to New Mexico and California. We said to you, omit this provision, which is admitted to be useless so far as the people of Oregon are concerned, and you may pass the bill with whatever speed you choose to give to it. Your refusal imposed upon us the necessity of moving to strike out the section relating to slavery, and thus the discussion originated. It is the North, then, and not the South, which must be responsible for any consequences which may result from it.

The debate proceeded, and various discordant propositions were presented to the Senate. Northern Senators asserted the uncontrolled, unlimited power of Congress to legislate for the territory. We denied the existence of that power in the extent which was claimed for it. They maintained that, even in the absence of legislation by Congress, slavery could not exist in Oregon, because, as they contended, it is an institution contrary to nature, existing only by statute, and therefore necessarily local. We questioned the correctness of this position; but we said to our opponents, if you have confidence in your opinion that slavery cannot exist where it is not protected by positive statute, act upon your conviction; forbear to legislate; strike this provision from the bill, and it will pass without opposition from the South. Gentlemen were unwilling to rely upon their own repeatedly avowed convictions. They insisted upon legislating where they asserted that legislation was unnecessary, and, as a consequence, therefore admitted that it was useless.

In the midst of this protracted discussion, the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] actuated by motives which found a cordial response from a majority of the Senate, proposed to raise the select committee, the result of whose labors is before you. And now, sir, I inquire for what purpose was that committee raised, if it was not with the hope of avoiding this exciting discussion on the subject of slavery? If we could have anticipated the rhetorical displays, alike violative of truth and decorum, which have been exhibited in this discussion; if we could have foreseen that the occasion would have been seized upon to utter denunciations against this institution, which, if true, would put every man connected with it beyond the pale of humanity, what motive could we have had for consenting to raise this committee? Sir, I had hoped, I continue to hope, notwithstanding the opposite feeling heretofore manifested in this debate, that the attention of the Senate will be directed, not to extravagant, distorted, unfounded calumnies in relation to slavery, but to the questions presented by this bill—the mode of conciliation which it proposes.

Mr. President, there are some minor objections to this bill, to which I will first very briefly advert. It is said that the boundaries of New Mexico have not yet been definitely settled, and that until this is accomplished it is improper to establish a government for that territory. Sir, the answer is plain one. The terms of this bill are equally applicable to that territory, whether it be of larger or of smaller dimensions. Nay, the fact of the existence of the claim of Texas to a portion of New Mexico, furnishes of itself a strong reason for its organization. It is fit that the interests of the United States should be protected there by their own officers, and that the territory should not be left in the anomalous condition in which it now is.

Again, it is said that the right of appeal which is provided by this bill is illusory; that the limitation of it to cases where the value in controvery, exclusive of costs, exceeds two thousand dollars, will prevent its exercise by a person suing for his freedom. Sir, if Senators will examine the case mentioned by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] they will see that this difficulty is altogether imaginary. In that case the Supreme Court decided that when in a petition for freedom the appeal was taken by the petitioner, the requisition as to value did not apply, because there the question of freedom was the ground of the appeal, and that could not be appreciated by money; but where the defendant was the appellant, as his right of property was the matter in controversy, it must be of the money value required by the act; but, sir, having acquiesced in this bill, I desire to see its provisions fairly carried out, and will therefore readily assent to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] or any other which may be necessary to accomplish the object.

But, again, it is objected that this is an evasion of our duty; a transfer to the Supreme Court of a responsibility which we ought ourselves to assume. Mr. President, this is a misapprehension. Congress forbears to exercise a doubtful power, by legislating on this subject. It leaves the conflicting claims which have given rise to an exciting discussion in this chamber, on the footing on which they stand under the constitution and laws. When a case arises under these, the court, in the exercise of its appropriate jurisdiction, will take cognizance of it; but this would be equally true if you were to legislate on the subject. You will not deprive that court of jurisdiction, or impose it upon them, by legislating or by refusing to legislate. If we abstain, it is because experience has taught us, in the course of this protracted discussion, that we cannot come to any satisfactory result by legislating on the subject of slavery in these territories.

And now, having stated, and I hope satisfactorily answered, the minor objections to this bill, I proceed to present my own. It is by no means acceptable to me, sir. If I had been free to choose, the rights of my constituents should have been placed on a very different footing. The fact that a southern planter emigrating to one of these territories, and carrying with him his slave property, is liable to be harassed by vexatious litigation, constitutes a serious objection. The disposition to acquiesce in a bill containing such a provision, is an evidence of the strength as well as the sincerity of our desire to adjust this unhappy controversy. I have yielded my assent to it, from the consideration that a decision in a single case would settle finally the principles applicable to all; and that that decision may be promptly had. Questioning, as I do, the power of Congress to legislate on the subject of slavery, the provisions in this bill in relation to the territory of Oregon are by no means acceptable to me, and, standing alone, would not have received my vote. As part of a measure of peace and conciliation, they are presented to me in a different aspect. I know the deep interest which is felt on this subject—how much it concerns us all that it should be amicably adjusted. In the history of all governments, cases have occurred which were not contemplated, and were therefore not provided for by the organic law. This, I think, is such a case, and feeling that the safety of the people is the supreme law; that the continued agitation of this question may endanger the peace and harmony of the Union, I yield my constitutional scruples to the ardent desire which I feel to test the efficacy of this measure as one of peace and conciliation.

Even this poor boon we are not permitted to accept. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. CORWIN] declares that, with his consent, no southern man shall be allowed to emigrate to any one of the territories of the United States, taking with him his slave property.—The inhibition applies not only to the present, but to all future time; not merely to territory already acquired, but to whatever may be acquired hereafter. Whether the acquisition be made by conquest or by purchase, the blood and treasure of the South must be contributed in their full proportion, but all right of participating is to be denied to them. The Senator does indeed admit that what is acquired by rapacity and military violence, may be subject to distribution, on the principle of "honor among thieves"—rather, it would seem, for the purpose of giving scope to his anathema against the mode of acquisition, than from any deference to southern rights. Nevertheless, it is an admission which authorizes me to inquire if the opinions of that Senator, as to the mode in which the territories of New Mexico and California were acquired, have undergone change? He voted with me in favor of the resolution which I submitted to the Senate, as an amendment to the three million bill, and against the bill itself. He voted with me to strike out that part of the boundary in the treaty with Mexico which gave these territories to the United States; and, failing in these modes of resistance, he voted with me against the treaty itself. In all these cases we asserted that the object of the administration was to coerce Mexico to submit to this dismemberment by the terror of our arms; that it would be an acquisition by conquest, which was alike hateful to us both. Has he changed this opinion? Does he believe now that these territories have been fairly acquired by purchase? that they have been reely yielded by Mexico? that they have not been extorted by the terror of our arms? Or does he still believe, as he was wont to do, that they have been wrested by force of arms from a feeble republic? that it is an acquisition by conquest? If so, the admission of the Senator destroys the argument, and renders quite harmless the sentimental and vituperative rhetoric with which he has assailed the rights of the South.

I have been gratified by the reply which the Senator from Ohio has been enabled to give to the inquiry addressed to him by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] that he is unconscious of having used the language attributed to him by this Senator, and that, if used, (as it certainly was,) he now disclaims it. Having entertained sentiments of respect and good will for the Senator from Ohio, he will add to my gratification if he is enabled also to disclaim, or willing to recall, another portion of his remarks. In speaking of slavery as it existed in the southern States, I adverted to the affection which subsisted between the colored nurse and the child committed to her care. The Senator was pleased to speak of that portion of my remarks in terms of eulogy, and as having for a moment beguiled his judgment and led him to believe that this was indeed the patriarchal institution which it was represented to be. He proceeded to say that he was awakened from his delusion by the inquiry of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. WESTCOTT,] in relation to the power of the territorial legislatures, under the provisions of this bill, to establish patrol laws, which, he said, were enacted in the South "to prevent these affectionate nurses from throttling their young masters."

Mr. CORWIN.—I did not suppose the Senator from Georgia could have so misunderstood my meaning in the manner in which I presented the contrast referred to. All that I said on this subject was to present the necessity of watching these slaves, in the form of illustration, in a playful way.

Mr. BERRIEN.—Mr. President, I leave this part of the subject with a single remark: that such levity was, in my judgment, unsuited to the occasion; that the wit which sparkles, is that which inflicts no wound, and that calumny is not divested of its odious character because it is uttered in the form of sarcasm.

Let us pass to the consideration of the more important grounds of opposition to this bill. The interests which it involves are sectional, and the discussion of it has unhappily become so. Northern Senators oppose it, because it surrenders what they are pleased to denominate the rights of the non-slaveholding States, while those southern Senators to whom it is unacceptable rest their opposition on the ground that it surrenders the rights of the South. Surely, sir, this must be a bill of very singular properties, to be open to such directly opposite objections. The claims of the North and South are exactly opposed, and yet it is said to surrender both. Now, sir, this cannot be. One class of disputants or the other must be in error. In my judgment they are both so.

To my southern friends I desire to submit this simple suggestion. The bill abstains from legislating on the vexed question of slavery. It leaves that to be decided by the people of the territories, when they are in sufficient numbers to be admitted as States, and are engaged in forming their State constitutions. In the mean time, if any question of freedom or slavery should arise, the judiciary will take cognizance of it, not by virtue of any provision in this bill, but in the exercise of their pre-existing jurisdiction. All that it does in this regard is to speed the decision of the case by the appellate tribunal. In what sense this can be said to be a surrender of southern rights I am totally at a loss to understand. In a government like ours, that which is properly called a right is something subject to the power of being maintained by adequate and therefore competent [illegible] which a court of justice would be bound to recognize. To say that we have no right which the highest judicial tribunal would recognise, is to admit that we have no right at all. [illegible] to be passed to confer upon us—is to concede in its whole extent the argument which is urged in support of the right of the North to the exclusive enjoyment of these territories. Now, sir, I do not entertain this opinion. If I did, if I thought that in strict law our right could not be maintained, with the conviction which I have of the undoubted equity of the claim of the South to participate in all acquisitions made by the expenditure of the common blood and treasure of all the States, I would have remained silent, and would have left the argument to be sustained by those who were to profit by its allowance. I have asserted the claim of the South, and I am not willing to return to my constituents and tell them that I have asserted that claim, but had not sufficient confidence in its validity to trust it to judicial decision. If we have no right to carry our slaves into these territories without the permission of Congress, (and that is the position in which this argument places us,) we may abandon at once the idea of having any share in them, for the Missouri compromise line was rejected by the select committee, and will be by the House whenever it is offered.

But let us examine the argument which denies this right. It runs thus:

Slavery exists only by force of local statutes, and is not protected beyond the limits within which they operate. The laws of a conquered country continue in force until they are repealed by the conqueror. Slavery has been abolished in New Mexico and California, and I cannot be re-established there without the sanction of Congress—by the repeal of the existing law, and the enactment of a law of slavery.

Now, Sir, it is not true in point of fact that slavery exists or has existed only by force of local statutes. The fact has been assumed in certain judicial decisions, and has been reiterated here, but it is contradicted in others, and is utterly at variance with the history of all of the original States. Would it be consistent with this, will find that slavery existed in all the colonies before any law was passed to authorize it. It was introduced into them by the cupidity of the mother country, (seeking to avail herself of the profits of the African slave trade and of the market which the colonies afforded for the sale of slaves,) not only without any local law to authorize it but in the face of the remonstrances of the colonists, and of acts passed by local legislatures, which were negatived by the royal governors. When, in process of time, it became necessary to regulate this peculiar class of people, and to distinguish between those who were free and those who were slaves, such laws were passed; but slavery existed long anterior to then enactment. The case of Georgia is striking in this particular. That colony was settled in 1732, under the government of trustees, which continued for about twenty years, when they surrendered their charter, and it became a royal province. In 1735 the trustees passed an act prohibiting the use and importation of negroes into the colony, yet, in despite of this, they were introduced from South Carolina; so that, when the government of the trustees ceased, it was deemed advisable to repeal the prohibitory act. But the first law recognizing the existence of slavery in that colony, was passed in 1770, some twenty years after. Such, on examination, will be found to have been the fact, I doubt not, in all the colonies. There is an express recognition of it in a case decided in Louisiana, in which the court say: It is an admitted fact that slavery has been permitted and tolerated in all the colonies established in America by the mother country. And again: Slavery existed in the colonies long before any legislative act of the mother country authorizing their introduction, except the charter of the African company, and before any colonial act had passed declaring its existence.

In a case decided in Virginia, the court say: The slavery of the African has existed from the time of bringing them into the colony—in many States by express enactments declaring them slaves, in others by custom.

In Virginia it is certain that slavery existed long before any local laws were passed to authorize it—nay, notwithstanding the provincial legislature attempted to impose a tax which would amount to a prohibition of their importation; and so little foundation is there for the assertion that slavery exists only by force of local statutes, which has so often been made on this floor, that in the case from Louisiana, to which I have first referred, the court say: It may be laid down as a legal axiom, that in all governments, in which the municipal regulations are not absolutely opposed to slavery, persons reduced to that state may be held in it.

The foundation of the first proposition, the assumed fact on which it rests, is therefore taken from it. It is not true, as we have seen, that slavery exists only by force of local statutes. It existed in these colonies long anterior to any local statute in relation to it. Those statutes recognized and regulated, but did not establish it. The principle stated by the court in Louisiana, to which I have referred, was that on which it rested. The persons brought to the colonies by the African company, had been reduced to slavery, according to the laws and customs of their own country, either as captives in war, or in whatever other mode, and there being no municipal regulation in the colonies opposed to it, they were held in that condition. The remaining branch of this proposition, that slavery cannot exist beyond the limits of the State in which it is established, I will consider presently.

The next proposition stated by Senators is this: the laws of a conquered country remain in force until they are altered by the conqueror. It is not necessary to deny this position, but it is desirable to understand it. A country subdued by force of arms is held as a conquest until the right of the conqueror is acknowledged by a treaty of peace, or until so long a time has elapsed as to destroy the right of post liminii of the nation from whom it has been wrested by force of arms. If it has been yielded in the treaty of peace, the terms of that treaty settle the condition of the inhabitants. Now, that New Mexico and California are the fruits of conquest—that Mexico has been compelled to yield them by the terror of our arms, and for the preservation of her nationality—is a proposition which I do not doubt. But she has yielded them, and a definitive treaty of peace has settled the condition of their inhabitants. They no longer stand upon the footing of a conquered people. They were left by the terms of that treaty free to choose between Mexico and the United States. If they had adhered to the former, they would have continued to enjoy the benefit of Mexican laws by a removal to some other part of Mexico. If they chose the latter, they became at once entitled to the privileges of citizens of the United States, and in due time to be admitted as members of the Union. Can those privileges be enjoyed in subservience to Mexican laws? A citizen of the United States has the privilege of worshipping God according to the dictates of his own conscience. The laws of Mexico prescribe the only form in which that worship is allowed. A citizen of the United States is entitled to his personal liberty; his lands and tenements, goods and chattels are liable for the payment of his debts, but his person is exempt. For non-payment of a debt the laws of Mexico subject him to slavery, which can only be terminated by the certificate of the creditor that the debt has been discharged. Are Mexicans who have elected to become citizens of the United States still subject to these laws? Are citizens of the United States who have emigrated or may emigrate to these territories to be subjected to them? Who will affirm this? Let it be remembered that, in no one of the cases which have been referred to by Senators, was the question we are considering distinctly in issue.

The opinions on which they rely are the obiter dicta of the learned judges who uttered them. In the case decided by Lord Mansfield, the question was, whether the King, by virtue of his royal prerogative—that is, independent of Parliament—could impose the duty or tax which was the subject of controversy. It was a question of British constitutional law, and was the only one decided in the case. In the case of Canter, the inquiry related to the validity of a decree in a court of admiralty in Florida, established by the territorial legislature, under the authority of Congress; and the question which it was necessary to decide was the right of this government to acquire territory, and the consequent power to govern it. In the case of Strother and Lucas, the point decided was, that the inhabitants of Louisiana were entitled to the protection of their property, as well under the treaty as by the law of nations, and, in determining the question of title, to have the benefit of those laws under which it accrued. The distinct question whether the laws of a country which is acquired by treaty, incorporated into the United States as an integral portion of it, whose inhabitants are declared to be entitled to the privileges of citizens of the United States, and for which a territorial government has been established by Congress—the question whether those laws continue to exist and to operate prospectively, has not, I think, been decided. In relation to the past, they are certainly effective to protect rights acquired under them; but, in relation to the future, the laws of the United States and those made by the territorial legislature, under the authority delegated to them, are the only recognized laws of the territory, unless Congress shall otherwise provide. Accordingly, in the act establishing territorial governments in Louisiana and Florida, there is in each case an express provision continuing the pre-existing laws, under certain restrictions. If without this provision they would have been in force, why was it made?

But, Mr. President, is it quite certain that slavery is abolished in Mexico? I do not now speak of peonage, or white slavery, but of that of the African race? The Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE,] has exhibited the decrees of the Mexican President and Congress of the 15th September, 1829, and of 1837. Now, it is very clear that slavery had not been abolished by the first act, or there would have remained no slaves to be manumitted by the second. And yet it provides that "the owners of slaves manumitted by this decree shall be indemnified for the interest they hold in them," &c. It is certain, then, that there were slaves in Mexico in 1837, notwithstanding the decree abolishing slavery in 1829. The truth I suppose to be, that these decrees were acts declaratory of the will of the government, to be carried into effect when its financial condition permitted. They did not mean to deprive the owner of his property without indemnifying him. Accordingly, in the second decree, they provide for an appraisement and the issue of scrip to the owner, payable at the Treasury. This appraisement was to be made by "duly considering the personal qualities of the slaves." How were the appraisers to do this unless the slaves were produced to them, and how could they be produced if they became free eo instanti on the publication of the decree, and before the appraisements were made, and of course at liberty to go wherever they might think proper. I suppose, therefore, looking merely to these decrees, that the abolition of slavery in Mexico enacted by them remains to be completed by the appraisement of the slaves, and the indemnification of their owners, and that until this is done they are inoperative, or rather their operation is incomplete.

And now, sir, having offered to the Senate such suggestions as occur to me on the questions we have been examining, I turn to the consideration of that which is in my judgment most important—the right of every citizen of the United States to remove with his property, of whatsoever kind, to any territory of the United States. He who denies this, is prepared to deny the right of all, to participate equally in that which has been acquired by the united efforts of all; to assert, as a legislator, what as an individual he would blush to affirm, that the majority of a joint association have a right to appropriate exclusively to themselves the whole gains of the copartnership. The farmer of the North may emigrate to these territories with his family and household goods, with his apprentices and hired laborers, his herds and his flocks, his property of every description. Why is not a like privilege accorded to the southern planter? I am told that negroes are not property beyond the limits of the States in which the owner resides; that beyond those limits they are considered as persons, over whom the owner can exercise no dominion. Mr. President, I have before pointed out the fallacy of this position, but I desire again to expose it to the view of the Senate. Sir, no case has been, no case can be produced to sustain it. Certain State courts have affirmed that a slave brought with the consent of his owners within the limits of a State whose laws forbid slavery, thereby becomes free. The correctness of these decisions may well be doubted, so far as they apply to a citizen of the United States transiently passing through such States, not resident therein; but, waiving this, it must be obvious to every Senator that they fall very short of the position which they are adduced to maintain. They do not decide that the slave becomes free by passing beyond the limits of the State where his master resides, but by entering within the limits of a State whose laws forbid slavery. To sustain the position which is contended for here, it is necessary to produce a case which decides that a slave becomes free by passing into a territory where there is no law prohibiting slavery—into a territory which is the common property of all the people of the United States, whose inhabitants owe a common allegiance to a government whose constitution and laws do not prohibit, but expressly recognize the proprietary interest of the master in his slave. Such a case has not been and cannot be produced. The precise converse was decided in the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in the case to which I have before reierred. The learned judge who pronounced that decision stated it as a legal axiom, that in all governments in which the municipal regulations are not absolutely opposed to slavery, persons reduced to that State may be held in it. If, then, the abolition of slavery has not been completed in Mexico, or if, as I suppose, Mexican laws will have ceased to exist, under the provisions of the treaty, from the establishment of territorial governments in New Mexico and California, and the extension of the laws of the United States over them, this is, then, the precise case suggested by the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in which persons previously reduced to slavery, may be held in it.

I have said that slaves were recognized as such in the constitution and laws of the United States. They are recognized both as persons and as property. As persons they constitute an element of representation, giving political rights to their owners which they would not otherwise possess. As property they are liable to taxation, and have been subjected to it whenever you have resorted to direct taxes. Your laws provide for the taxation of slaves, and the collection of the tax by distress and sale, by your officer, of the slaves so taxed. Under the operation of these laws, slaves are now held who have been purchased from your officer, under warrants issued by your command. They have been sold at your instance, and the proceeds of the sales have been paid into the national treasury. You are daily repeating this operation by the sale of slaves under executions founded on judgments recovered against defaulting officers. Do you mean to deny the title which has been given by your command, under the authority of your laws, while you retain in your Treasury the price of the slave?

Again: slaves are recognized as property by your navigation laws. You provide for their transportation coastwise, from the port of any State to "any port or place within the limits of the United States." You require certain things to be done by the owner, and thereupon your officer, under the authority of law, grants him a permit to transport his slave expressly to any port or place within the limits of the United States, to be sold as a slave, or to be held to service or labor. Now, consider the operation of these laws on the question before us. A citizen of Savannah holding a slave, the issue of one purchased by him from your officer, under a sale for direct taxes, for which he has paid the price which you hold, goes before the collector of that port, and, having complied with the requisitions of that law, obtains from him a permit to transport that slave to Monterey, a port or place within the limits of the United States, there to be sold as a slave, or to be held to service or labor; he having your title to this slave, and you having his money, he has also your permit to carry him there as a slave, tell me what authority is there in any territory of this Union which can override and nullify that of the supreme government on which it depends, and from which it derives whatever power it possesses? Holding a title to this slave, given by your officer under the authority of your laws, while the price which he has paid yet remains in the national Treasury—having your permit to carry him there to be sold as a slave, or to be held to service or labor, what authority in that territory, over which you have exclusive dominion, can wrest from the owner the right which he has thus acquired to the labor and service of this slave?

Mr. BRADBURY.—Mr. President: I do not propose to trespass long upon the attention of the Senate at this late hour of the evening. After an uninterrupted session of more than twelve hours, following the protracted one of yesterday, the Senate is too much fatigued, and I find myself too much exhausted to enter upon a general discussion of the very important subject now under consideration.

[Mr. UNDERWOOD here interposed, and desired the Senator to give way to a motion to adjourn; and the same desire was expressed by several other Senators.]

Mr. BRADBURY continued: I do not think it advisable to give way for the motion, as it is well understood that it has been determined to bring the discussion to a close before any adjournment, and the motion has already been voted down once or twice by the friends of the bill. I shall endeavor to be very brief. It was my intention to have considered the subject somewhat at length, but I feel constrained to content myself with a statement of some of the reasons for the vote that I shall give, and some notice of the points I had intended to discuss more fully.

I have examined the bill before the Senate with some care, and I regret that I am unable to give it my assent. I regret that I am unable to concur in opinion with many friends in whose judgment and patriotism I have great confidence. I regret that I am unable to assent to the views of the committee who undertook the difficult task of devising the mode of adjusting the questions which divide the Senate and the country.

I will now refer to some of the provisions of this bill and proceed at once to notice my objections to it.

The bill provides a territorial government for Oregon, with the usual legislative assembly to be chosen by the inhabitants, and recognizes and gives force to the existing provisional laws until three months after the meeting of the first assembly. Amongst their laws is one embracing the 6th section of the ordinance of 1787.

In California and New Mexico the legislative power is vested in the judges, governor and secretary, all appointed by the President, and the inhabitants have no representation or voice in the government, and there is no provision against the admission of slavery into either of the territories.

This bill avoids the great question that has been discussed here, and instead of presenting it for our action, it leaves the subject of slavery in the territories acquired from Mexico, to turn upon the decision, by the court, of another and different question. The great question which has engaged the attention of the Senate for so many days, related to the power of Congress to legislate on the subject of slavery in the territories. This power was asserted on one side and denied on the other. The question has been examined with great care, and discussed with the ability which its importance demanded, and I hoped that the Senate were prepared to act upon it, and would have had an opportunity to do so.

2. The question presented by the bill is a new and different question. It is whether slavery can go into the territories in the absence, and not in the face of a law of Congress against it. This question has thus far occupied but little attention, and been but little discussed. It was presented to us near the close of last week in its present aspect, since which there has not been much time to investigate it, and different opinions are entertained by distinguished members of this body in regard to it, and of the probable decision of the court upon it. The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS] contends with great force, that slavery cannot enter these territories without affirmative legislation to authorize it. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BERRIEN] has just closed an eloquent speech in answer to the argument of the Senator from Vermont, and in support of the position that any citizen of the United States has a right to remove into any territory belonging to the United States, with what is recognized as property in his State, and hold it there. I have, sir, great confidence in the Supreme Court, and in what I believe would be held to be the law upon this subject; but I do not feel authorized, on behalf of my constituents, to hazard the fate of these territories, so far as that may be affected by the admission or exclusion of slavery, upon the decision of this intricate question of law. We leave the subject without the aid of any legislation. This is precisely the ground claimed by the advocates for the extension of slavery into the territories. Positive, affirmative legislation was not asked. The distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] expressly disclaimed asking it in the debate on the Oregon bill.

3. The bill is no compromise in respect to the territories acquired from Texas. The decision of the court would determine the character of the whole. One side would triumph and the other fail as to all, and this under the expectation of compromise.

4. It would lead to great disappointment in one portion of the Union or the other, and would keep the country in a state of suspense until the question was settled—the ardent in each portion hoping to have secured all its claims.

5. It would throw upon the court a subject appropriately pertaining to our duties here, and which Congress should settle. It would transfer to the Supreme Court the responsibility and the interest connected with such a question, and throw upon it a great, and, perhaps, fatal burden. It might be regarded as involving political power, and any decision would be likely to weaken confidence in the judiciary in one part of the Union or the other.

The bill is not, as I fear, calculated to allay the existing excitement, but would probably increase it. It will be seen abroad that different opinions are entertained here in regard to it. Agitators at the North will represent there that northern interests are all sacrificed, and the whole country lost to them. Agitators at the South will take the opposite ground, and fan up the flame of excitement there.

Another objection to the bill of sufficient importance to deserve notice is, that it does not [illegible] the territories. Our first proffer of the benefits of our free institutions to a people recently hostile and strangers to us, should be such as to inspire confidence and secure attachment. Our own citizens who have gone there are accustomed to the exercise of the privileges of an American citizen. There should be some channel through which the grievances that may arise from the exercise of great powers by a few men administering a government in a distant territory, may be made known here. The people should have a voice in the government.

In regard to Oregon, the people have shown how capable they are of self-government, by those provisional institutions which they have established and maintained, and to which they have yielded their assent, in the absence of that protection which it has long been the duty of Congress to extend to them.

They have sent here, then, provisional and fundamental laws, and petitioned Congress to ratify and confirm them. One of these laws embraces the sixth article of the ordinance of 1787. They desire that it should be made permanent. Instead of complying with this request, the bill gives vitality to their laws for only three months after the first meeting of the legislative assembly. It is true, that legislative power is given to this assembly, subject to the revision of Congress, but why is it, that these laws established by the people, under the authority of the provisional government, should survive for so limited a period, instead of remaining in force until they should be changed by the proper authority?

I desire here to call the attention of the honorable chairman of the committee to certain defects in the 24th section of the bill, in reference to securing the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, which may be obviated by an amendment. * * * * * * * This bill must, as I think, fail to commend itself to the enlightened judgment of the country, and I trust that something more satisfactory can be found and adopted.

Having glanced at some of the prominent objections to this bill, I wish here to notice the course of remark which some Senators have felt it incumbent upon them to pursue in reference to the people of the northern States. Allusion has been repeatedly made to the existence of an aggressive spirit in the free States against the South. And the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON,] several days ago, called upon the North "to come up to the constitution, and yield obedience to its mandates;" and the Senator's argument seemed designed to show that unless the institution of slavery should be allowed to extend over the territories we have acquired, the mandates of the constitution would be set at defiance.

I take the occasion here to remark that my constituents entertain no aggressive spirit; and have no desire that an aggressive policy should be pursued towards any portion of the Union. They are attached to the Union. Their business relations connect them with nearly every portion of it. They desire its perpetuity: and they wish that just and equal policy to be pursued which is the surest basis of that perpetuity. For myself, I will say that I am amongst the last to desire a course of aggression.—Satisfy me that a measure involves such a principle, or that it is in conflict with the letter or spirit of the constitution, and I repudiate it. That instrument recognizes the existence of slavery in the States, and all external interference with it there, is a violation of the constitution—dangerous to the harmony of the Union. The rights that are secured to the citizens of a State, those citizens should be permitted to enjoy peaceably, and free from molestation. Such is the sentiment of the great body of the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent here.—They give no countenance to abolition schemes, which infringe upon this principle. They have no sympathy with them. Abolitionism, whatever there is of it, is fed and kept alive by the fanaticism of a few ultraists of the South as well as the North. The general feeling amongst the masses of the people is sound and fraternal. There is no desire to interfere with those rights which the constitution has so wisely placed in other hands.

But the claim to extend the institution over all the territories of the United States, now free from it, presents a different question from that of maintaining the rights secured by the guaranties of the constitution. These questions, resting on different principles, and giving rise to other responsibilities, are so unlike, they cannot be confounded by any one capable of appreciating a distinction.

The allusion to the existence of an aggressive spirit has been introduced in the debate upon this and the Oregon bill—bills to organize territorial governments; and it would seem, for this reason, to be supposed to have a direct bearing upon the policy that has been adopted in respect to previous acquisitions of territory by the United States. Now, sir, what has been the policy? I wish to call attention to it, and to examine it for a moment, not with the view of exciting feeling, but to meet the charge of aggression, and place the people against whom it is made in the position which they in truth occupy upon this subject.

Has an aggressive policy been pursued towards the slaveholding States in the disposition of the territories acquired since the adoption of the constitution down to the present day? Let us look at the facts. Let us examine the history of past acquisitions. The first acquisition after the adoption of the constitution was Louisiana, in 1803. Four States formed out of this territory have been admitted into the Union—three slaveholding and one free. I am aware that there is a large extent of territory embraced in this purchase, which will, in time, be formed into States yet to be admitted. This fact is not to be overlooked, nor its tendency to correct the inequality which would otherwise exist in the apportionment of the purchase. The next acquisition was that of Florida, from which we have one State only, and in that the institution of slavery is established.

We come now to the annexation of Texas, a country of dimensions ample for an empire, and capable of sustaining a population of millions. One State has been admitted, and four more are to come into the Union as soon as they shall have the requisite population. By the constitution of Texas, the institution of slavery is established over the whole. This provision may be modified by the resolution of admission, so far as it relates to the unimportant strip of land situate north of 36° 30′, and it does not affect the general view of the question. These are our acquisitions, since the adoption of the constitution, over which we have extended our laws. From them, six States have come into the Union, Louisiana, Missouri, Arkansas, Florida, Texas, and Iowa, in all of which, with a single exception, the peculiar institutions of the South are established. The free States have added one, the slaveholding States five, thus far, from all our acquisitions of territory. Now, sir, I ask, do these facts indicate the pursuit of an aggressive policy by the former? Is it to be said that they refuse to stand by the guaranties of the constitution, and are encroaching upon the equal rights of the other States? On the contrary, have we not a right to point to the past as furnishing evidence of a liberal and generous spirit? To appeal to it in triumphant vindication from any charge of encroachment? We will not believe that our southern brethren desire a monopoly of the territories. It was but yesterday that we united to acquire Texas—a country probably capable of sustaining a larger agricultural population than Oregon and California. I do not undervalue the importance of these territories to the United States. They give us seventeen degress of latitude on the Pacific coast, with some of the best harbors in the world. They exclude any other nation from planting itself upon the western slope of this continent and controling the trade of the ocean that separates it from Asia. They contain fertile valleys, some of them amongst the most beautiful to be found on the globe. But the vast ranges of mountains, and the barren wastes which characterize a portion of the country, must limit the population which would otherwise spread over so extensive an area.

The acquisition of California and New Mexico has resulted from the war into which we were forced in the defence of Texas. This great country has been added in the scale of the slaveholding States. Were there no other and higher considerations to be weighed than a regard to an equitable division of acquired territory between these States and the free States, should this disposition of Texas be forgotten? Texas was received with her institutions as they were. The trifling exception is too unimportant to be noticed. Slavery existed, and it was allowed to remain.

The territories recently ceded to us by Mexico are now free. We know the repugnance with which the institution is regarded there. The question arises and presents itself for us to determine, whether we should disregard the feelings and wishes of the inhabitants, and force upon them, against their consent what is regarded by a large portion of the American people, as a social, moral, and political evil, or preserve the territory as it is, free. It is contended however, that the southern States would be excluded from a participation in the territories by the exclusion of slavery therefrom. Let us examine this subject of exclusion. No citizen from one portion of the Union is any more excluded, than from another. Any citizen, from any portion, can remove into the territory and settle there, and all have equal rights. Nothing is prohibited to one, which is not prohibited to all. All may be prohibited from carrying there a certain species of property, and all prohibited alike. Citizens in every part of the Union own property, which is as effectually excluded by its character, as if it was done by positive law. This fact does not debar them from removal into the territories, nor from a participation in their enjoyment.

It is unquestionably true, that the prohibition would operate practically to prevent citizens of some States from removing into the territories, who would otherwise go there. And there is exclusion on the other side, to be considered in this connection. The admission of slavery would also practically operate to exclude many citizens from other States, who would otherwise remove into the same territories. The former policy would exclude those who desire to go into them to cultivate the soil by the labor of others. The latter, those who wish to cultivate it by their own hands. Call it a prejudice, if you will, it is none the less operative, that the free laborers of the North have a repugnance to labor by the side of the slave. Labor, with them is honorable; and they have too much independence of feeling to place themselves where it is associated in their minds with degradation. If they emigrate, they will not go where they suppose they may be exposed to the loss of social position. They seek a home, not for themselves only, but for their children. They seek to secure for them, rank and respectability in society; and it is for this, that they sever the ties that bind them to their early homes. The practical exclusion from the territories, of this class of our citizens, is justly entitled to consideration, as well as that to which the attention of the Senate has been so emphatically and repeatedly called. The free laborers of the country have the right to claim that they should not be forgotten. When we are asked if slavery is to be pent up by the east bank of the Rio Grande, it may be well to enquire into the comparative extent of territory which these two streams of emigration have yet to supply with inhabitants. The free States probably contain at this time from eleven to twelve millions of people, and cover an area of less than five hundred thousand square miles. The slave States with a population of less than nine millions, have an area, including Texas with her enlarged boundaries, not much short of ten hundred thousand square miles. The habitual increase of population in the former, combined with the large and increasing imigration from abroad, nearly all of which goes there, create an annual demand for free territory which will exhaust the supply at quite as early a day as slavery. I must be permitted here to remark, that the question we are now considering, is in another aspect of it, a new question. It relates not to restriction, but to the extension of the institution of slavery over territory now free. The ordinance of 1787, adopted by the fathers of the republic, secured restriction where the institution, prior to restriction, had a legal existence. The Missouri compromise did the same. It related to territory similarly situated, and provided that all beyond a certain line should be free. All the territories embraced in this bill are now free, and it is for us to determine how far this feature in their character shall be changed.

Mr. President, it is a great work which commands the attention of the Senate. It is a responsible duty that is devolved upon Congress. Providence has placed in our hands the power to influence or control the destiny of the future States which are to arise on the shores of the Pacific. We are deliberating upon the structure of their political fabric. We are engaged in shaping the frame work, and laying the foundation of their government. Our action must affect for an indefinite period, the social and political condition of the future millions that are to fill the valleys and spread over the hills of this broad region.

What, sir, should be the great and controlling principle that should guide us in laying the foundation of a government for these future States?

I answer; the general good of the people to be governed—their prosperity and happiness.

While we respect our own powers, and are careful not to transcend them, and to do no injustice among ourselves, we should not forget, but should have constantly before us, the interest of the people for whom we are to provide a government. For this, the world will hold us responsible. The people who are to occupy these territories will hold us responsible. Posterity will hold us responsible. We cannot evade the enquiry, what institutions are best calculated to develope the resources, and secure the prosperity of these territories?

But it has been contended that Congress does not possess the power to control the domestic institutions of the territories. It is too late an hour for me to go fully into the discussion of this question, and I shall content myself with a few observations.

The question is, has Congress the power to establish governments for the territories of the United States, and to regulate within them by its legislation, matters of local and domestic concern.

This power must necessarily exist somewhere, and is it to be found in Congress? or do the inhabitants of the territories possess it? Have the people of a territory belonging to the United States, the sovereignty over such territory? If they have, it is a power which, from its nature, they can exercise as they choose. It is the supreme power. Could they not refuse its exercise in subordination to the interest of the United States, declare themselves independent, or transfer this sovereignty, thus possessed by them, to a foreign State?

In the case of territory unoccupied and without inhabitants, would the first settler who entered upon it carry with him the sovereign power over it, dispossess the government, and transfer it to himself? Would the first ten, or the first thousand? The inquiry needs no answer. How, then, can they acquire this power, until it is bestowed upon them, or wrested by them from the government in which it is vested?

But, sir, does it follow from this view of the subject that the people of a territory should not be consulted in regard to the regulations by which they are to be affected, and that all power to participate in providing and establishing the laws by which they are to be governed should be withheld? Not at all. The enterprising pioneers who go forth from the States into the territories, are men of that discernment and that knowledge of the character of our institutions which will enable them to decide, more accurately than we can, in regard to their necessities and the regulations adapted to their condition. It is not only the part of wisdom, but I hold it to be due to them and to the principles by which we profess to be guided, that their will should be respected and their voice heard. Where, then, is the power to legislate for the territories of the United States, and to extend the protection of a government over them? It is in Congress. It is now an admitted principle that the government of the Union possesses the power to acquire territory either by conquest or treaty. Whether the power to govern the territory thus acquired is derived from the express grant of power in the constitution, or is a necessary incident to the power of acquiring, carrying with it the duty and the right to govern, it may not be material to determine, so long as the power is found to exist. It must exist where it is capable of being exercised to meet the necessities of its existence. We have seen that it does not reside in the people of the territory. It is not in the States. The only delegation of power upon the subject given by the constitution, is to Congress. In article 4, section 3, it is declared,

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

In article 1, section 8, the power is conferred upon Congress,

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

It has been contended that the provision of the constitution to which I have first referred, extends the legislative power of Congress no further than the subject of property is concerned; that it is limited to making rules and regulations for the territory as land, and does not include legislation over persons. The object for which this power was conferred was not merely to accumulate money, to raise a revenue by the sale of the public domain. It was to have the land settled; to spread over it a population; to build up prosperous and orderly communities under the regulation of proper authority, to the end that they should become States of the Union.—This was the object; and Congress can make those rules and regulations which are needful to secure the great and controlling purpose for the accomplishment of which the power was conferred. It can do more than to make rules and regulations respecting the soil. It can extend its protection to the inhabitants, and give them a government. Congress has, then, under this provision of the constitution, the power to govern—a power that implies discretion in its possessor. That discretion may be exercised in regard to the adoption of laws for the regulation of the municipal and political affairs of the inhabitants, while they are acquiring the requisites for admission into the Union. It is a discretion of the only legislative, the exclusive, and, therefore, the sovereign power over the territory.

If derived from the other source, as an incident to the right of acquisition, the power of Congress is alike exclusive and sovereign; for by the very act of cession of a territory to the United States, all previous legislative power becomes extinct, and the sovereignty is transferred to the government that acquires. Indeed, a valuable acquisition might be made, when the government could acquire no title to property, and nothing but bare sovereignty.

I admit that this power, although exclusive, is not unlimited. It is not contended that Congress has authority to do in a territory what is prohibited by the constitution. It cannot deny the free exercise of religion, nor abridge the freedom of speech, nor grant titles of nobility, nor rightfully do any thing which would disqualify a territory from becoming a State, thereby defeating the purpose for which the power was given.

It is, however, the sovereign power. The act establishing a territorial government is a full and explicit exercise of sovereignty. Political privileges are conferred and civil rights determined and secured. The right of representation in a legislative council or assembly; the qualification of members and electors; regulations in regard to the descent and conveyance of property; laws for the protection of persons and property, and for the punishment of crime; the right of trial by jury, and the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus—these may be found contained in the bills for the organization of territorial governments, which Congress has passed at different times. As an incident to the general legislative power over a territory, Congress can judge what laws are necessary and proper for its government, subject to the restrictions of the constitution. It follows from these positions, as an inevitable consequence, that this power extends to the subject of slavery as a domestic institution, or Congress can regulate, control, or exclude it, as shall be deemed most conducive or necessary to the general welfare. No one can point to any provision of the constitution which restricts Congress from so doing. It is the regulation of a subject which pertains to local legislation—in a State, to its legislature; in a territory, to Congress—which has the sole power of local legislation there.

Citizens of the States who remove into a territory, become subject, with their property, to its laws. They cannot carry with them the municipal regulations and different and conflicting codes of their respective States, and substitute them for these laws.—The prohibition is no denial of the right to share in the common property; it is merely the regulation of the mode of enjoying it; and it can be enjoyed alike by the North and the South, subject to this regulation. Nor is it a violation of the equal rights of the citizens of each and every State. They all stand on terms of exact equality, and the same prohibition applies to the citizens of every State of the Union, and the same privileges are extended to all.

I will now refer, sir, to some of the many acts of Congress, for the purpose of exhibiting the extent of its power over the territories by legislative precedents. Without reading the authorities this evening, I will cite—

The ordinance for the government of the northwest territory, adopted under the confederation in 1787.

The act of 1789, confirming and giving effect to the ordinance.

The act of 1810, establishing a territorial government for Indiana, and embracing the provisions of the ordinance.

The act of 1805, doing the same in regard to Michigan.

The act of 1809, doing the same in regard to Illinois.

The acts of 1836, and 1838, giving governments to Wisconsin and Iowa.

To the act of March 6, 1820, providing for the admission of Missouri into the Union as a State, and containing a section by which slavery was prohibited in all that part of the Louisiana purchase, excepting that State, which was north of 36° 30′ north latitude.

To the act of 1804, dividing Louisiana into two territories, and providing for their government.

In this act there were provisions in respect to slavery, which fully and emphatically recognized the power of Congress over that subject in a territory.

The importation of slaves from any place without the limits of the United States was prohibited. This was the assertion of a power in respect to territories which Congress did not then, and would not for four years, possess in respect to the States. Sec. 9, art. 1, of the constitution provides that—year one thousand eight hundred and eight."

[redacted]

Not only so, but this act also contained prohibitions against the admission of slaves from any place within the limits of the United States, excepting in certain specified cases.

I forbear further references, as no multiplication of them can give any additional force to the arguments derived from this source. It is sufficient to say, that the precedents are numerous and uniform, and extend through a period of more than half a century.

The rightful exercise of this power has been sanctioned and confirmed by the expositions of the most learned jurists and the authority of our highest courts.

Story on the Constitution says:

[redacted]

In Rawle on the Constitution, page 237, the principle is asserted, that "a general jurisdiction appertains to the United States over ceded territory."

In 1 Peters, 542, the American Insurance Company vs. Canter. Chief Justice Marshall says: the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory. Whichever may be the [redacted]

[redacted]

I will also refer to the case of the Cherokee Nation vs. the State of Georgia, 5 Peters, 44, in which the court says, in reference to art. 4, sec. 3 of the constitution:

"The power given in this clause is of the most plenary kind. Rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States; they necessarily confer complete jurisdiction. It was necessary to confer it without limitation, to enable the new government to redeem the pledge given to the old in relation to the formation and powers of the new States."

I have briefly considered the subject of the power of Congress over the territories, and referred to legislative precedents and judicial interpretations respecting it, as I deemed it to be the foundation upon which some of the strong objections to this bill will be found to rest; for, the power being admitted, it is believed that it could be fairly and appropriately exercised in a bill establishing governments for these territories.

And, sir, is it not strange, that at this day in the history of our country, this power should be gravely called in question? Can we forget that it was asserted under the confederation? That it was not denied by the constitution when adopted subsequent to this assertion? That it has been exercised at different periods, by different Congresses, under nearly every administration, from the origin of our government to the present time? That it has been recognized by Washington, by Adams, by Jefferson, by Madison, of the fathers of the constitution, and by others of the great men who have commanded the confidence of their fellow-citizens, and been elevated by them to the highest trusts in their power to bestow.

I have so profound a respect for the authority of these wise and great men, thus sanctioned by judicial decisions and the practice of the government for more than half a century, that I do not feel authorized to substitute a new construction of the constitution in opposition to them, and to my own convictions of the true interpretation of that instrument.

I forbear to detain the Senate any longer; for I do not propose at this hour to go into the consideration of the moral, social, and political aspects of the institution to which reference has been made.

Before I sit down, I feel constrained, Mr. President, to notice an allusion of the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON,] in the speech, which he addressed to the Senate some days ago. I refer to his intimation, that the action of the South upon the Presidential question, would probably be influenced by the action here, of the friends of a certain distinguished candidate for the Presidency, upon the subject now before the Senate. It is not my intention to discuss political topics in my brief remarks upon this bill; and I will only so far reply to the intimation of the honorable Senator, as to say, that the distinguished individual to whom he alludes—a statesman of great experience, profound knowledge, and devoted patriotism, has been presented, to the country by a great National Party as a NATIONAL CANDIDATE for the Presidency. As such, he will be supported by the democracy of the North, and I will add, no where more cordially, more efficiently, than by the glorious and united democracy of Maine; and as such, he is entitled to the support of the democracy of the South. Let him receive, as I doubt not, he will, the united support of South and North, on national considerations, and as the exponent of the principles of the democracy of the Union, and the sectional organizations, so dangerous, so much to be deprecated, and portentous of evil, to which the Senator refers, will be dissolved.

Were it possible, for our Southern friends to falter or desert him, because of his residence in a Northern State, (a contingency not to be apprehended, or named except by way of hypothesis) to give their support to an opponent whose principles are unknown, and qualifications distrusted, and who can be recommended to them only by his locality, it would shake, to its centre, confidence in their fidelity, and aid disaffection, to fan into a flame the fires that it is attempting to kindle in a portion of the Union.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved that the Senate adjourn; and, the yeas and nays being ordered, it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bates, Brown, Bell of Mass., Dayton, Dix, Greene, Johnson of Maryland, Metcalfe, Miller, New, Pearce, Spruance, and Underwood—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Butler, Cameron, Clarke, Bell of Tenn., Davis, Dickinson, Dodge, Douglas, Downs, Fitch, Fitzgerald, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, Johnson of Georgia, Jones, Mason, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Sturgeon, Turney, Walker, Westcott, and Yulee—32.

Mr. BORLAND addressed the Senate in favor of the bill. His speech will appear in the Appendix.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President: I regret the necessity which compels me at this unseasonable hour to enter upon the discussion of the bill before the Senate. But I cannot consent that a measure of such vital interest, and fraught with consequences so deeply affecting the honor and future destiny of this nation shall be adopted without at least an effort on my part to arrest its progress. Hopeless, though that effort may be, a sense of duty impels me to make it.

I have already taken occasion to express to the Senate my views of the injustice done to the people of Oregon by uniting in the bill for their territorial organization the entirely dissimilar provisions proposed for the government of New Mexico and California. If our title to Oregon was derived, as asserted by Mr. Clay in his report on the land bill in 1832, and as the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] has maintained, from the Louisiana cession, then its territory is free by the very terms of the Missouri compromise act of 1820. Pursuant to that compromise which extended only to the territories then belonging to the United States Missouri and Arkansas, have come into the Union as slaveholding States. Florida has since been added, at an expense, including the Indian war for its protection, of more than forty millions of dollars; and Texas at a cost of more than one hundred millions; while not a single free State has yet been represented in the Senate from any territory acquired since the adoption of the constitution. Though their population exceeds by more than four millions the population of the slave States, the territory comprised within their limits is less, by nearly one-half, in extent. Is it not, then, manifestly unjust to the free laborers of the country, who may desire to emigrate, as well as to the people of Oregon themselves, to deprive them of the benefit of a territorial organization, with the prohibition of slavery, unless on condition that, in the same bill, a form of government shall be imposed on New Mexico and California, which may fasten upon a reluctant people, and upon the free territory they occupy, the curse of slavery for all future time?

But the Senate have refused to separate them, and I will therefore proceed, as briefly as may be, to examine the principles of the bill as applicable to each of these territories.

1. As to Oregon. The bill provides for the establishment of a territorial legislature, consisting of two branches, to be elected by the people; and gives validity to the existing laws of the provisional government, for a period of three months after the organization of the legislature, when they will expire unless re enacted. The fundamental law which now prohibits slavery in the territory, will then cease to have force, unless both branches of the legislature shall concur in its renewal. If seven out of the thirteen individuals who will constitute one branch of the legislature, should be opposed to the prohibition, the law expires, and the door is open for the entrance of slavery throughout the whole extent of the territory. Slave-labor under the high latitude of Oregon, or higher latitude, correspond very nearly with those of Kentucky and Missouri. The principle assumed by the committee in regard to the exclusion or admission of slavery in Oregon, appears to be the same that was suggested by General Cass in his Nicholson letter, which has been so extensively repudiated both at the North and at the South.

It substitutes the will of the territorial legislature for that of Congress. But, surely, if Congress has power in the organization of a territory to confer authority on the territorial legislature to prohibit slavery, it has the power to do so directly by its own legislation. The argument which would deprive Congress of the power to prohibit slavery, because the public domain is a trust for the common benefit, would equally prevent legislation by a territorial government, or the organization of a State with the power of prohibition. It would require of every new State a provision that no law should be passed to prevent purchasers of the public domain within its limits, from settling on it with their slaves, and holding them there in servitude.

The bill reported by the committee concedes the power to be in Congress, but transfers it, after three months, to the territorial legislature. This is unwise. If the power exists, it can be exercised much more efficiently by Congress. And we ought to be governed in this matter by great public considerations, and not suffer the national policy we approve to be exposed to the hazard of defeat by capricious local legislation. A large portion of the inhabitants of Oregon are emigrants from Kentucky and Missouri, who, however desirous they may be of preventing the introduction of slavery into the territory, may find it difficult to resist the pressure from their friends and relatives in those States. It ought, therefore, in my opinion, to be prohibited by Congress, in accordance with the wise policy of our fathers, in the ordinance of 1787, as well as with the letter and spirit of the 8th section of the act for the admission of Missouri.

There is another feature of the bill in regard to Oregon, which strikes me as extraordinary and objectionable in this connexion. I allude to the clause which prescribes a qualification of color for the electors at the first election, thereby excluding from the right of suffrage, or of holding seats in the legislature, a large portion of the population of the territory, who, by their own organic laws, are entitled to that privilege. Why are they thus excluded from their unquestioned privilege? Why are the free colored citizens of the New England States prevented from going into the territory on an equal footing with the other inhabitants? Is the principle of equality of rights only in force between the white inhabitants of the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States, or does it apply equally to all citizens, between whom the constitution of the United States makes no invidious distinction? A colored citizen of Massachusetts enjoys in that State a perfect equality of political rights, and is eligible, equally with every other citizen, to the highest positions in the State and national government. On what principle, then, can Congress undertake to exclude him from voting in Oregon? He would probably be less likely than a white man from a slave State to concur in a repeal of the law prohibiting slavery in the territory. But that surely can furnish no just ground of exclusion.

2. In regard to New Mexico and California, the bill is still more objectionable. The people of those territories have passed unwillingly under our dominion. As departments of the Mexican republic, they had a legislature of their own, and enjoyed the privilege of self government—a privilege, of which it would be manifestly unjust, and in violation of every principle of republicanism to deprive them. While the treaty with Mexico was under consideration, a large minority of the Senate expressed by their votes the opinion that we could not rightfully acquire dominion over these territories, without the free assent of the people to the transfer. They are to a great extent a colored population, all of whom by the terms of the treaty are entitled to be become citizens of the United States, with the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens. Slavery could not be introduced among such a people, without being accompanied by those police regulations everywhere attendant on the system, which must necessarily degrade them from their present position. They ought, therefore, to be secured against its introduction, so far as Congress has the power to effect it.

When General Kearney was sent out on his expedition of conquest to New Mexico and California, he was authorized by the Executive to assure the inhabitants "that it was the wish and the design of the United States to provide for them a free government, with the least possible delay similar to that which exists in our territories;" "and that they would then be called to exercise the rights of freemen in electing their own representatives to the territorial legislature." [Secretary Marcy to General Kearney, June 3, 1846.] In precise conformity to these instructions from the Executive, on the 22d of August, 1846, he issued at Santa Fe his proclamation, announcing it to be the intention of the United States to provide for New Mexico a free government, with the least possible delay similar to those in the United States; and that the people of New Mexico would then be called on to exercise the rights of freemen in electing their own representatives to the territorial legislature; and that until that could be done, the laws hitherto in existence would be continued until changed or modified by competent authority. House doc. 19, 2d sess., 29 Cong., p. 21.

On the same day General Kearney wrote from Santa Fe to General Wool, that without spilling a drop of blood, he had taken possession of that city. "The people now understand", he added, "that by conquest they are to derive from a change of government and are much gratified with it."

Did they understand that slavery was to be established in their territory? No, sir. The Mexican commissioners in their negotiations with Mr. Trist, informed him—

[illegible]

Similar instructions to those given to General Kearney were sent by Mr. Bancroft, the Secretary of the Navy, to Commodore Sloat, then in command of the naval forces of the United States on the coast of California.

Why, then, are these people to be deprived, in violation of these solemn pledges, of the right of self-government, which they have exercised for a quarter of a century, and to be subjected to the despotic government of men in whose election they have no voice? Is it republican? Is it just? Will it tend to promote the cause of freedom? or will it not rather inevitably result in establishing slavery there? I firmly believe it, and am therefore opposed to the bill.

Theoretically, sir, I concur with my honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. PHELPS] in the views he has so ably presented of the legal principles which have been brought into discussion. And I fully appreciate the motives that have influenced him in withholding his assent and support to the provisions of this bill. It is the existing law, slavery is prohibited in New Mexico and California, and if that law will remain in force after the passage of this bill, unaffected by its provisions, I have no doubt of the correctness of the legal inference that no person who may be voluntarily carried there can be lawfully held as a slave. In the language of Judge Bronson, of the Supreme Court of New York, > master and slave does not exist by the law of nature, nor has the claim of the master, like the right to property in general, been recognized by all civilized communities. Slavery cannot exist when there is no positive law to uphold it. It is not necessary that it should be forbidden. It is enough that it is not specially authorized. If the owner of slaves removes with, or sends them into any country, State, or territory where slavery does not exist by law, they will from that moment become freemen." In the celebrated case of Forbes vs. Cochrane, reported in 2 Barn and Cress's, 463, the court of King's bench say:

> "The right to [illegible] has been founded not on the [illegible] but on the law of nations and the comity [illegible] gets out of the power of the master, or comes within the power of another, without any demand or claim by the master, who has ceased from any act of ownership or exercise of authority, or any intention to continue. The moment a foreign slave puts his foot upon our territory or breathes our air, he becomes entitled to all the rights and liberties of a free subject, and to the protection of the local law which held him in slavery against the law of nature has lost its force."

The decision of Chief Justice Shaw, liberating on habeas corpus, Lucas, a slave who had been put by his master on board of a government ship in Virginia, which touched at Boston in the course of her voyage, was founded on similar principles. 7 Law Reporter.

But, sir, while I assent fully to these principles, the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. BERRIEN], and other eminent and great legal acumen, have maintained with a zeal that leaves no doubt of their sincerity, that the Mexican laws, so far as they prohibit slavery, will not continue in force, but that the constitution of the United States, will accompany the slaveholder, as a panoply for his protection, and override and destroy them.

I confess, sir, I should be much better satisfied with the bill if it contained, as in the case of Louisiana, and Florida, and the District of Columbia, and in every other cession ever made to the government, an express provision that the existing laws shall remain in force until they are repealed; and better still, if the judges, by whom the government is to be administered, were prohibited in direct terms from repealing the law forbidding slavery in those territories. I do not like the guarded phraseology by which their power of legislation is restricted. "They shall have no power to pass any laws respecting an establishment of religion, or respecting slavery" as it now stands, but as it is proposed by the friends of the bill to be amended, "respecting the admission or prohibition of slavery."

Now, as Congress have no power by the constitution of the United States to pass any law "respecting an establishment of religion," is there not reason to apprehend, from the similarity of the expression used in regard to the inhibition of legislation "respecting slavery," that it will be urged hereafter as a recognition of the claim that the same want of power in Congress exists in the one case as in the other?

As the bill contains no express provision for the continuance in force of the existing laws, if they do in fact so continue it will be, not by their own inherent force, but by the implied assent of the government which has succeeded to the dominion. "Qui non prohibet, cum prohibere possit, jubet." But if that government has in any manner indicated its will, that particular laws shall not continue, the implication ceases; and they will no longer have force. The Mexican government had a religious establishment. The constitution declares that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion. Congress, in communicating legislative powers to the territorial judges, imposes the same restraint on them. They would consequently have no power to assent to the continuance of the Mexican law on that subject, since that would be equivalent to its re-enactment. The Mexican religious establishment must therefore cease. Now, when, in the same connexion, the power of legislating "respecting slavery" is also withheld, may it not be plausibly, if not strongly argued, that the Mexican laws on that subject, also, will cease, because no assent to their continuance can any longer be implied?

I should be glad to hear such a construction disclaimed by all the members of the committee; the more so, as the argument is certainly somewhat countenanced by the case of Permoli vs. The First municipality of New Orleans, in the 3d of Howard's Rep. 610. The same reason exists for the implied continuance of the fundamental and other territorial laws, after the formation of a State government to which the jurisdiction is transferred, as in the case of a cession from one sovereignty to another. Yet, in the case referred to, it was decided by the Supreme Court, that the provision of the ordinance of 1787, "that no person demeaning himself in a peaceable manner shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments in the said territory," which was operative in Louisiana during the territorial government, "had no further force after the adoption of the State constitution, than other acts organizing in part the territorial government of Orleans, and standing in connexion with the ordinance of 1787." "So far," says Judge Catron in delivering the opinion of the court, "as they conferred political rights and secured civil and religious liberties, (which are political rights,) the laws of Congress were abrogated by the State constitution as to those and personal freedom secured, while all not provided for by the constitution remained in force and preserved their original validity. Such was the principle which is universal, and governed in the case of Louisiana as to the other restriction to give to the other restriction the construction which will be claimed. It was regretted that the convention [illegible] able to [illegible] to the existing laws in New Mexico and California on the subject of slavery; and whether or not any changes have been made or attempted in those laws, under the governments organized by the direction of the President since the conquest and military occupation of the territories by the United States.

But whatever may be said of the Mexican laws in relation to slavery, and however true in theory it may be, that slavery cannot exist where there is no positive law to establish and protect it, should this bill be adopted, there would be no practical mode of preventing its introduction. The result would, in my opinion, inevitably be, what indeed the chairman of the committee of compromise, [Mr. CLAYTON,] frankly stated in respect to accepting the bill to the Senate:

For my part, sir, I know of no territory, and should be unwilling to acquire that any exists or can exist in the power, as now inhabited by man, where he must be reduced to the condition of a slave to enable his lord to retain him. I do not, however, say that there are regions of large extent in New Mexico and California, if not in Oregon also, where slavery will certainly be introduced, unless directly prohibited by law.

A king [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] king could appoint his bishops and judges, he could have what religion and law he liked. By the bill reported by the committee, Mr. Polk, a slaveholding President, is to appoint the law-makers and judges for these territories; and, with the known sympathies of the President, can any one doubt from what class of our citizens the appointments will be made? And what security, I ask, would there be for a slave who should seek his freedom by an appeal to territorial judges, holding their own slaves by the very same tenure that his master holds him in servitude? Does any man, who has made human nature his study, believe that there would be any very great solicitude to put this poor slave in the way of settling this great constitutional question, as it is called, which the American Congress are afraid to touch, and therefore commit to his charge? He would, as my friend from New Jersey has already suggested, get his case into the Supreme Court about as soon as the free colored citizens of Massachusetts, imprisoned in the goals of South Carolina for coming there to enjoy "the rights, privileges, and immunities" secured to the citizens of every State by the constitution, have been able to get their cases before that high tribunal.

Sir, if Massachusetts, and her distinguished commissioner whom she sent to provide for the protection of her own citizens, were foiled in the attempt, does any Senator seriously believe that a poor friendless slave, three thousand miles from this capitol, in the in the interior of New Mexico or California, would be able to present his case to the Supreme Court for decision?

But even if your laws had made adequate provision—which they have not—to secure to him the benefit of such a resort, would it be a proper or a dignified course for the American Congress to pursue, to leave this great question of national policy to be settled in this way, through the instrumentality of a slave? Is it expedient for us to throw off the responsibility of legislative action, and impose on the judicial tribunals the decision of an exciting political question of a sectional character, deeply affecting the prosperity of the extensive regions of which we have acquired the dominion?

Sir, I entertain feelings of the highest respect for the Supreme Court of the United States. The people have long been accustomed to regard it with feelings of profound veneration and confidence. I trust the time will never arrive when that confidence will be impaired or shaken. But does not every Senator perceive that the inevitable consequence of the passage of this bill will be to cause the appointments of the judges hereafter to be made with reference to the opinions of the candidates on this question? And thus, by making the court sectional in its very organization, to impair the confidence of the people in its impartiality? Nay, is it not apparent that the power of appointing the judges will enter as an element of discord into every Presidential election?

Again: Suppose the question fairly presented to that august tribunal for its decision, and that the court, in accordance with the recorded opinions of Mr. Monroe and his Cabinet, and with the action of Congress on the Missouri compromise, should decide—as I doubt not they would—that Congress have the same power to prohibit slavery in the territories as to pass any other law which the policy of the nation may require for their government. When the poor slave, who has come up to the Capitol to test this great constitutional question, which it is proposed by this bill to send in advance to the Supreme Court for its decision, in the moment of his triumph is beginning to exult in the anticipated realization of his dreams of liberty, what will he be told? True, Congress have a right, it will then be said, to prohibit slavery in the territories, but leave they done so? So far from it, they have not only abstained, themselves, from the exercise of the power, but have positively forbidden the territorial government they have established to legislate at all on the subject. If Congress, being in the full possession of the power, had desired to exercise it, they would surely have done so, and the Supreme Court would then be called on to decide, not whether a law prohibiting slavery would be effectual to exclude it from the territory, but whether the absence of any law on the subject, and an absolute prohibition to pass any, would have that effect. This is a question on which the views of northern and southern lawyers, as expressed on the floor of the Senate, have, toto cœlo, differed. It is a question which, believing as I do, that we have the power of exclusion, I am unwilling to leave in doubt, as to the intentions of Congress. The question, whether slavery shall exist or not in these territories, is one which eminently belongs to the legislative department of the government in the first instance to decide.

On that question, as a question of national policy and justice, I have already had the honor to address the Senate. What I then said it is not my intention now to repeat.

Sir, I do not believe it to be the interest or the desire of the mass of the population of the southern States to have slavery extended to New Mexico and California. The free laborers of the South as well as of the North have need of a territory to which they may emigrate, with the assurance that they and their families will forever be exempt from the evils of slavery. These opinions, I am well assured, are prevalent among the people of Western Virginia, North Carolina, and Kentucky. They prevail, if I mistake not, to a considerable extent also in Missouri and Tennessee. If slavery is extended to these territories, the free laborers of the South as well as of the North are entirely excluded. To those who desire to emigrate with their slaves, immense and fertile regions where slavery now exists are already open, to an extent sufficient for their wants for a century to come.

Under these circumstances, then, sir, while the territories are yet free, it is, in my opinion, the imperative duty of Congress to settle the question now and forever in regard to their future destiny. The responsibility rests on us. We cannot avoid it if we would. Justice to our constituents and to all who may be affected by our action, requires that we should meet it promptly. And I have that confidence in the patriotism of the people of the southern States, to whom so much has already been conceded, that I entertain no fears of disunion as the result of any legislation we may adopt for the exclusion of slavery from these territories. Politicians, representing the capitalists of the South, may continue to cry "give, give!" but I am mistaken if the people of the southern States, as they calmly survey the costly acquisitions of slave territory already made, and contemplate the future results of this policy, will not be ready to exclaim, "It is enough!"

Mr. NILES took the floor, and after a few remarks, moved that the Senate adjourn; and, the yeas and nays being ordered, it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayly, Baldwin, Dix, Dodge, Johnson of Maryland, Mallory, Niles, Pratt, Sprague, Underwood, and Yulee—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Barrow, Berrien, Borland, Butler, Clarke, Cooper, Davis of Massachusetts, Dickinson, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hale, Hamlin, Hunegan, Houston, King, Lewis, Mason, Miller, Phelps, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Thomas, Upham, Walker, Westcott, and Wales—29.

Mr. NILES then proceeded with his remarks, and after speaking for about an hour moved that the Senate adjourn; and, the yeas and nays being ordered, it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Dix, Niles, and Upham—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Badger, Barrow, Borland, Berrien, Bright, Butler, Clarke, Cooper, Dayton, Davis of Massachusetts, Dickinson, Dodge, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Hunegan, Houston, King, Lewis, Mason, Miller, Phelps, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Thomas, Underwood, Walker, Westcott, and Wales—29.

Mr. NILES then resumed and concluded his remarks in about one hour and a half.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments at this late, or rather early hour, for we are informed by the Senator from Mississippi in his classical language, that "Aurora has made her appearance in the Heavens." I have more respect for myself, and for the Senate, than to detain them under existing circumstances, for one moment longer than is absolutely necessary, in order to explain my position in reference to this question; a question that has been thoroughly debated in all its phases for the last four years. This committee, it is known to all, was raised for a special purpose, to wit, to take into consideration, and report, if possible, a bill to organize territorial governments for Oregon, California, and New Mexico. This duty has been discharged. The committee has reported a bill, and I will venture to say, that there would have been no exception taken to the bill, but for the incidental question of slavery. The first subject which occupied the attention of the committee was, in what manner this question should be settled. The Missouri compromise was proposed, or rather it was proposed that the spirit of the Missouri compromise should be a rule of action, governing the committee in its report. If I mistake not, upon this proposition the vote was five to three. The question then arose, in what manner the Missouri compromise should be applied to this question. The Senator from Indiana suggested that it should be enforced according to its strict terms, that is to exclude slavery from all the territory north of 36° 30′; and it was considered to be nothing more than just and right, and in strict accordance with the Missouri compromise, that there should be some guarantee that the institution of slavery should exist south of that line, and this guarantee we considered was secured by the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. I myself was willing to accept the proposition of the Senator from Indiana, that the people inhabiting the territories south of that parallel of latitude, when they applied for admission as States into the Union, should decide the question for themselves. I was willing to accept the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, and I believe it was regarded as proper by all the members of the committee from the slave States. The Missouri compromise, however, was not conceded to us in the committee, and I venture to say, that the spirit of that compromise will not be conceded to us in the Senate. Then, sir, what could we do, when every proposition that was presented had been rejected, it being considered necessary that we should report some bill, which would be entitled to receive some consideration at the hands of the Senate? There were but two courses for us to pursue. One was to report to the Senate that we could not agree upon any proposition, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the matter that had been referred to us. The other was to leave the question where we found it, and to submit to the Senate simply a measure regarding the territorial governments of Oregon, California, and New Mexico, in order that this government might, at all events, discharge the high and holy duty which it owes to its citizens in those territories. Is there a gentleman who will have the hardihood to deny, that it is the first and highest duty of the government to her citizens, wherever they may be, to give them a government and laws. Whatever difference of opinion there may be between northern and southern men upon this question of slavery, such a measure could not affect their rights nor their interests. Sir, I hold that where a government refuses protection to its citizens, it releases those citizens from their allegiance. Under this view of the case, if this government refuse to establish a territorial government for the territory of Oregon, I hold, that if the citizens of that territory should declare their independence, they would be perfectly justified in doing so. For six long years have our citizens in that territory been without law, and here let me remark, that whatever difference of opinion there may be between southern gentlemen and myself on this subject, I have ever been willing from the hour that two hundred citizens planted their feet on the soil of Oregon, to give them a government and laws, either with or without slavery. I believe I was the first to introduce a bill into this body for establishing a territorial government in Oregon, and in that bill I incorporated the ordinance of 1787; and for years I heard no objection to it on that score. There were other objections to the bill, but none on account of its containing the ordinance. This bill permits the people of Oregon to decide for themselves, whether they will or will not have the institution of slavery.

As to California and New Mexico, it presents another question. I was willing originally to abide by the principles of the Missouri compromise, and to extend the line of that compromise to the Pacific ocean; and that from territory thereafter to be acquired, slavery should be excluded. I was unwilling, for one, that the joint property of all the States should be devoted to the use and benefit of the citizens of one-half the States. I was then, and am now, unwilling that territory acquired by the joint treasure and blood of the citizens of this Union should be devoted exclusively to the benefit of one portion of the Union. If I, in concert with other individuals, make a purchase of a tract of land, taking the title jointly, what is the ordinary course to be pursued in case we can not agree upon the terms of settlement and management of the property? It is to appeal to a competent tribunal to determine how it shall be managed, or else to make partition of the property. If it is not a proper subject for division, the property is sold and the proceeds divided. I had this case constantly in view that way. There is a partnership of some thirty States, by whom this territory has been jointly acquired, and there is a dispute in regard to the property, one portion of the proprietors declaring that the other shall not occupy it, if they carry with them a certain species of property. How are we to decide this matter? We cannot settle the dispute by making a fair partition of the territory; we must resort to some other means.

But, as I promised to be brief, I will now proceed to answer the objections urged by the Senator from Kentucky, and the Senator from Rhode Island. Neither of those Senators coincided with the rest of the committee in regard to the bill, but they expressed their willingness to receive all the light that could be thrown upon the subject, being anxious to settle the question upon terms that would be satisfactory to all. But if I understand the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, it is infinitely worse for his constituents and for all the South, than the provisions of the bill as it stands. What does the Senator propose? He proposes that the governor and judges in California and New Mexico shall constitute one branch of the legislative department of the government; and that another branch shall be elected by the people; and that the legislative department shall be subject to certain restrictions—that they shall not grant charters of incorporation, nor legislate in relation to the public lands. In the first place let me state, that there was no shadow of probability that any such proposition would be satisfactory to the Senate, for it would have been argued by northern men that the governor and judges who were to legislate for these territories would be appointed by a slaveholding President. And another objection that was urged against the proposition was that the people of Mexico were incapable of self-government, and therefore unfit to be entrusted with a participancy in the legislation for the territory. There seemed to be a perfect horror entertained by some gentlemen at the idea of admitting a man with Mexican blood in his veins to a seat upon the floor of this chamber. All these things were canvassed and discussed in the committee, and I am of opinion that no gentleman of the committee was in favor of the proposition save the mover. And suppose we had introduced such a bill, would it have met with favor from any quarter? I apprehend not. And suppose that we do nothing in relation to the question? Suppose this bill should be rejected, is not the question still open to agitation? I do not mean to say that you cannot settle it; but suppose slaves are taken to California, and the case is brought before the Supreme Court and decided against the South, it places in the hands of the North a great political weapon; and if decided the other way, it places the same weapon in the hands of the South. If this bill should pass, then, I cannot see that the agitation would cease; it would still be an open question. And to leave the people of the territories without law and without government, would be to prevent the settlement and growth of the territories. I hold, therefore, that it would be a wise policy, in case we cannot harmoniously unite upon some proposition for imposing of the slave question definitively, to pass a bill for the establishment of governments in the territories without reference to that question at all. Would it not be regarded by mankind as the highest degree of injustice, after having carried on a war for three years against a neighboring country, and acquired a territory from her containing a population of a hundred and fifty thousand souls, that we should leave them unprovided with laws for their government? I have listened diligently to all that has been said upon the subject, and so far as relates to the provisions of this bill, apart from the subject of slavery, I believe there is nothing contained in it that is antagonistical to the opinions of either party. We may as well, then, I think, pass the bill, and leave the question of slavery to be settled hereafter, for in doing so we shall only be performing an act of sheer justice to the people of these territories.

The debate was continued by Messrs. DICKINSON and BRIGHT, whose speeches will be given in the Appendix.

The question being taken upon the motion by Mr. HALE to amend the bill by striking out of section 5, lines one and two, the words "free white," and inserting after the words "act" in the 4th line—"and qualified to vote by the existing laws now in force in the territory of Oregon, under the protection of the provisional government established by the people thereof," it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Benton, Clarke, Dix, of Massachusetts, Greene, Hale, Upham, ——.

NAYS—Messrs. So the amendment was not agreed to.

After further debate—

The question being taken upon the motion by Mr. CLARKE to amend the bill by inserting at the end of the 6th section, "provided however, that no law repealing the act of the provisional government of said territory, prohibiting slavery or involuntary servitude therein, shall be valid therein until the same shall be approved by Congress," it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Baldwin, Benton, Bradbury, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dix, Dodge, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Miller, Niles, Upham, and Walker.—17.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to amend the bill in the twenty-sixth section, by inserting after the word "slavery," in line 10, the following:

Or to repeal the laws which were in force in said territory when ceded to the republic of Mexico, prohibiting slavery or involuntary servitude, or any law securing the personal liberty of all the inhabitants thereof, but such laws, so far as they may not be incompatible with the constitution of the United States, shall remain in force until repealed by Congress."

The question being taken, the amendment was disagreed to.

After further debate—

The question being taken upon a motion by Mr. CLARKE to amend the bill in the 26th section, after the word "slavery," by inserting: "It being understood and declared that, at the time of the cession of the territories of New Mexico and California by Mexico to the United States, slavery and involuntary servitude had been abolished by the laws of Mexico, and did not exist therein; and that the laws now in said territory shall be and remain in full force until territorial legislatures shall be formed by Congress, with a charter to change or repeal the same," it was determined in the negative.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

After further debate—

The question being taken on the motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, to amend the bill by inserting in section 24, at the end of line 38, the following:

it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Downs, Foote, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Phelps, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Walker, Westcott, and Yulee—41.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken upon the motion by Mr. WALKER, to amend the bill in the sixth section by striking out the words "nor shall the lands or other property of non-residents be taxed higher than the lands or other property of residents;" it was determined in the negative.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

After further debate—

The question being taken on the motion by Mr. BALDWIN, to amend the bill by inserting the following additional section:

ground that he is a slave held in servitude in said territory, said attorney shall cause the [illegible] give notice thereof to the Attorney General of the United States, who shall prosecute the [illegible] first term thereof."

it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Baldwin, Benton, Corwin, Dayton, Dix, Dodge, Felch, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Miller, Niles, Upham, and Walker.—15.

NAYS.—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Clayton, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Phelps, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, and Underwood.—31.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the motion by Mr. HALE, to amend the bill by striking out section 12, line 6, after the word "act," the words "for three months after the first meeting of the legislature of the said territory," it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Baldwin, Benton, Bradbury, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Mass., Dayton, Dix, Dodge, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Miller, Niles, Spruance, Upham, Walker, and Yulee.—21.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mass., moved to amend the bill by striking out the 12th section, and in lieu thereof inserting:

Sec. 12. And be it enacted, That all the provisions of the [illegible] ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, in relation to the [illegible] slavery, except [illegible] "There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory otherwise than in punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, and the [illegible]

Upon the question of agreeing to this amendment, the yeas and nays were ordered, and it was determined in the negative as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendments being proposed the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

After further debate—

The question being taken on a motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, further to amend the bill, by inserting, next on 28, line 3, after the word "Mexico," "excluding said territory except Upper California," it was determined in the negative, as follows:

The said resolution was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

EXTRADITION TREATIES.

The bill giving effect to certain treaty stipulations between this and foreign governments, for apprehension and delivery up of certain offenders, was read the second and third time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAYTON referred to the existing treaties on the subject with Great Britain and France. A case had occurred under the former in which the fugitive was surrendered. A case had also occurred under the French treaty, in which Judge Betts, of New York, held a fugitive charged with forgery. By writ of habeas corpus, this case was brought to the United States Supreme Court, where it was refused to be considered, because Judge Betts heard the case in chambers, and the Supreme Court held it had no jurisdiction in the case. He stated that, under all the circumstances, this bill was reported, and he hoped it would be promptly passed.

Mr. HALE suggested that there was a defect in the bill, inasmuch as it brought citizens of the United States within the operation of the bill, and subjected them to be delivered up without form of trial. He had prepared an amendment, which he would move to introduce at the end of the bill.

Mr. DAYTON objected to the amendment as subjecting every criminal to a trial by jury before he shall be delivered up. If anything of this kind is desired, the treaty ought to be amended. We are bound to carry out treaties as they stand.

Mr. HALE said he looked on these extraditional treaties with jealousy, and he thought the Senate ought to do so, especially in such times as these, when we may expect enough business of this kind on our hands. Suppose an individual denies that he is the person designated, and that most difficult question—the question of identity—should arise, it ought to be settled before the person is delivered up. The object of his amendment was to give the person an opportunity to prove his innocence. He called on the Senate to be careful not to lessen the securities for personal freedom.

Mr. KING said that the Senator from New Hampshire had taken a wrong view of the matter. This bill did not touch political offences. As to American citizens being taken in foreign countries for crimes, there was no danger that any would be wrongfully claimed by our government. He stated the difficulties he had to encounter while in France in endeavoring to discover and arrest a fugitive from justice who had escaped into Switzerland. He was foiled in his efforts, and he then made a treaty with the Swiss government which will render such arrests easy hereafter. But we ought not to expect foreign governments to lend us facilities, if we do not show a disposition to reciprocate.

Mr. BUTLER suggested the propriety of showing a becoming comity towards other nations; all being alike interested in the arrest of criminals who are seeking to escape from justice. He objected to the amendment moved by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE made some remarks in defence of his proposition. Those around him seemed to think that he desired to make this country a rogue's harbor. Quite the reverse. It was only by a trial by jury that rogues were brought to punishment. He referred again to the difficulties which perplexed questions of identity, and to the ruinous consequences to an individual from a false imputation of crime.

Mr. BADGER thought that there was not only no good ground, but no reasonable apology for the indignant eloquence of the Senator from New Hampshire. His anger should have been directed against the treaty, not against the law which was necessary to carry it into operation. He stated that the treaties are especially guarded against including political offences. They had relation only to men who prey on society. He thought it might be well to amend the bill, by inserting after the words "according to the terms," the words, "and true intent," of the treaty. We do not undertake to try foreign criminals, but merely, on such evidence as would justify his committal here for trial, to deliver up the individual.

Mr. DAYTON defended the bill, and assured the Senator from New Hampshire that no act we could pass would take away from American citizens the constitutional right of a trial by jury.

The amendment was then negatived.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to amend the bill, by striking out the words "justice of peace," and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "Justice of the Supreme Court, and judge of a district court."

Mr. BUTLER said, he thought it unnecessary, but he had no particular objection to the amendment.

Mr. DAYTON said, that the language was in conformity with the treaty; but if his friend from Connecticut was tenacious about it, he had no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAYTON modified the bill, by inserting the words "true intent and meaning," as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER.]

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

On the question "Shall this bill pass?" the yeas and nays were ordered, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Bernard, Berrien, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickerson, Dix, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hamlin, Houston, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Metcalfe, Miller, Phelps, Sebastian, Seymour, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham and Walker—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Breese, Bright, Dodge, Hale, Jenness, and Rusk—7.

So it was

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

CHEROKEE CLAIMS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution authorizing the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to make a just and fair settlement of the claims of the Cherokee nation of Indians, according to the principles established by the treaty of August, 1846.

Mr. BELL suggested to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. SEBASTIAN] to withdraw the amendment he had submitted on a former day, as it involved a large amount of appropriation, and would, at this late period of the session, seriously embarrass the passage of the resolution. The joint resolution might be passed, with a provision referring it to the Secretary of War to examine and report to the next session of Congress.

Mr. SEBASTIAN consented to withdraw the amendment, and to renew it hereafter.

The CHAIR stated that the amendment had been agreed to by the Senate, but the Senate could refuse to concur in it.

Mr. BRADBURY made some remarks on the importance of the resolution as involving a large amount of money. He had objections to the reference of the settlement to one of the departments, and thought it would be better to keep the control of the subject in the hands of the Senate. The report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, it appears, had not been satisfactory; yet he [Mr. B.] had had no opportunity to examine that report.

Mr. BELL said he had proposed the change in the resolution for the purpose of obviating these objections. As to the examining all the accounts, that was the province of an executive officer rather than of the Senate. After the adjudication by the Commissioner, the amendment he now sent to the chair provided that he should report the same to the next session of Congress.

Mr. ALLEN made some observations against the course indicated in this resolution. He pronunced a high eulogy on the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, pronouncing him a moral man, whose connection with the government conferred greater honor on that government than on himself. He moved to lay the bill on the table, but withdrew it at the request of—

Mr. BELL, who denied having attacked Mr. Medill, and thought the eulogy of the Senator from Ohio entirely gratuitous. That gentleman was certainly no more than a subordinate officer of the government; and this was a case not only important on account of the amount of expenditure, but on account of the labor resulting from it. He had not charged that the report of the Commissioner was incorrect, but there had been opposition to it, and it was desirable that it should be properly investigated.

The amendment of Mr. BELL was then agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN moved to lay the resolution on the table · Ayes 9, Nays 15.

There being no quorum, the motion was withdrawn.

The resolution was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

On the question "Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a time?"—the yeas and nays were ordered, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Benton, Bingham, Berrien, Butler, Clarke, Dayton, Downs, Felch, Harrington, Jameson, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Morehead, Niles, Phelps, Rusk, Sebastian, Seymour, Underwood, Upham and Yulee—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Davis of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dodge, Foote, Fitzgerald, Hamlin, Simpson, Turney, and Walker—14.

So it was Ordered, That this resolution be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time.

Resolved, That this resolution pass, and that the title thereof be aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

JUDICIAL POWERS TO MINISTERS AND CONSULS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to carry into effect certain provisions in the treaties between the United States and China, and the Ottoman Porte, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls of the United States in those countries; and, having been amended by the adoption of a substitute heretofore proposed by Mr. DANIS, of Massachusetts, it was reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

REVOLUTIONARY WIDOWS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of certain surviving widows of the revolutionary war; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That it pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill for the relief of Peter Sheller, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

They insist on their amendments disagreed to by the Senate to the bill renewing certain naval pensions for the term of five years, and extending the benefit of existing laws respecting naval pensions to engineers, firemen, coal heavers, in the navy, and to their widows; ask a conference on their disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and have appointed a committee of conference on their part.

ADJOURNMENT RESOLUTION.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution from the House of Representatives fixing the 7th day of August for the adjournment.

Mr. BREESE moved to strike out the 7th and insert the 14th.

Mr. HANNEGAN and Mr. CALHOUN thought the business could all be done by the 7th. There was now nothing to be gained by sitting longer.

Mr. FOOTE said he was not willing to go away and leave the country in danger, as he thought it was.

Mr. DOWNS thought that another week would be required to get through the necessary business. He would therefore prefer the 14th. He would not consent to take another step on the subject of a compromise.

Mr. DOUGLAS would not be willing to adjourn and to leave the territories without law. The general appropriation bill, and other important bills have to be acted on. A bill for a territorial government in Minesota had been reported early in the session, and this ought to be acted on. The government has ordered troops there to prevent collision with Indians. He did not see why we should adjourn because the Senate has been thwarted in one of its measures. If we adjourn without establishing the territorial governments, we shall be responsible for the blood of men, women, and children, which will be shed.

Mr. BENTON regretted that this resolution had been called up. He was opposed to fixing any day for adjournment, until the great measures are all disposed of. The world would be led to the impression that the Senate is acting from a feeling of resentment. It would be much wiser that we should let the world see that we refuse to adjourn until the territorial bills shall be passed. The judgment of the world would be against us, when it is known that, immediately after the House had rejected the territorial bill, a Senator jumped up in the middle of an afternoon session, and called up the resolution of adjournment. He had only spoken once on the territorial bill. He had voted for it, because it was necessary to provide some government for the territories. But could not the House send a bill to the Senate for this purpose? If we go and leave anything unfinished, in the present agitation of public opinion, Senators must expect to meet, at every turn, the question—whose fault is it that nothing is done? He was willing to take any bill which might come from the House rather than leave the territories without a government. Having labored hard to get Oregon, how inconsistent to let her remain without a government! Then came California and New Mexico. Are they to be left without law? He then went into a view of the present condition of those territories, in order to show the necessity for prompt legislation on the subject. A continuance of the present unsettled state of things can have no effect but to make our relations more perplexed and difficult of arrangement.

Mr. DAYTON advocated the resolution as it came from the House. To talk of the movement of the Senate being construed into an act of resentment, was absurd, when it was remembered that twenty-two of the Senators voted against the territorial bill, and that a majority of them would vote for this resolution.

Mr. HANNEGAN replied to the objections to the resolution, and urged that to remain here beyond the 7th would be useless. To adopt the amendment, would be to add only another week of talk. He hoped Monday week would be agreed on.

Mr. BREESE withdrew his amendment, and moved to lay the resolution on the table, and asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. KING suggested that the motion be varied, so as to make it a postponement until Monday.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay on the table, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Benton, Breese, Bright, Clayton, Dodge, Douglas, Downs, Foote, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mason, Phelps, Sturgeon, and Westcott.—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Borland, Bradbury, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Walker, and Yulee—32

Mr. BREESE moved to strike out 7th and insert 14th.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the motion.

Mr. KING thought we should not be able to get through all the needful business for the carrying on of the government by the 7th. He understood from some gentlemen at the head of influential committees of the House, that they would not be ready to adjourn before a week after that time. He desired to satisfy himself on these points, and would therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until Monday next.

Mr. DAYTON was willing to do any thing which personal courtesy dictated for the accommodation of the Senator from Alabama, but he thought we had the whole subject before us, and he hoped the subject would be taken up and acted on.

Mr. ALLEN would vote to postpone till Monday, and would then vote to take it up, and to fix on the 14th as the day of adjournment.

Mr. DIX said he would vote against postponement, and in favor of the 7th.

Mr. FOOTE believed that the House would do its duty, and that a little postponement would be best. He would not vote for adjournment at present.

Mr. HALE moved that the Senate now adjourn; which was negatived,

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Benton, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Dodge, Douglas, Downs, Foote, Hannegan, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mason, Phelps, Sturgeon, and Westcott.—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Borland, Bradbury, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Dayton, Dix, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Hannegan, Hunter, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Sebastian, Spruance, Sturgeon, Sydmore, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Walker, and Yulee.—28.

The question being on the motion to strike out 7th and insert 14th—

Mr. NILES said, that instead of an adjournment being regarded as an unpatriotic act, our constituents would probably regard it as the most patriotic, the only patriotic act of the session. If we stay any longer, it may be that our constituents will have forgetten us altogether.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, said he should be compelled to adhere to a pledge he had once given not to vote for fixing a day of adjournment, as he did not feel disposed to leave the territories without a government.

Mr. METCALFE thought we could not get through by the 7th. If we make it the 14th, the House will then have it in its power to take it, or to amend it by fixing a longer period, should it be deemed necessary for the completion of the business. He rebuked the frequency with which the separation of the Union was alluded to.

Mr. DOUGLAS asked the chairman of the Committee on Finance if he thought the appropriation bills could be got through with by the 7th?

Mr. ATHERTON replied, that he thought that the civil and diplomatic and the army appropriation bills would occupy until the 7th without other business. He thought we might get through by the 14th.

Mr. DIX hoped that the appropriation bills would be acted on by the 7th.

Mr. ATCHISON said, with all the facts before him, he did not think he would be doing his duty if he voted for the 7th. He did not entertain the slightest hope that there would be any territorial bill from the House. But if the chairman of the Finance Committee thought he could get through the appropriation bills by the 7th, he was willing to vote for the 14th.

Mr. TURNEY opposed the amendment in a few remarks, in which he evinced much warmth, in relation to the summary disposal of the compromise bill by the House of Representatives, and declared that as he had now abandoned any hope of settling that question, he was ready to adjourn at the earliest hour, and he thought all the business which was necessary to be done might be completed in two days.

Mr. BUTLER expressed regret at the warmth of the Senator from Tennessee, and concluded with saying he would vote for the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BREESE, substituting Monday, the 14th of August, for Monday, the 7th, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Bell, Benton, Borland, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Butler, Dickinson, Dodge, Douglas, Downs, Foote, Hamlin, Houston, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mason, Metcalfe, Niles, Sebastian, Spruance, Sturgeon, Underwood, and Westcott.—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Baldwin, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dix, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hannegan, Hunter, Miller, Upham, Walker, and Yulee.—18.

Resolved, That this resolution pass with an amendment.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendment.

On motion of Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and ten minutes past five the door were reopened, and

On motion,

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. HANNEGAN gave notice that on Monday next he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to establish a territorial government in the territories of Oregon, New Mexico, and California.

UNITED STATES COURT IN LOUISIANA.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, the prior orders were postponed, and the bill for the better organization of the district court of the United States within the State of Louisiana was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOWNS explained, that since this bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, he had prepared an amendment for the appointment of an additional judge, and he suggested the propriety of the adoption of this amendment in consequence of the great accumulation of business connected with land claims. He could anticipate no opposition except on the ground of the increased expense. This he showed to be untenable ground, because the appointment of another judge would save more than his salary in the reduction of mileage now paid to sheriff and witnesses in consequence of the distances they have to travel. He accordingly submitted his amendment, which divides the State into two districts, and provides for the appointment of a separate judge, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. TURNEY admitted that the increased business of the land claims created a pressure on the court for the present. But it could not be sufficient to warrant the appointment of an additional judge. Appoint a new judge, and he will be fastened on the country. There would be no getting rid of him; and although his salary was now fixed at $2,000, reasons would be found, before the end of another session of Congress, for increasing this salary, and putting him on the same footing as other judges. He could not vote for it.

Mr. BUTLER explained that the committee could not see the propriety of appointing an additional judge.

Mr. WESTCOTT stated that the business of the Louisiana courts was increasing with a rapidity which must soon place it above New York in point of importance. New York has two judges, and he thought it necessary to give two to Louisiana.

Mr. BADGER thought the amendment was a proper one. Without looking to the future, it was sufficient to say that New Orleans is now a great city, and he thought it unreasonable to assign to the judge acting there all the duties of the State. The business at New Orleans is sufficient to occupy all his time. He hoped the amendment would be agreed to.

Mr. DAYTON said that the committee had not information before it to show that the business was so great as to require a new judge, and the multiplication of judges he regarded as impolitic. Should this application be granted, other applications will follow. The appointment of a new judges involves the appointment of other new officers, and he hoped the amendment would be negatived.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave a few reasons which would induce him to vote for the additional judge. The great business of the whole of the western States required this appointment. He read a list of pending suits in the Louisiana court, to show the impossibility of one judge performing all the duties.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, said it was perfectly impracticable for the present judge to leave New Orleans for the purpose of taking charge of the suits in the remote portions of the State. He could not vote for the bill without the amendment. Persons interested in the business of the court in the interior, have, in some instances, to travel five hundred miles, and at some seasons the journey is impracticable. Instead of a cost to the United States, this appointment would be an actual saving to the country.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. Downs, it was, upon a division, determined in the affirmative. Ayes 22, Noes 13.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

WHITNEY'S RAILROAD.

Mr. NILES moved that the prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill granting a tract of land for the purpose of making a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific, on the plan of Asa Whitney, which had been reported by the select committee to which the subject was referred. It was thought important, by the gentlemen connected with Mr. Whitney, to have a decision concerning this measure at the present session, because the public lands would probably be so disposed of before another session, as to render the present plan impracticable. He therefore desired a vote on his motion to take up the bill, and he would then name a day for its consideration.

Mr. HALE hoped it would not be taken up, as it was a most alarming measure. It gave away one hundred millions of acres of the public lands at one swoop. He was sorry to differ from the Senator from Connecticut, but he was opposed to throwing such an immense mass of land into the hands of speculators. The taking up of this bill would alarm the public mind.

Mr. NILES said the company could not hold the lands. It was only intended to make a public road through them; and as they are not now worth a cent, and no one could tell when they would be worth any thing, and as the making of this road would give them value, and the route itself, if it could ever be completed so as to make a common highway, it would bind the Union together.

Mr. BENTON expressed his astonishment that the Senator from Connecticut, after what had passed, should make such a motion at this period of the session. At the very moment that he was looking into the records of the past to endeavor to find out some mode of settling the difficulty of governing the territories of California and New Mexico, his ear was struck by this motion. He had studied the history of California long before Mr. Whitney thought of it. He would never vote for giving a hundred millions of acres to any man. We must have surveys, examination, and exploration made, and not go blindfold, haphazard, into such a scheme. It distressed him that the business of the session was to be broken up by this motion to take up a bill out of its turn. He hoped the calendar would be regularly taken up. He would not be astonished if Mr. Whitney should come here with a large bill for damages against Congress—damages for going to all the States of the Union for recommendations.

Mr. BELL regretted that Senators should be so ready to act on preconceived prejudices, before they had even read the bill. As to Mr. Whitney, he had conversed with him, and had found him modest and intelligent. He referred to the care which had been taken in the preparation of the bill; and he hoped the Senate would at least take up the bill and examine it. Unless the bill passed this session, the opportunity will have passed away forever.

Mr. BENTON said, that if this bill was taken up, the fortnight to come would not be sufficient. If gentlemen expected to pass this bill without debate, so long as he could stand up, they would be disappointed. He objected to this taking up a bill out of its order, which would consume the rest of the session. He would trust no man in existence with such a power as was proposed to be given by this bill. He moved to lay the motion on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Benton, Borland, Breese, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Douglas, Downs, Hale, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Georgia, Kerr, Mason, Metcalfe, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Spruance, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, Westcott, and Yulee—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Bradbury, Bright, Clarke, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hamlin, Hannegan, Johnson, of Louisiana, Lewis, Miller, Niles, Upham, and Walker—21.

So the motion was laid on the table.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the committee of conference, on the part of the Senate, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1849, reported that they have met the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives, and after a full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and recommend, to the respective Houses as follows:

1st. That the Senate do recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the Senate's fifth amendment, and agree to the same.

2d. That the House do recede from their disagreement to the Senate's sixth amendment, striking out the fifth section of the bill; and that in lieu thereof the following shall be inserted as a fifth section of the bill;

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That hereafter the amount of money commutation allowed by law in lieu of the spirit ration shall be increased to four cents."

3d. That the House do recede from its disagreement to the Senate's tenth amendment, and agree to said amendment with the following words, which, it is agreed, shall be added to the end thereof.

"And in appointing from each State hereafter, its proportion of officers to whom the appointments shall be apportioned as nearly as practicable equally among the several Congressional districts therein."

4th. That the House recede from its disagreement to the 12th amendment of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider said report; and

Mr. BUTLER took exception to one of the items in which the report adopts the amendments of the House, in the clause relating to the steamers touching at the port of Charleston, by the insertion of the words "if practicable," which he contended was tantamount to an exclusion of these steamers from that port, as they would never enter the harbor of Charleston, so long as it was left to the discretion of the owners to decide whether they should do so or not.

Mr. CALHOUN took the same view, and stated that a sort of understanding had been entered into by him with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] that if he (Mr. C.) would support the clause requiring the steamers to touch at the Savannah, and would not oppose the advance of money to the contractors, the same provision which relates to Savannah should be introduced with reference to Charleston. The contractors had called on him, and informed him that they had constructed the vessels expressly with a view to enter the harbor of Charleston, drawing not more than fifteen feet water, which is the depth on the bar at low water.

Mr. ATHERTON stated that the objectionable words were in the contract itself, and that the obvious meaning was, that if not prevented by stress of weather or accident, the steamers were to touch at the port of Charleston.

After a few words from Mr. DICKINSON, Mr. YULEE, Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, Mr. BORLAND, Mr. BRIGHT, and Mr. MILLER, the question was taken on concurring in the report of the committee of conference, the yeas and nays being ordered, it was determined in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Badger, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hamlin, Houston, Miller, Niles, Phelps, Sebastian, Sprance, Sturgeon, Upham, and Walker.—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Baldwin, Bell, Borland, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Dix, Rusk, Hunter, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mason, Metcalfe, Turney, and Yulee.—18.

So it was

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference, and that the bill be amended accordingly.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

JAMES K. POLK.

Washington, July 31, 1848.

The message was read, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1849, and for other purposes, together with the amendments reported thereto.

The question was upon agreeing to the first amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, in section 1, line 12, to strike out the following: "Provided, That no member of either House of Congress, after the present session, shall be allowed a larger sum for milage than one thousand dollars for each session, any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. MASON asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. ATHERTON explained that the committee had no intention, in reporting this amendment, to give any opinion on the principle it involved. But they thought a provision of this character would be more in place in a separate bill, and one which related to the compensation of members generally.

Mr. BADGER said he should vote for the amendment. Reductions in the compensation of members had been frequently proposed; but they never had been, and he hoped never would be adopted. He regarded it as objectionable on the score of justice, generosity, and policy. Many members coming from a great distance were completely excluded from the privilege enjoyed by those nearer home of sometimes visiting their families and attending to their business; and although the additional mileage was but a poor compensation for such privations, it was all that could be given. It always had been allowed, and why was it to be stopped now? Why should he who comes just such a distance as to entitle him to that amount receive $999, while he who comes a thousand miles further should receive only one dollar more? Another reason was, that this mileage operates in favor of keeping the seat of government where it is. He no objection to any gentleman trying to make a little popularity out of a motion to reduce the compensation, but he trusted it would never would be agreed to.

Mr. DAYTON followed on the same side.

Mr. MASON briefly stated his reasons for opposing the amendment. He thought the amount of mileage was, in some cases, an abuse which required to be regulated by law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD also sustained the limitation, stating that he had been applied to by the Secretary of the Senate for his construction of the act in relation to the nearest mail route, and that he had given such a construction to it, in his own case, as gave him only about half the mileage given to others who were at no greater distance from the seat of government. The mileage and pay had not been sufficient to cover his expenditures; and he had now been compelled to write for money to carry him home.

Mr. NILES adverted to the great inequality which, unless some provision of this kind should be made, would exist between the compensation of a member from California, whose pay and mileage would amount on an average to some $2,500 the session, while those nearer the seat of government would not receive above $800. He thought it right that something should be done to make it more equal.

Mr. CALHOUN contended that members of Congress were worse paid than any other portion of the government. It would have been wiser if, in the first instance, a specified allowance had been made for them. He knew of no better mode of making the compensation just than this system of mileage, which he did not regard as fixed too high. He concurred in the views of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] that a difference ought to made between the member who is two thousand miles from his family and his business, and him who is within two hundred miles of both. He also regarded it as a point worthy of consideration, that this mileage had its effect in discouraging any attempt to remove the seat of government to a more central position, and referred to the situation of the principal capitals of the European nations, which were always located near the most assailable points, and not in the centre of the kingdoms to which they belonged.

The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Benton, Bu[illegible], Bradbury, Breese, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Cr[illegible], Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Dodge, [illegible], Dix, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnston, of Louisiana, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, Woodbridge, Yulee—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Berrien, Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Mangum, Metcalfe, Upham, Webster—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

[illegible]

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, [illegible] the motion made the 29th instant, that after Monday the Senate will meet at 10 o'clock in the morning, was reconsidered; and,

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the said motion lie on the table.

[illegible] POWERS IN [illegible]

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was recommitted the bill to carry into effect certain provisions in the treaties between the United States and China, and the Ottoman Porte, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls of the United States in those countries, reported it with amendments.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said bill as in Committee of the Whole, and, having been amended, it was reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

[illegible]

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

TERRITORIAL [illegible]

Mr. BENTON submitted a bill providing a government for the territories of Oregon, New Mexico, and California, which, he was instructed to say, was adopted [illegible] Louisiana, in effect that the people should be governed according to the existing law, until others were made. He desired that it might be printed, and laid on the table; and, if nothing better be offered in the meantime by anybody else, he should call it up for consideration.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—On Saturday last, Mr. President, I gave notice to the Senate that I would to-day introduce a bill providing for the organization of territorial governments in Oregon, California, and New Mexico. In connexion with some of my friends, I have given to this subject all the attention in my power, under a feeling of the deepest anxiety, and I have become satisfied, that after the ordeal through which the question has already passed—after the searching investigation to which it was subjected by the select committee appointed by the Senate—a committee so remarkable, so pre-eminent, I might well say, for intellect, for wisdom, and for patriotism—it is in vain for any individual to attempt its adjustment. I believe that when the proposition which emanated from that committee, representing every section of the Union, and representing the two great parties of the country, has failed, there is no hope left to us of a final adjustment of the question at this time. I regret it deeply. From various quarters of the country, appeals to me have been made, with various motives; and it has been urged upon me that it is most expedient to leave this question open, because that course would promote the prospects of the election of a favorite candidate for the Presidency—my favorite, sir. But I am incapable of regarding this subject in that aspect. Perish the prospects of any living man, be he whom he may, and mine own first, sooner than leave open, from such considerations as those, a question so momentous, so agitating and exciting! No, sir; I cannot look at the subject in that light. I can look at it only with a view to the best interests of my country. I believe the question should be settled, and settled promptly too.

I think, sir, that the events of the present day are full of admonition to us, and I fear that the admonition is not sufficiently heeded. When Christendom looks at the debates which have taken place here, and at the other end of the capitol, they will believe us to be on the verge of disunion and civil war. At the very same moment that we are standing out before Europe as the bright exemplar, illuminating and arousing mankind to a consciousness of the value of rational and regulated liberty, we present this humiliating spectacle of internal dissension! Why, sir, it was but the other day, as I have been informed through the correspondence of one of our diplomatic agents, that in the great German Parliament, assembled for the purpose of uniting in one great confederacy the Germanic States, on an allusion being made to the United States of America, that august assemblage, composed of men cold and phlegmatic as you have been ever taught to regard them, rose simultaneously in token of respect, and burst forth into loud and long protracted shouts, at the bare mention of our name! Yet, here we are, in relation to a question which should excite no feeling, which involves no interest upon one side, and only serves to assail an interest upon the other, sending forth to the world a picture that borders upon the horrors of that which has recently startled men in France. Gentlemen talk of disunion as coolly as we talk about our ordinary appropriation bills! Disunion! It is moral treason to breathe the word! Disunion! As was well said the other day by the venerable Senator from Kentucky, whose whole life has been one continued career of patriotism, how can you dismember us, when Kentucky stretches her arms across the Ohio, to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois? You can never dismember us! We will hold the Union together with hooks of steel. We cannot separate! Yet, we may go on and familiarize the public mind with the thought of disunion and civil war, until you do indeed light up the torch of the incendiary. It has become already "familiar as a household word." All this may go on, till at last we behold the gleaming sword of brother arrayed against brother, and our streams and rivers running red with blood; but you can never, on this or any other question, dismember the Union!

I have said, sir, that I hold it moral treason to talk of disunion or civil war here! What! talk of disunion at this hour, when, from the central heaven, beams all over Christendom the star of our republic—not the less brilliant, because, like the fire-fly, its light is mellow and mild—when our principles are scattered broadcast throughout the European world—when the German Parliament offers its enthusiastic homage at the mere mention of our country's name! Is it at such a period that we send words of excitement and discord abroad, to make those who are struggling to imitate our example, doubt the capacity of man for self-government!

The Senate proceeded to consider the following bill and joint resolution, as in Committee of the Whole.

A joint resolution of thanks to the officers, sailors, and Marines of the United States Navy, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government, for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1849, and for other purposes, with the amendments reported thereto.

The second amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, giving four watchmen to the northeast Executive building instead of three, and adding $365 to the appropriation, was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following items:

For the collection of agricultural statistics, and other purposes, $3,500, which several sums, amounting in the whole to $8,000, shall be paid out of the Patent fund.

For defraying the expenses of chemical analyses of vegetable substances, produced and used for the food of man and animals in the United States, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Patents, $1,000, the said sum to be paid out of the Patent fund.

Mr. BADGER wished to know why it was proposed to strike out these items?

Mr. ATHERTON said he thought these things would be better done by individuals and scientific societies than by the government.

Mr. CALHOUN was in favor of the amendment, as he thought the mania for purchasing books and book-making required to be checked. He thought, too, that the Commissioner had enough to do without meddling with these matters, and with which the government ought not to connect itself.

Mr. BADGER could not agree as to the propriety of this amendment. He thought it quite as important to expend a little on agricultural objects as on geographical explorations.

Mr. KING was against these expenditures, and would vote for the amendment. He said the cost of publishing the history of the exploring expedition was $140,000. Where were we to stop? He was not aware of any information of value being derived from these agricultural works.

Mr. HALE said he should move to strike out the items for the exploring expedition, when we reached them.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, said we expended a great deal of money in making discoveries; and those works which we are publishing are unprofitable speculations for the government. He did not see, however, that this objection which had been raised to expensive publications ought to apply to the [illegible] statistics. He referred to the report from the Patent Office, made at this session, as more valuable, and less burdened with trash, than the reports which had preceded it.

Mr. DICKINSON referred to the exploration of the Dead Sea which was in progress, stating that it was undertaken by the officers of a provision ship which our government had found it necessary to station in, the Mediterranean, who had obtained leave of absence for the purpose of visiting that interesting part of the country.

Mr. BUTLER said he [illegible]

Mr. WESTCOTT said he should vote against the first amendment, by which it is proposed to strike $3,500 for the collection of agricultural "statistics," and he should vote to strike out the $1,000 for "a chemical analysis of vegetable substances produced and used for the food of man and animals." As to "statistics," they are useful in legislation here, and they can be best collected and will be more authentic, and the information obtained can also be best disseminated by the federal government, and through the Patent Office and Congress, than by the States, or by private associations. As to the philosophical and scientific operations, the expenses of which it is proposed to pay, or "chemical analysis," &c., as called in the bill, he did not regard it as a legitimate expenditure by the federal government, to make such payment. We do not need such experiments for our legislation here. Mr. W. said he freely admitted that the book-making as to farming matters by the Patent Office had not been as practical, and therefore not as useful, as it might have been. A great deal was printed annually that was of little service. An old planter in his State had said to him, and he had noticed the remark was correct, that generally book farmers and planters, those fond of experimenting and taking up with scientific schemes and projects, which were sometimes mere quack contrivances, and also those who painted their fences and laid out their fields in exact squares or parellograms, and exercised fancy in their farming, were generally much less successful than the plain old fashioned practical men, who considered keeping down the weeds and grass in their crops as the most important matter. Fancy farmers made out best in rearing flowers. He hoped hereafter the Patent Office report would be more useful and practical, and, if so, it would be the most valuable public document we printed. It is a relief to the people to hear from members of Congress something else than dry speeches and dull reports on claims, and uninteresting political abstractions. Mr. W. said he believed if an annual specific appropriation of $10,000 was made wherewith to procure foreign seeds, roots, plants, &c., they should be got from foreign countries and distributed while fresh in the United States, in the sections to which they are adapted. Southern products, if so procured, would be of great service. It is the section where the more new and unknown products can be introduced. The present arrangements are not the best that could be adopted with respect to the collection and distribution of seeds. The seeds are often old and worthless. In 1829, the House of Representatives made an appropriation by resolution for procuring seeds; and there was, he believed, a law making it the duty of our ministers and consuls abroad, and naval officers in foreign countries, to collect seeds and plants, and he believed they were all formally instructed so to do, but the service was rarely fulfilled properly.—Mr. W. said he found a few days since a statement in an English publication that the Island of Great Britain had got from America alone upwards of 3,500 different varieties of trees, herbs, plants, vegetables, &c., since the discovery of America. There are thousands of valuable plants, and particularly vegetables, for human subsistence, in foreign countries that are not known in the United States. One hundred years ago our great staples of rice and cot-tion were of little moment. Mr. W. said he had solicited the Commissioner of Patents to write circulars to officers of the army to collect seeds, &c., in Mexico, but he learned very few had complied with the request. He hoped some measures would be adopted to obtain seeds, &c., as he suggested. They would be more beneficial than all the books, and while such measure would cost only $10,000, books cost annually upwards of $50,000.

Mr. DOWNS thought this effort at retrenchment was beginning at the wrong end; it was commencing with stopping the only book in which the people took any interest. We take a different view of this subject from that taken by the people, who complain more loudly of our long speeches, which keep us in session eight months out of twelve, than of the appropriation of a little money for the publication of useful works. Our system is founded on the principle that the people must have light.

Mr. NILES regarded this business of protecting agriculture as not belonging to the legitimate duties of government, in its legislative action; it belongs to the people and the States. If it does belong to government, we are too inoperative; we ought to have a proper bureau and competent professors. He remarked on the imperfection of everything done by Congress in the way of collecting statistics, and thought we had better stop short. But if we were to go on with the system of enlightening the country, it would be as well to publish those valuable primary books which are useful for education, and are eagerly sought after throughout the whole country, by parents and teachers.

The question was divided; and the question was first taken on the part relating to the agricultural statistics, by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Bagby, Baldwin, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Calhoun, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Jarnagin, Johnson of Georgia, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson of Maryland, Lewis, Mangum, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Spruance, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Webster, Westcott—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashley, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Borland, Chalmers, Clarke, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Fitzgerald, Greene, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalf, Miller, Niles, Rusk, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Webster, Westcott, Woodbridge—37.

NAY—Mr. Hale—1.

So it was

Resolved, That the resolution pass.

The question was then taken on the second branch of the amendment, which was agreed to.

An amendment making the appropriations of fifteen hundred dollars for the purchase of scientific works for the Patent Office, and of three hundred dollars for the librarian, payable out of the Patent Office fund, was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the reduction of five hundred dollars in the salary of the First Comptroller.

Mr. ATHERTON briefly defended the amendment, on the ground that the present moment, when the duties were more arduous than usual, was most inappropriate for a reduction of salaries.

Mr. BADGER also defended the amendment.

The amendment was then agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the reduction of five hundred dollars from the salary of the Second Comptroller; which was agreed to.

The next amendment, inserting six instead of three additional clerks in the office of the Second Comptroller, was agreed to.

All the other amendments, striking out the reductions of salaries introduced by the House of Representatives, were agreed to.

The remaining amendments, of the committee were agreed to, with the exception of the following items, which were passed by as likely to cause discussion:

That to strike out the proviso relating to a captain of the navy being appointed to the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing.

[Mr. ATHERTON explained that this was not an amendment of the committee, and had been inserted by mistake. It was proper, however, and, if no other Senator did, he should move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. BADGER thought the proviso ought not to be stricken out. He would move to amend it by substituting "purser" for "captain."]

That relating to the appropriation of $50,000 for the payment of claims of the Spanish government against the United States.

That relating to the improvement of the Savannah river.

That relating to the item of $30,000 for the purchase of one or more bridges over the Eastern Branch, to be made free of toll; and that relating to the extension of the appropriation from $65,000 to $115,000 relating to surveys in Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa, and private claims in Florida.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, the bill was further amended, by inserting a proviso, that from and after the 1st July, 1848, the Assistant Postmasters General shall receive the same compensation as Auditors.

After the adoption of several unimportant amendments, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

FLORIDA EVERGLADES.

Mr. WESTCOTT, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the draining of the Everglades in the State of Florida by that State, and to grant the same to said State for that purpose; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THANKS TO THE NAVY AND MARINES.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives of thanks to officers, sailors, and marines of the United States Navy, was read a first and second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WESTCOTT said he should vote for this resolution with great pleasure, but he did not approve of the phraseology of it. He did not approve of the singling out the naval service at Vera Cruz and omitting Alvarado. The capture of that place, and of Tlacotalpan, by the gallant Charles G. Hunter, with a little one gun steamer, was the most brilliant and meritorious exploit of the navy in this war; and that brave officer, in his opinion, and he believed in the opinion of the country, generally, deserved more credit than any other naval officer in the war.

No amendment being made the resolution was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said resolution was read a third time by unanimous consent.

On the question, "Shall this resolution pass?" Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays, and it was determined in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Borland, Bradbury, Breese, Clarke, Corwin, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Fitzgerald, Greene, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalf, Miller, Niles, Rusk, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Webster, Westcott, Woodbridge—37.

NAY—Mr. Hale—1.

So it was

Resolved, That the resolution pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

REPORTS OF DEBATES.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution proposed by the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee on the subject of reporting the debates of the two Houses; and it was

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government, for the year ending 30th June, 1849, and for other purposes.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to amend the bill in line 421, on the 18th page, by striking out "eight" and inserting "ten," thus increasing the appropriation for the rent of offices for the War Department from $8,500 to $10,500.

Mr. HALE inquired whether these rooms had been prepared at the suggestion of the Department?

Mr. ATHERTON replied that he had heard so, but not directly from the Department.

Mr. HALE would rather strike out the $8,500 than give any more.

Mr. YULEE thought the rent proposed to be given was entirely too much.

Mr. ATHERTON explained that it was proposed to occupy sixty rooms at $175 each, which would amount to $10,500.

After some remarks from Messrs. DAYTON, HALE, PHELPS, KING, and ATHERTON, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON moved further to amend the bill after line 688, by inserting an appropriation of $2.000 for paying the Washington Gas Light Company for gas, &c.; which was agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON moved further to amend the bill, in line 792, by striking out "ten" and inserting "twenty-four," which was agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON moved further to amend the bill, in page 37, by inserting an appropriation to refund to the State of Virginia the amount paid by the State for revolutionary services, under judgments obtained against the States, in her courts; which was agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON moved further to amend the bill by inserting, after line 1044, "for compensation and expenses of a commercial agent, to be selected and sent abroad by the President, to collect information respecting the commerce. productions, and statistics of Asia and Eastern Africa, ten thousand dollars."

After debate—

The question was taken upon agreeing to the amendment, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Calhoun, Davis, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dix, Dodge, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Hayne, Jackson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Niles, Phelps, Sebastian, and Simmons—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Benton, Bodard, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Davis, Felch, Hale, Hunter, King, Mason, Metcalfe, Miller, Pennybacker, Rusk, Sevier, Sturgeon, Walker, Westcott, and Yulee—24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ATHERTON moved further to amend the bill, at page 19, line 450, by striking out the proviso that the duties of Chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing shall be performed by a captain in the navy, who shall receive for his services no compensation except his pay as a captain.

Mr. BADGER moved to amend the proviso, so that it shall read as follows:

"Provided, That while a commodore shall be employed in the duties of the United States of navies, he shall be entitled, and be assigned to, the duties of said bureau, receiving for his services no compensation, except his highest service pay as a commodore."

After debate—

The amendment of Mr. BADGER was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion by Mr. ATHERTON, to strike out the proviso, and it was determined in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Baldwin, Benton, Bradbury, Bright, Butler, Dix, Dodge, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hamlin, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, Niles, Sebastian, Walker, and Westcott—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Borland, Breese, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Davis, of Mississippi, Greene, Hale, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Miller, Phelps, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Yulee—21.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland stated that he had voted in the affirmative, under a misapprehension of the question, and on his motion the vote just taken was reconsidered.

The question being again put on agreeing to the motion by Mr. ATHERTON, to strike out the proviso, it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Baldwin, Benton, Bradbury, Bright, Dix, Dodge, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Hamlin, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, of Ga., Niles, Walker, and Westcott—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Borland, Breese, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Davis of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Foote, Greene, Hale, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Miller, Phelps, Rusk, Sebastian, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Yulee—30.

The question was then stated upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance, to insert at the end of line 525, 'for a clerk to said Commissioner [of Public Buildings] six hundred dollars; and, after debate, it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Baldwin, Benton, Butler, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Downs, Fitzgerald, Foote, Houston, Hunter, Lewis, Niles, Phelps, and Underwood—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Borland, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Calhoun, Clayton, Davis, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Felch, Hale, Hamlin, Hannegan, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Miller, Rusk, Spruance, Turney, Walker, Westcott, and Yulee—27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question was then stated upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance, to insert after the 620th line:

"For the purchase of one or both of the bridges over the Eastern branch, near the city of Washington, at a valuation to be made in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, a sum not exceeding thirty thousand dollars, which bridge or bridges, when purchased, shall be free of toll to all persons whomsoever, under such regulations as are now in force, or as the same may be legally modified, or added to in relation to the Potomac bridge opposite said city."

and, after debate, it was determined in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then stated upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance, to strike out lines 830, 831 and 832, (being the appropriation for the removal of obstructions in the Savannah river)

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to amend the amendment, by inserting $50,000 for the improvement of the dam at Cumberland Island, in the Ohio river.

Mr. DIX gave notice of his desire, if that was sustained, to offer a similar amendment for the Hudson river, below Albany.

After debate —

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

Mr. LEWIS hoped the usual reference would be dispensed with in this case, and that the bill would be put upon its passage.

Mr. KING trusted that the proposition of his colleague would be acceded to.

Mr. BUTLER remarked that a similar bill had already been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and therefore there could be no necessity for referring the subject again to them.

Mr. YULEE, from the Select Committee, to whom were referred, on the 13th June, Senate bills 98 and 190, reported a bill to promote the efficiency of the military and naval establishments; which was read and passed to the second reading.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed the bill entitled "An act to establish the territorial government of Oregon," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

THE OREGON BILL.

The bill from the House of Representatives to establish the territorial government of Oregon was read the first and second times by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Mr. President: A week has now elapsed since the Senate passed and sent to the House of Representatives a bill to organize territorial governments in Oregon, California, and New Mexico. That bill, after receiving the support of three-fifths of the members of this body, was laid upon the table by the other House without reading or printing it, and of course, I fear, without understanding it. A rule exists in that House, in consequence of which a bill, so laid on the table, cannot be reached again during the session but by the consent of two-thirds of the members. The vote to lay on the table was therefore a decisive rejection of it; and that rejection was not only without discussion, but without consideration. Castigat auditque. The result has been, that some of those who condemned without hearing, have since found it necessary to allay the murmurs of the public by debating the bill after they had destroyed it—with what effect we shall hereafter learn.

The House has now sent a territorial bill to the Senate. Sir, I trust we shall not imitate their example. We owe it to our own self-respect, and to the high character which this body has maintained, to take no course which shall prevent a free discussion before voting on the merits of this measure, which, in the rightful exercise of the constitutional authority, a co-ordinate branch of the legislature has presented for our concurrence. Let our action on their bill be deliberate and well considered. Retaliation would be unworthy of us. Let us hereafter resort to no wretched excuse for the vote we shall give upon it, that we have merely read something about their bill in the newspapers, or that some of us have heard some part of their debates while it was before them. To the end that it may receive that calm, dispassionate, and respectful consideration to which any measure coming from the other House is entitled. I will, before I sit down, move the reference of the bill from that House to the appropriate committee.

I have hitherto had no opportunity to express my sentiments at large on that great measure which obtained a majority so triumphant in this body, and was so summarily disposed of in the other House. I desired such an opportunity; but it was impossible for me to avail myself of any occasion to speak during the protracted debate in the Senate, lasting through several days and one whole night, and closing after one uninterrupted session of twenty-four hours, unless I had come to the conclusion that the speedy passage of the bill was less important than a speech delivered by me to explain it. Although I heard this measure traduced, and its purposes and objects shamefully misrepresented—although, indeed, I was under a pledge to submit, at the close of the session, such remarks as would, I thought, justify this bill of peace in the eyes of the world, yet when fanaticism and party spirit had exhausted their violence, such was my confidence in the intelligence of the public, that I sat in silence, under all the attacks made upon the bill, rather than delay its passage by debate. From the period of its passage to this moment, no appropriate occasion has been offered to discuss it. I would rather at any time be "schooled for silence than tasked for speech;" but I now hold it to be a duty to disabuse the public mind, and expose the calumnies of the enemies of that measure.

The misrepresentation of that bill originated with men who had party objects to accomplish. The patriotic Senator from Indiana near me [Mr. HANNEGAN,] admits, that he has been urged to vote against the bill, because the passage of it would injure the election of General Cass. Others tell me that it will endanger the success of General Taylor. If I understand the character of these distinguished citizens, both of them would reject, with scorn and contempt, any proposition to defeat a measure whose object is to restore peace to a distracted country, on the ground that such a defeat was necessary to his own elevation.—Party politics not less than sectional fanaticism, or the desire of disunion and civil strife, have given rise to the misrepresentations and calumnies against this bill. At the same time that I say this, I admit, that many honest men, through misapprehension, have opposed it. Some have said that the object of it was to introduce slavery into the Territories of the United States, south of the parallel of 12 degrees. [illegible] of Oregon, while others with equal confidence have declared that object to be, to prevent the citizens of the slave States from enjoying a constitutional right to carry their property into those territories.

Sir, we have seen that the most opposite doctrines and opinions have been asserted, to suit different latitudes. Wherever it was supposed the greatest injury could be inflicted upon this bill and its friends, by representing it as a southern measure, its purposes have been stated to be, to extend the area of slavery, and to convert free into slave territory. Where, on the other hand, the rights of the South were held most sacred, and the southern claim to equal participation in the territory acquired by the common blood and treasure is most popular, the bill has been represented as surrendering the rights of the South, without an adequate consideration. Letter-writers, stimulated sometimes by party feeling, and sometimes by less excusable motives, have done much to deceive the public mind, and defeat this salutary measure. By the concurrence of all these co-operating influences, geographical parties have been formed in opposite sections of the United States, whose continued existence depends on the defeat of the bill.

These parties, more dangerous to the union of the States than all other causes combined, so directly antagonize with the principles of this bill, that it must destroy them, or they must destroy it. The best possible recommendation of it, in the eye of a true patriot, may be found in their settled hatred and hostility to this measure. The war between these parties and the bill is a war of extermination; and the same geographical factions will be equally implacable against any other proposition to tranquilize the country, and restore fraternal feeling between its discordant sections. They have falsely represented the bill to be a compromise of principle, and have employed the cant that principle cannot be compromised, although the constitution itself was but a compromise of principles, and the result of mutual concessions between the different members of the confederacy. Their existence is amidst the elements of civil strife; and to reach political power, which is the real object of their ambition, they will break down any compromise or other bill of peace, if it do not break them down.—Against these factionists I now solemnly invoke the admonitions in the Farewell Address of the Father of his country:

> In contemplating the causes [says he, which may disturb our Union, it occurs, as a matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—Northern and Southern—Atlantic and Western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations. They tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection."

He afterwards adds:

> I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the State, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations.

To illustrate the influence of sectional feeling on this subject, let me advert to the language of public men on this floor. Shortly after I reported this bill, the Senator from Connecticut near me [Mr. BALDWIM] came to me and said, that by this measure the North lost every thing in controversy. The words were scarcely out of his mouth before the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] came up and observed, that by this bill the South lost every thing she claimed. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CLARKE] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. CORWIN] have made able speeches to demonstrate that the bill gave up all California and New Mexico to slavery, and the Senators from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] and Tennessee [Mr. BELL] have labored with quite equal ability for six hours, to prove that it completely excluded slavery from every inch of these territories! My honorable friend from North Carolina, after demonstrating, as he contends, that the South has no constitutional right to carry slaves into the territories, utterly condemned the bill because, as he said, it surrendered all the rights of the South. Having proved, to his own satisfaction, in a speech of great ability, that the South had no such right as she contended for during many years past, he concluded that he would not agree to submit the question to the court, lest she should be defeated. I would be gratified to learn from him how he makes it appear that his section has (as he declared) surrendered anything by this bill, if she had nothing to surrender. But, without stopping to refute their respective arguments, at this time, I will ask them in what a position have they placed me, and themselves, too, if all they say be true? If the North and South have both lost all their rights by the bill, who has got them? Where are they? It is time for the honorable gentlemen to go on a voyage of discovery for these lost rights, and if any of those who complain of their loss by the operation of the bill should come back satisfied that their recovery is hopeless, it will only be a proof that they never had any such rights as have been claimed for their respective sections.

Mr. President, these antagonizing opinions are no doubt honestly entertained by the gentlemen who advanced them, but they have furnished others—less worthy and less able men—with those opprobrious epithets which have been applied to the bill, if not to those who proposed it. The whole vocabulary of abuse has been exhausted by some who stand at the antipodes on this great question, to cry down those who occupy middle ground, and whose dearest wish is to reconcile them to each other. I stand like the man in the almanac, as a target for arrows from all the opposite points of the compass. The moment the bill was reported, and before its merits were understood, it was assailed by a storm of opposition from every quarter:

> Una Eurusque, Notusque ruunt, creberque procellis Africus.

The whole select committee and their bill were assailed for having evaded the responsibility which belonged to Congress, and delegated its power to the Supreme Court. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. CORWIN] endorsed this charge. By the Senators from Tennessee and North Carolina the bill was also denounced as evasive and delusive, and one Senator over the way [Mr. NILES] let himself down so low as to proclaim it a cowardly measure.—It is true, that the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. DAYTON] who also eloquently opposed the bill, differed with these gentlemen, and asserted that the bill had the merit of being a bold, frank, and manly measure. As for the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] who gave a casting vote in this body for the resolution annexing Texas, and by that same resolution adopted the Missouri Compromise, fastening slavery on a district of country as large as twenty of the State he represents, I commend his political consistency to the especial consideration of his own constituents. The compromise game on Texas was a losing one, but he will hardly be able to hedge enough on California to regain their favor.

The whole of these charges against the bill as being evasive, and shunning responsibility, arise out of, and are resolved into one single misrepresentation, which I will proceed to expose and put to shame. The misrepresentation consists in this single declaration—that the bill delegates and refers the power of Congress to decide the question whether slavery shall exist in the Territories to the Supreme Court of the United States. Now the bill delegates no power of Congress whatever. It simply provides, that a writ of error or appeal shall be had, at the suit of either party, in case of a claim of freedom by any negro in either California or New Mexico, to the Supreme Court. Every power which Congress ever had over the subject is reserved, because no word in the bill proposes to devolve that power on the court or any other tribunal. The power of Congress over the subject is political and legislative; that of the court is simply judicial.

The great question to settle which the select committee was raised in the Senate was, whether the citizens of the slaveholding States of this Union have a constitutional right to emigrate to the territories, which have been acquired by the common efforts of all the States, with their slaves. The South affirmed this, and the North denied it. On this question the debate in this body had raged for weeks, when I made a motion to raise a committee composed of equal numbers from both sections of the Union, and equal numbers from both political parties. The committee, after exhausting every other effort to effect a compromise between the parties, reported, by a majority of two-thirds, this bill to extend the laws over the territories, to organize a government composed of a governor, three judges, and a secretary, for California, and of a governor, and secretary, with two judges, for New Mexico. These constituted the legislative power in each, upon which the governor had no veto, and that legislature was restricted so as to be unable to pass any law introducing or prohibiting African slavery in the territories: thus leaving that question not to the appointees of the President to legislate slavery either into or out of the territories, but confining the decision of the question of slavery in the territories themselves to the judicial tribunals there, with a perfectly secured right of appeal, in all cases, from their decision to the Supreme Court of the United States. Thus, both the master and the friend of the slave were entitled to try the question at once before the common arbiter appointed by the fathers of the republic to settle all conflicting questions of constitutional law, while Congress retained all its political and legislative power over the whole subject, to be exercised or not, as to its own wisdom should seem fit. A single decision of the court, made on the very first case presented at the next term, would, it was understood, have settled the question debated in these halls for years past, and which we all know never can be settled here.

By the third article of the constitution, the judicial power of the United States is vested in the Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress shall establish, and is extended "to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution." The judicial power being thus expressly extended to this question, under the clause in the same section declares that in such cases "the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make."

At the moment, then, in which a territorial government is organized in the territories of the United States, with the necessary inferior tribunals, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is ordained by the constitution itself; and the oath of every Senator to support that constitution, binds him to make the regulations under which that appellate jurisdiction shall be exercised, unless it can be made to appear that the question forms an "exception" to the general rule.

Hence a preliminary matter to be decided is, whether this question arising under the constitution, between the North and the South, can, with any propriety, be made an exception to the general rule. If it can, then the committee which reported this bill may be charged with having attempted to devolve upon the Supreme Court a duty which does not properly belong to it. If it cannot, then the committee has only complied with the constitutional requisition, and the court derives its power to decide the question, not from the bill, but from the constitution, which is the real object of attack of all the geographical factionists who have vented their spleen against the bill.

Now, that such a constitutional question as this should form an exception to the appellate jurisdiction of the court is a position which the most hardy will not dare assume. It is a question on the one hand affecting the rights of southern men to the amount of all the slave property they could send into the territories, and on the other involving the great issue of personal liberty. Neither northern nor southern men will pretend for one moment that this great question, which threatens to shake the pillars of our whole political edifice, is not of sufficient importance to entitle it to a decision by the highest tribunal known to the constitution. No question of greater importance was ever before submitted to that court.

I say, therefore, it is palpable that the bill, so much vilified and misrepresented, is but a simple compliance with our oaths to support the constitution, which commands us to make the regulations under which the Supreme Court shall exercise its appellate jurisdiction in this very case. Had the members of the other House given themselves time to reflect, it is quite impossible they could have rejected it, because the judges were, by the regulations of the bill, to decide a judicial question which the constitution ordained them to decide, and commanded us to make provision enable them to decide.

The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN,] has, in the face of this constitutional requisition upon us all, (himself included,) objected that the court is an improper tribunal to decide the question. What right has he or any other man to make such an objection? If the constitution has not ceased to be obligatory upon him, how does he reconcile it to his duty to condemn the bill on such a pretext as that? "Oh! but," says he, "five of the judges live on the south side of Mason and Dixon's line, and therefore they will, though very honest and honorable men, decide—as honorable Senators often do who live on different sides of that line—in favor of their own section." I think I have had a little more experience in the Senate than the honorable Senator himself; and I deny that even the Senate, which is a political and legislative body, is so utterly lost to all sense of shame on a constitutional question as to justify the aspersion cast upon it. The views of constitutional law expressed on this very bill do not justify it. During all the debates and votes on the bill, the gentleman has kept company with our friends from North Carolina, Tennessee, and Kentucky, as well as with the barnburners and ultra anti-slavery men of the North. But the gentleman knows well this the last of the matters to save the benefit of an appeal.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. CORWIN] and other northern Senators, have stoutly maintained that while the master had that [illegible] was denied it. My friend from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] in his able and conclusive argument for the bill, completely refuted all these opinions. But the friends of the bill were [illegible]. They insisted that gentlemen opposed to it should permit it to pass as it came to them in this respect. Certain amendments were introduced to their objections in the progress. I resolved that not a shadow of a pretext of this kind should remain to its enemies, and therefore the bill, with my aid and the consent of its friends, has been so amended that its worst enemies now agree, [illegible] perfect, in giving the appeal and writ of error in every possible case where the question of slavery can arise without reference to the value or amount in controversy, and in every case where a local judge could decide either way, even on a habeas corpus. Throwing out of view the cavils, pleas in abatement, and specious arguments of technical lawyers, and the more transparent follies of the enthusiast and men of a single idea, whether northern or [illegible] the members of the Senate, must commend itself to every patriot, because it would have removed one of the greatest and most dangerous elements of discord between the opposite sections of our country.

I confess I have been surprised by the opposition which seem to be cherished by a few southern gentlemen in Congress for whom I have great respect, as they endeavor to prove that the southern claim, founded on the constitution, is unsound, and for that reason resolve that they will not submit to a decision at law upon it.—But abandoning that, do they not clearly perceive that they abandon [illegible]? Do they not imagine that from the time forth to the end of the republic, the North will ever again consent to extend slavery by act of Congress into any free territory, and thus increase that alleged inequality of representation in the other House arising [illegible] representation of three fifths of the slaves in the apportionment of its members, which has ever been the foundation of their most bitter complaint? Try that question when you may in that House, an overwhelming majority will ever oppose [illegible]. I have noted [illegible] such an act of Congress, because, in my deliberate judgment, it would be wrong, and never could be justified except as a measure to be resorted to in an extreme case involving the very existence of the Union. I am no advocate of slavery or of its extension. The spirit of the age in this country, as well as in Europe, is against such extension. Like my friend from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] I believe [illegible] in the opinion which he expressed a year ago, that slavery is a moral, social, and political evil, to be removed, however, only by those who are immediately interested in it. There are the deliberate opinions of thousands and tens of thousands in Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, and Kentucky—all slaveholding States—who would at the same time instantly resent any interference from other quarters with the question of slavery in the States. Opinions go far beyond ours in the non-slaveholding States. They view slavery as an ineradicable curse, and will never consent, in any event, to its extension, unless where the constitution carries it. The votes and speeches of northern gentlemen but faintly prefigure their future course on this question. When they return next session, reeking from the political controversy on this very question, does the Senator from North Carolina expect them to reverse their votes, and grant him more than they will at this time? They know their strength. With forty majority now in the other House, and, after another census, with a majority of double that number, or even more, does any rational human being expect them ever to vote themselves out of the asserted rights to equality of representation, which they have the power to enforce?

Sir, I have told the Senate on a former occasion, that no Missouri compromise, or other arrangement yielding an inch of territory to slavery, would, or could, receive the assent of the other House. With full knowledge of the subject I undertook to deal with, I said to southern gentlemen that the bill I reported, to give them a trial of their claim under the constitution, was all they ever could expect from this time forth; and I have pursued to find that any of my southern friends stood ready to defeat it. I anxiously hope that, upon further reflection, they will view this subject in a different light.

Sir, it is time the South understood her true position. She can no longer control this question. He who supposes that a threat of dismion will alarm the violent men of the North, labors under a great mistake. To them dismion has no terrors. Nay, I believe some of them desire it, and pray for it as a consummation devoutly to be wished. The political agitators, in truth, desire no settlement of the question on any terms, and if the South should push her claim beyond her constitutional rights, the dissolution of the Union will inevitably follow before the North will surrender. On the enforcement of that constitutional right, we, of the middle States, will stand by the South. Every true patriot and sincere friend of his country in the North, when he understands the true question submitted by this bill, will, as the able Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] has done, stand by the South on that issue. The course of that Senator will, before a year elapses, be approved by the whole reflecting community in the North, and it will receive the approbation of all good men in ages yet to come. The people still love the constitution and the institutions of their forefathers; and no man in the North can win laurels, that will not speedily wither, by disparaging their labors or desecrating their graves. The cry against compromise to save the Union, is destined to be short-lived. The people know that when Washington submitted the constitution to Congress, he reminded them that individuals entering into society "must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest;" that the "greatest interest of every true American was the consolidation of the Union;" and that the constitution itself was but "the result of a spirit of amity and of mutual deference and concession, rendered indispensable by our condition."

That same spirit, that mutual deference and concession, are again rendered indispensable by our condition. We are now about to apply the constitution to a region larger than the old thirteen States were when the Union was formed. Under such circumstances, when I hear a man set up for himself a higher standard of morality and virtue than that of the fathers of the republic, and say that he can agree to no compromise—or, to use the cant of the time, that principles cannot be compromised—I think of the poet's exclamation, "Oh! for a forty-person power to chaunt thy praise, Hypocrisy!" Not a man came out of the convention that framed the constitution who had not objections to some part of it. It was a compromise; and the same feeling which governed in its formation is, and ever will be, indispensable to its preservation. History has done justice to the motives and measures of those who made the Union; and will do justice to those who have sustained this attempt to transmit it unimpaired to future generations.

As to so much of the bill as organizes a territorial government in Oregon, it is in truth no matter of local controversy between the different sections of the country. All men, northern and southern, agree that Oregon—containing, by the official estimate of the Land Commissioner, 341,463 square miles, or 218,536,320 acres, equal in area to seven such States as New York—is, by her present laws, and ought to remain, free from slavery. There is no pretext set up by any man that this territory ever can, by any possibility, be slave territory. No southern man has has asked or desired it. Slave labor could not there compete with free labor. But, gentlemen who had all their lives denied the constitutional power of Congress to exclude slavery from a territory, while conceding this, respectfully asked of their friends not to put a clause in the organic law for that territory, expressly excluding slavery from it, and thereby prevent them from voting for the bill. The only compromise in the bill was on this single point. It was agreed that this territory should be organized by the appointment of a governor, three judges, a secretary, and a legislature to be elected by the free white male citizens of the territory. These people were deemed prepared for self-government, while those of California and New Mexico were to be governed, in their territorial state, by a legislature composed, as I have stated, of the governor, judges, and a secretary, or very much as the Northwestern Territory was organized by the ordinance of 1787. The compromise was simply this. The present laws prohibiting slavery were, by the 12th section of the bill, to stand till the first session of the legislature of Oregon, and three months after. That legislature was, by the 6th section of the bill, to have power to pass all laws in general which were necessary or proper for the government of the territory, not inconsistent with the constitution or the organic law itself. Of course we all knew the people of the territory, who are opposed to slavery, would, through their legislature, continue the restriction; and, to enable them fully to exercise their legislative power in this respect, the bill continued the existing restriction three months beyond their first session. Those who denied the power to legislate (either in Congress or in the territorial legislature) to prohibit slavery, could vote for this proposition, because the validity of any act of the territorial legislature depended on its constitutionality; and, upon the question, whether such an act could constitutionally abolish or restrict the institution of slavery, they did not commit themselves by voting for the bill. The southern concession, therefore, was only this: that the present laws of Oregon should remain in force till a reasonable time after the territorial legislature could act; the northern concession was, that the local legislature, instead of Congress, should make the law. The former would—the latter never could do it. This made the only compromise contained in the bill; for I do not call the compliance with the constitution, in making the regulations to enable parties in California and New Mexico to carry a case to the appellate court a compromise, as it does not include any concession by either party to the other; it merely acknowledges a constitutional duty, and enforces a constitutional right.

The Senator from New York [Mr. DIX] in the course of a long and ingenious speech against the bill, found fault with a remark made by me at the time I reported it, that by far the greatest portion of all these territories was properly adapted to free labor, and would necessarily be free for all time to come; that there was a portion of them where free labor never could be introduced. He thinks slavery can compete with free labor any where. I have not quite so high an opinion of it. The gentleman has no practical knowledge on the subject. I speak from my own observation, and say, that in the beautiful country where I reside, although slavery is legalized and protected, there are but about one hundred slaves in a population of about forty thousand souls, because free labor is more profitable. The gentleman, like most others from his own section, who know little of slavery, except from books and the speculations of persons entertaining northern opinions, thinks free labor can compete with slave labor on a rice plantation, in a sugar-mill, or in a cotton field. He sits now in the midst of men from the southern States, and if he will ask any one of them, they will tell him that his opinions are entirely erroneous and visionary. It was because I knew that portions of New Mexico and California, including the land of the "root diggers," and the parts where the rains of heaven for months together do not bless the parched soil, and where irrigation furnishes the only means of watering the productions of the earth, never would be cultivated by white labor, that I expressed the sentiment to which the gentleman took exception. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] in a late speech on the Mexican treaty, declared his opinion at great length, that the northern laborer would never settle in these portions of that country; and if the gentleman will make the inquiry, he will find that in the pastoral and grazing portions of California slave labor could not be advantageously employed, because the slaves sent to tend the herds would be less apt to return to their master than the herds themselves. Climate and production will sometimes make the laws which are to regulate the character of the labor to be employed in despite of us.—The gentleman thinks he can legislate free labor into any part of the earth. I crave to know of him, then, why it was that he did not legislate it into all that vast region of Texas lying south of 36° 30'? Did not the Senator give a vote—aye, a casting vote—in favor of the resolution which annexed Texas to the Union in 1845?

[Mr. DIX, in his seat, assented.]

Mr. CLAYTON.—The gentleman admits that he did. By his vote a territory extending, according to his construction of its boundaries, from the Sabine to the Bravo, and from 36° 30' to the Gulf, (larger than six of his own great State) was made slave territory forever. The resolution annexing Texas contained the Missouri compromise in the very form which is now most objectionable to northern men. Yet he not only voted for it, but made an able speech for it, only three years ago! If he could apply the compromise line there, why is he now so strenuous against the same or any other compromise line? Then, the gentleman, like his friend from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES] could doom a beautiful and fertile country, worth fifty of New Mexico, and large enough for five or six great States, to that very slavery which they now denounce in no measured language, and which one Senator declares to be an ineradicable curse. Why so great a change? The resolution annexing Texas by a simple majority passed the Senate by a majority of one vote. It brought with it a war with Mexico which has resulted in the acquisition of the adjoining territories of New Mexico and California. The honorable gentleman, like him from Connecticut, voted for the war, and spoke for the war; voted for the treaty of acquisition, and spoke for the acquisition. I did not. Yet now when the territories have been acquired by their efforts and design, and when the very worst evils predicted by myself and my friends are the inevitable consequences of the acquisition, are upon us; when that demon of discord rages in the midst of us, whose approach I foretold in a debate on the three million bill a year ago, as the legitimate fruit of this very accession of territory for which both these gentlemen were then so anxious—instead of devising means to allay the evils resulting from their own conduct, they throw every impediment in the way to any amicable settlement of our difficulties. And it is the manner in which these gentlemen exhibit that bold and manly spirit for the want of which the committee that reported this bill has been taunted! They offer nothing to calm the tumult they have raised; but find fault with every thing which others can propose. The very men who shun all responsibility themselves, yet venture to charge others with the want of courage to meet it.

As the support of this bill of peace, the South has rallied with extraordinary unanimity. Four members in this and eight in the other House, constitute the whole apparent southern opposition to it, and they have based that opposition upon grounds which will place every northern opponent professing hostility to the existence of slavery, whether felt or feigned, in a most unpleasant situation if he cannot refute their arguments to the satisfaction of his constituents; for if the southern opposition be right in their opinion of the ultimate decision of the court, these northern gentlemen have rejected a bill which would have made the whole territory free! And do they not perceive that by their defeat of a bill which simply makes the regulations necessary to enable the court to exercise its appellate jurisdiction, they have refused to comply with a palpable constitutional injunction upon us all; denied to themselves and their southern brethren a constitutional right; and subjected themselves to the inference—aye, the forgone conclusion—that their argument about free soil in these territories is a mockery. Are they afraid to try the question? What will—what must be the inference in the South from their conduct in defeating the bill? what will be the probable consequence of denying to the South their constitutional right to try this question?

This, sir, is a question which I put with sorrow and alarm? I am neither a northern man nor a southern man on this question. I stand on middle ground. In the spirit of a request from the legislature of Delaware, I voted at the time the Mexican treaty was before the Senate to extend the anti-slavery proviso in the ordinance of 1787 over the territories to be acquired by that treaty. The resolutions of the legislature of Delaware were not, as they have been represented to be, an instruction to vote for the proviso, but a request to vote against the acquisition of slave territory. It came from men whose opinions I respect—men who had the wisdom to foresee the discord and danger that would arise out of this acquisition of Mexican territory, and who were anxious to avert an evil which now threatens us with disunion and civil war. They are no abolitionists. Neither are they the advocates of the extension of slavery. In the spirit of their request I voted for the proviso against slavery, when no other man from a slaveholding State voted with me. Some ten or fifteen gentlemen from all the non-slaveholding States voted with me for that proviso. On the treaty my present colleague joined me in this vote, and there were but thirteen Senators from all the North (just one-half her delegation in the Senate at the time,) who gave us their concurrence in that vote. Even the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] who voted with me for the proviso on the bills granting two and three millions to secure peace with Mexico, went over to the other side on the motion to insert it in the treaty of settlement and limits made at Guadalupe Hidalgo. My votes, given in the spirit of the legislative request to me, were aimed against the acquisition of territory, which I forsaw would be the apple of strife among my countrymen. In a Senate of fifty-six members, there were with the aid of myself and my colleague, just fifteen for that proviso—less than one-third! But the moment the barnburners blew their trumpet, a dozen [illegible] doctors, who sixty days ago scoffed at this proviso and its effect, and now they might number some sixteen or twenty friends of it in the Senate, including the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] who has [illegible] of sense will ever calculate that a majority of this body will vote to prevent the extension of slavery in those territories by a direct law of Congress. There is no more prospect of that than of a majority vote in the other House to introduce slavery into the territories.

With the perfect knowledge of this fixed fact, how do northern gentlemen, who defeated this bill in the other House, where they have a large majority, expect to settle this question? Do they expect the South to give up their constitutional objections because a [illegible] they give up their own settled convictions of their constitutional rights at the bidding of a southern majority in the Senate, and rest contented after being thus kicked out of the Supreme Court? Sir, I know them too well, and respect them too much, to believe it. They now know that they are in the majority in the popular branch of Congress, and that this majority will be greatly increased with every returning census. They can, therefore, as the stronger party, at their pleasure to preserve the Union, be magnanimous. Yet, how have they met the South in their efforts to conciliate, and restore fraternal feeling? Sir, as an honest man, I am bound to state the truth, and I will now do it in presence of all the members of the committee, northern as well as southern. In that committee the South proposed the Missouri compromise, in spirit and [illegible] and all south of it open to slavery, if the people there should will it. The North voted the proposition down. The North then proposed the words of the Missouri compromise, which totally varied [illegible] territory to which it applied, was all slave territory, and that to [illegible] the South, because, while it yielded six-sevenths of the whole territories of the United States, outside of the States, to the northern claim of restriction, it was entirely silent as to the remainder, and made no concessions of an inch of territory to the South. The proposal of the South to run the line of 36° 30 to the Pacific, would have made 1 600,000 square miles of the territories lying beyond the States on both sides of the Rocky mountains, free from slavery forever, and would have left for African slavery south of 36° 30' parts of California and New Mexico, containing only about two [illegible] area, and less than one-twentieth in value of all the territory acquired by the common blood and treasure.

The gentlemen of the committee from the North having voted down this proposal made by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] a southern member, there was indeed, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has described it, a solemn pause in that committee. All hope of amicable settlement for the moment vanished, and unnatural contention seemed likely to prevail among us. It was then proposed to try the last resort—the court established by the constitution to settle all judicial questions, and to rest our present hopes of a settlement on this as the ark of our safety. Two-thirds of the committee joyously concurred in the proposition. But even in this hour of trial, when, as in our friends from Kentucky and Rhode Island, the representatives of the ultra claims of the South and the North, who differed with us about the report, and with one another about everything on this subject. The proposition to limit the appeal and the writ of error as in other cases to matters of the value of $2,000 came from the Senator from Kentucky himself. But the original jurisdiction of the court in cases of habeas corpus had been settled by the decision of that court, as has been shown by my friend from Vermont [illegible] would settle the question at the next term of the court, either on an application to the original or the appellate jurisdiction of the court at the pleasure of those interested. I repeat again, however, that the bill as it stood when it passed the Senate, gave the court, in addition to its original jurisdiction, all facilities for the exercise of its [illegible] ence to the amount in controversy, or the party who desired it.

Having thus stated the course of the North and the South, in committee, I recur to the point of inquiry how they treated this simple proposition to acknowledge a constitutional right existing in both when the bill came to be acted upon in Congress. The [illegible] is before the world. The North [illegible] other House—voted down the bill and refused to hear a proposition to satisfy the minds of their southern brethren as to their constitutional rights, by even allowing them the constitutional privilege of an appeal to the common arbiter appointed by the great charter which makes them one nation.

Sir, this decision of the North—with which I had acted on the great question of the extension of slavery, and stood ready still to act, if by any possibility legislation could have been effective to control the result without danger to the Union—has been to me the subject of grief and alarm. If any man had moved such a bill as this before the excitement on this question became intense, and called it any thing but a compromise—a bill simply giving to both parties the means of exercising a constitutional right to try the judicial question at law—not a voice would have been raised against it. The refusal to submit to the arbitrament of the very tribunal which the founders of the republic established—the scorn with which the constitution itself has been treated in the contemptuous repudiation of a sacred constitutional right to try the question made by one whole section of the Union—the contumely and reproach now poured out without stint or measure on both sections—and the shouts of victory over one section by another, as if a triumph had been achieved over a foreign foe, all announce not only the dawning, but the perfect day, of an attempt to alienate one portion of the Union from the other. How and when is this suicidal madness to be arrested? It is now palpable that no bill of any kind to organize governments in the territories acquired from Mexico can pass Congress at the present session, though ineffectual efforts will be made to pass one, and that he who shall attempt to stand between the contending sections in their hostile array, will be the first man struck down by both. Who will take the hazard of that position hereafter? Gentlemen both of the North and South will now go home and seek to sustain their respective grounds by inflammatory addresses to their constituents. The people will become excited, and their representatives will return to these halls at the next session still more rivetted in their opposition to one another. Before Congress can act on this question, it may run beyond the reach of any settlement. Is there not real ground for alarm? Sir, I envy not that man's feelings who can look upon the approaching struggle without apprehension.—The fiery southron finding the doors of justice barred against him, may seek to storm them or enforce his claims by violence, and in that event the very first men to shirk responsibility will be those who have provoked this tempest by their violent denunciations of all compromise and all justice. For myself, I confess that there is one object which I never could and never shall be able to contemplate in imagination without terror. It is that of my native land rent by discordant sectional factions—divided and torn into fragments, and finally drenched with fraternal blood. To avert that calamity, I will, at any time, sacrifice all other considerations, and seize upon the first opportunity to allay feelings which can by possibility lead to such a catatrophe. And gloomy as the prospect may be, I will not now cease to hope. The bill which was defeated in the House by fifteen votes, passed the Senate by a majority of eleven. Of two hundred and sixty-four votes in both Houses, the majority against the bill was but four! No other proposition could have possibly approached so near to a successful result. In the future, therefore, amidst all the darkness and difficulties of our position, we may finally find our safety in the judiciary, to which the constitution itself directs us. On the entablature over the eastern portico of this capitol stand, in beautiful relief, the marble figures of hope, liberty, and justice. Hope, leaning on her anchor, is represented as inquiring of liberty how the constitution and the Union it secures may be best preserved? and liberty points to justice as her answer. The moral ought never to forgotten. Let us look to the court which the charter of our liberties has established. That is the diamond which glitters through the gloom that surrounds us, and by that sacred light we may yet be directed to the preservation of our glorious Union; without which the hopes of all men who love liberty must sink in darkness forever.

Mr. CLAYTON then moved that the bill before the Senate be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. DOWNS said that he had suggested a division of the territory of Oregon into two governments, the one embracing that part below thirty-six degrees, and the other above. He would now give notice of his intention to move an amendment, which he sent to the chair, and which he asked to have printed, embracing the principle of the Missouri compromise.

Mr. BADGER rose to address the Senate.

Mr. KING said there was no question before the Senate.

The CHAIR stated the question to be on the motion by the Senator from Delaware to refer the bill to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. DICKINSON.—The question of reference is not debatable.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I will withdraw my motion to refer the bill to afford my friend from North Carolina an opportunity of being heard.

Mr. BADGER was proceeding to address the Senate, when

Mr. BUTLER called the Senator from North Carolina to order. There was no question before the Senate, and he asked that the rules should be observed.

Mr. YULEE.—If the Senator from North Carolina will give way, I will make a motion to permit him to proceed.

Mr. FOOTE hoped no friend of the compromise would interpose an objection to the freest discussion. He insisted that the Senator from North Carolina should proceed as the Senator from Delaware had been permitted to do.

Mr. BADGER said he desired no permission. He would, for the sake of having an opportunity to say a few words, move that the bill be indefinitely postponed. He then gave, briefly, some of the reasons which had brought him to the conclusion that the compromise bill surrendered the rights of the South; and expressed his surprise that any northern man should have opposed it, or any southern man have given it his support. It was presenting a case to the Supreme Court which must be decided against the South.

Mr. BADGER then withdrew his motion that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CLAYTON made a few observations in reply.

Mr. PHELPS inquired if there was any motion before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore replied that there was a motion that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BADGER.—That is withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore.—The Senator from North Carolina cannot withdraw his motion without the unanimous consent of the Senate.

[Objection was here made to the withdrawal of the motion.]

Mr. BADGER.—Is it the decision of the Chair that I cannot withdraw my motion without the unanimous consent of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore.—It is.

Mr. BADGER.—Then I appeal from the decision.

Mr. HALE moved to lay the appeal on the table; and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

So it was Ordered, That the appeal lie on the table.

Mr. PHELPS expressed a hope that the bill would be referred to a proper committee. He desired a free discussion, until the country should wake up and understand the merits of the bill. He was prepared to meet the responsibility of the position he had assumed; he was prepared to go home and face his constituency, and explain his course to them, and unless he was grievously mistaken they would sustain and approve his action in the matter. He was deeply indebted to his friend from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] who had completely vindicated his [Mr. P.'s] course, when he said that the bill surrendered all the rights of the South. In that case, he [Mr. P.] could no longer be charged with surrendering the rights of the North. He desired the bill to go to a committee, to look into this and other statements which had been made here and elsewhere. He had hoped he had sufficiently explained his course, but it was not so: every breeze from the North assailed him and the bill.

The committee who had charge of the bill were sent there to perform certain duties. These duties were not to go to fisticuffs in the committee-room for sectional objects. He had a duty to his country to perform, and not a mere duty to a section. If any objected to the bill, let them submit such proposition as in their judgment would extricate us from the embarrassment in which we are placed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore stated the question on the motion that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HALE.—Does not the motion to refer take precedence?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore.—In the opinion of the Chair, it does not.

Mr. MANGUM.—I move that my colleague have leave to withdraw his motion for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. BADGER.—I don't ask leave. The motion cannot be withdrawn without my consent.

The question was then taken, on the motion of indefinite postponement, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Mr. Yulee—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Atherton, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Benton, Borland, Bradbury, Bright, Butler, Chase, Clayton, Cooper, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, Johnson of Md., Johnson of La., Johnson of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Sebastian, Spruance, Sturgeon, Turney, Upham, Walker, and Westcott—37.

[Mr. FOOTE, when his name was called, stated, by permission of the Senate, that he should vote in the negative, not because he intended to commit himself in support of the bill, (for he knew nothing of its character,) but simply because he was of opinion that every bill from the House of Representatives ought to be received and treated with due consideration and respect.]

So the motion that the bill be indefinitely postponed was rejected.

The question was then taken upon the motion by Mr. CLAYTON that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories, and it was determined in the affirmative.

So it was Ordered, That the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for the year ending on the 30th of June, 1849.

The question pending was upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance to strike out the following clause:

"For the removal of obstructions in the Savannah river, and the naval anchorage near Fort Pulaski, under the direction of the Secretary of War, fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved to amend the clause by inserting after the word "obstructions," the words "caused by sinking wrecks in the defence of the city during the revolutionary war."

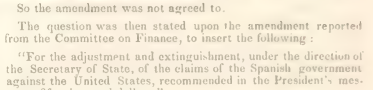
The question being taken upon agreeing to this amendment, it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Mass., Dayton, Downs, Greene, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Metcalfe, Miller, Phelps, Spruance, Upham, and Westcott—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archison Atherton, Benton, Bernard, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Miss., Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Douglas, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hamlin, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Jones, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Niles, Rusk, Sturgeon, Turney, Walker, and Yulee—31.

The question then recurred upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance to strike out the clause.

Mr. YULEE asked to be excused from voting, upon the ground that he had paired off with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN.]



Mr. BENTON hoped the Senator from Florida would not be excused, and made a few remarks in opposition to the practice of pairing off.

The question being put—"shall the Senator from Florida be excused from voting on this amendment?" it was determined in the affirmative.

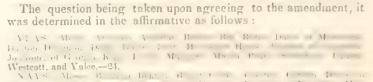
Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, then proceeded to state the reasons by which he was governed in his intention to vote to strike out the appropriation, and was alluding to the opinion of the President of the United States on the subject, when

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, called the Senator from Georgia to order, on the ground that it was not in order to cite the opinion of the Executive to influence the action of the Senate.

After some debate, principally upon the point of order, the question was taken upon the amendment, reported from the committee, to strike out the clause, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question was then stated upon the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance, to insert the following:



"For the adjustment and extinguishment, under the direction of the Secretary of State, of the claims of the Spanish government against the United States, recommended in the President's message, fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. BALDWIN addressed the Senate at much length against the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, followed on the same side.

The debate was continued by Messrs. BADGER and BUTLER in favor of the amendment, and by Mr. HALE against it.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the amendment, it was determined in the affirmative as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

On motion by Mr. KING, the prior orders were postponed and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill granting the right of way and a donation of the public lands to the State of Alabama for the construction of a railroad from Mobile to the mouth of the Ohio river.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, moved to amend the bill by adding a section granting the right of way and a donation of the public lands to the State of Mississippi, for the construction of a railroad from Jackson, through Brandon, to the Alabama line.

It being evident that the bill would give rise to debate, it was (in accordance with an understanding had when the bill was taken up) passed over informally.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1849.

Mr. ATHERTON submitted several unimportant amendments; which were agreed to.

Mr. BADGER moved to amend the bill on the 14th page by striking out "$40,522," and inserting "$41,022," and adding at the end of the clause that the salary of the commissioner of pensions shall be $3,000 per annum from and after the 1st of July, 1848.

Mr. BADGER explained that the object of this amendment was to place the officer at the head of the pension bureau, who was one of the most faithful and laborious officers in the service of the government, and whose duties had of late been largely increased, upon the same footing with respect to compensation as the assistant postmasters general and auditors.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, advocated the amendment, and hoped no objection would be made to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER moved further to amend the bill on page 34, by inserting between lines 810 and 811: "To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay to James A. Houston for three hundred and fifty bound copies of the proceedings and debates of the Senate, for the present session, as published by him, and for an analytical index to the same, to furnish to the members of the House of Representatives and Senate, the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER moved further to amend the bill by the insertion of an appropriation to pay the claim of David Taylor, who married a Cherokee Indian, for $12,500 and interest.

After a brief debate, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved further to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $10,000 for a survey of the Red river, with a view to the removal of the land raft which obstructs the navigation; which, after some remarks from Messrs. ATHERTON, JOHNSON, of Louisiana, SEBASTIAN, METCALFE, DOWNS, HUNTER, ATCHISON, ALLEN, DAVIS, of Massachusetts, and FOOTE, was negatived.

Mr. TURNEY moved further to amend the bill by inserting the following: "For the payment to Richard Fields of the balance due him on the certificate of the commissioners of Washington city, of June the twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and forty-seven, awarded and decreed to him under the sixteenth article of the treaty with the Cherokee nation of Indians of eighteen hundred and thirty-five-six, six hundred dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOWNS moved further to amend the bill by adding the following section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby required to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to the Creek nation of Indians, or to the order of Benjamin Marshall, Paul Jones, Chee Mieco, Gugo W. Stedham, and George Scott, chiefs of said nation of Indians, the sum of one hundred and forty-one thousand and [illegible] and ninety-one cents, being the balance of the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars agreed to be paid for lands ceded after deducting the amount of claims of citizens of Georgia, as ascertained and allowed by the commissioners appointed by the United States under the 4th article of the treaty of the 24th January, 1825.

A debate ensued, in which Messrs. DOWNS, ATCHISON, KING, FOOTE, ATHERTON and LEWIS took part.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia.—This question has been unexpectedly brought to the consideration of the Senate, and I therefore do not feel prepared to express an opinion with that confidence which alone could be the result of mature examination. I have not had my attention called to it until within the last half hour, and have not had time to read all the documentary evidence necessary to its full understanding. But from the slight investigation which I have been able to bestow upon the subject, I am forced to believe that the Creek Indians have any well-founded demand against the government of the United States. The facts on which this alleged claim is founded are few, and by no means complicated. They are concisely stated in the report of the committee, from which I will read:

"In 1820 Congress appropriated $20,000 to hold treaties with the Creek and Cherokees, to extinguish titles of the Indians to land in the State of Georgia, under the compact of 1802. Georgia was invited to nominate two persons to be present at them accordingly. All the parties, the United States, Georgia, and the Creek nation, met in council at Indian Spring, in December, 1820. The Georgia commissioners opened their talks, preferred demand against the Creeks, and the question of right to the lands was between 1774 and 1802; and also between the United States and Georgia, reduced, amounting to somewhat less than $250,000.

"The Creeks, in their talk in reply, or [illegible] acknowledged the existence of the claim, so far as they were acknowledged in the treaty of Coleraine, and referred the whole matter to stone engines and prisoners, but proposed to leave all the claims on both sides to the adjudication of the President. The proposal was accepted by the commissioners of Georgia, and articles of agreement were signed to submit the matters in controversy, and the talks and documents relative to them, to the decision of the President of the United States, to form to the Georgia agent, chiefs [illegible] and according to the evidence and decision such regulations, and restrictions as to the President may seem just, and that the decision and award thus made shall be binding upon the parties and contracting parties."

The agreement thus made became a part of the treaty which was signed between the United States and the Creek Indians, and bears the United States seal, as well as the other two parties. By it the Indians ceded, for $250,000 and a huge body of very valuable land, in Georgia, seeming to have been a very important accession of territory. They stipulate for the payment to the extent of $200,000 of the purchase money, and [illegible] to the following effect: Art. 4 as a further consideration for said cession the United States do hereby agree to pay to the State of Georgia whatever balance may be found due by the United States to citizens of said State who never received [illegible] reference made by the commissioners of Georgia and the chiefs, head men and warriors of the Creek nation, to be paid in five annual installments, [illegible] and added the same shall not exceed $250,000, to be applied by the said State of Georgia in full and final relinquishment of all claims of the citizens of Georgia upon the Creek nation for property taken or destroyed prior to the [illegible] 1802, regulating the intercourse with the Indian tribes."

The President appointed commissioners to investigate and adjust the claims, [illegible] giving him full powers to "adjust, liquidate, and settle all claims on both sides, under such rules, regulations, and restrictions as to the President, [illegible] (Mr. Monroe) accepted the trust, and made the rules and regulations for settling these claims, and appointed his Governor James P. Preston of Virginia, and the late Stephen Pleasanton, Esq., auditor, to be commissioners to report on the evidence and character of the claims. Governor Preston died before the first meeting at Milledgeville, Georgia, and Mr. Pleasanton, afterwards on Washington.

"These commissioners reported all the claims examined before them, to the last degree. They recommend, in the whole, $808,944 00 for payment as President Monroe, by three several awards, in 1822, 1824, and 1825, [illegible] one other claims to that amount in favor of the citizens of Georgia, reporting all others as not coming within the rules submitted to them. The commissioners recommend the decision and award of President Monroe as final and conclusive with respect to the claimants, and as binding on both parties."

Now, after the payment of the $808,944 00, to the Georgia claimants, according to the recommendation of the commissioners, there was a balance of the $250,000 left in the hands of the government to the amount of $141,055 91. The question arises, To whom does this balance belong? To Georgia, or to the United States, or to the Creek Indians? The Creeks claim that it belongs to them, and it is proposed to appropriate that sum by this bill for its payment.

Sir, I maintain that this balance is not the property of the Creek Indians. That it is not is evident from the terms of the treaty, and of the agreement by which Georgia claims were submitted to the arbitrament of the President. I call the special attention of the Senate to the language of the 4th article of the treaty.

"And as a further consideration for said cession, the United States do hereby agree to pay to the State of Georgia, whatever balance may be found due by the United States in addition to the citizens of said State, whenever the same shall be ascertained in conformity with the reference made by the commissioners of Georgia, and the chiefs, head men and warriors of the Creek nation, to be paid in five annual installments, [illegible] provided the same shall not exceed $250,000, the receipt of which shall be acknowledged by the said State of Georgia in full and final relinquishment of all claims of the citizens of Georgia upon the Creek nation, for the property taken or destroyed prior to the [illegible] 1802, regulating the intercourse with the Indian tribes."

The Senate will observe that there is not a word in this article of the treaty which intimates that any balance which might remain of the $250,000 after paying the Georgia claims, should be paid to the Creek Indians.

But by reference to the articles of cession executed by the commissioners of Georgia on the day of the treaty, it appears that nothing of the kind was contemplated or expected. It reads as follows:

This instrument by its very terms shows that the $250,000 were secured by said treaty in consideration to be paid to the State of Georgia." There is not a syllable which shows that it was contended that any balance should be paid to the Creeks.

In reply to this, it is asked, why then did the parties agree to submit the investigation and adjustment of these claims to the arbitrament of the President of the United States? If it was designed by the $250,000 to Georgia, where the necessity of an umpire? Sir, it was designed for the protection of the government, and not for the Creek Indians. They were content to cede $140,000 of their lands for $200,000 to be paid in money and $50,000 in the satisfaction of claims of the citizens of Georgia for spoliations. The commissioners of the State of Georgia at the time of the execution of the treaty, [illegible] claims to the amount of $250,000. The Indians denied that that amount was due. But were willing to receive from the United States $200,000 in money and a release from the Georgia claims, as a full satisfaction of the spoliations which was the price demanded for their lands. The United States agreed to pay the $200,000 in money, and to release the claims of the citizens of Georgia to the amount not exceeding $200,000, provided the Georgia commissioners would upon that condition release the Creeks from those claims. It was upon this condition alone. The release was to the President of the United States, who [illegible] the protection of the government. The agreement of the United States to pay a balance of $50,000, if that much should be found to be due. If less were due, the surplus would inure to the benefit of the United States. The whole seem to be that the contract interposed for the purpose of making it correct, shows clearly that the Creeks have no claim to any balance which might remain after paying the claims of the citizens of Georgia.

Nor would it seem from the evidence that the Creek Indians understood at the time they were entitled to any such balance.—The treaty was executed on the 8th January, 1821. The commissioners appointed by Mr. Monroe made their report as early as 1822 and 1824 [illegible], and reported $808,944 00 as due to be paid out according to the terms of the treaty. The balance of the $250,000 remained in the hands of the United States from the time above, to the 18th of November, 1825, a period of nearly seven years, and was never claimed by the Creek nation. Then, for the first time, John Crowell, as the agent of the Indians, set up a claim to such balance, and has ever since pressed its payment. What then long delay in the assertion of their rights, if these Indians believed were entitled to it? It is not pretended that they were ignorant of it. The commissioners sat in Georgia by agreement and where they were informed; and they must have known what amount was allowed, and consequently what balance remained after paying the award of the commissioner. Their long delay, therefore, furnishes strong proof that they did not understand the transactions at the Indian Springs at the time of the execution of the treaty, as securing to them any right to the balance, after paying the Georgia claims, if less than $250,000 should be found due.

The State of Georgia certainly never so understood the transaction, for she remonstrated from the beginning against the award of the commissioners, and say the committee "made repeated efforts to induce President Monroe first and President Adams afterwards, to reopen and readjust the decision made by the former." When General Jackson came into office the application of Georgia was again renewed; but it seems he did not feel himself authorized to reopen the commission. Finally, in 1834, the State of Georgia referred the matter to Congress by memorial. It was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, who examined thoroughly into all the facts of the case and presented to the Senate a report from which I read the following extract:

The Senate will observe that there is not a word in this article of the treaty which intimates that any balance which might re-

who represented the claimants and presented to the negotiating parties a bar to claims of Georgia, the extension of which led her to withhold many thousand [illegible] from the government of this State, preventing or retarding payment to [illegible] and numbers of [illegible] the embargo here to [illegible] which regard to a liability to pay out the [illegible] which [illegible] on the part of the United States. Moved by the [illegible] the United States [illegible] the interests of the United States would justify or require, and that the Indians [illegible] satisfied to receive two hundred thousand dollars in money from the United States, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

And the question being taken, it was decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Benton, Bissell, Bright, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Mass., Dayton, Dodge, George, Jenkins, of Maryland, Mason, Miller, Metcalfe, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Pitcher, Underwood, and Winthrop—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Bell, Evans, Haight, Hale, of Maine, Hannegan, Hay, Douglas, Dawson, Felch, Foote, Hale, Hunter, Houston, Jarnagin, of Tennessee, Johnson, of Georgia, Kerr, Lewis, Sevier, Simmons, and Yulee—28.

After further debate—

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to amend the bill, at page 44, in the 1071st line, by inserting an appropriation of $1,437 37 to pay Commissioner James Bridges [illegible] commissioner to China.

After a protracted debate, in which Messrs. HALE, HANNEGAN, DAYTON, BADGER, and ATCHISON took part—

Mr. HALE moved to amend the amendment by adding the words "deducting therefrom the pay of expenses [illegible]" which was agreed to.

After further debate, in which Messrs. DOWNS, NILES, DAVIS of Massachusetts, KING, BENTON, BADGER, ATCHISON, and PEARCE, took part—

The question was taken upon agreeing to the amendment, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

OVERFLOWED LANDS IN ARKANSAS.

On motion by Mr. BORLAND, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill to grant to the State of Arkansas certain unsold lands subject to overflow, for purposes of internal improvement, education, and for other purposes.

Mr. BORLAND explained, that there was about 4,807,000 acres of land of this description in the State of Arkansas, which were entirely useless, and without value in their present condition. Before they could be brought into cultivation, an embankment must be made. In the hands of the State this would be accomplished, and some important public works would be completed without application for aid to the general government.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, asked what was the quantity of lands of this description in the adjoining States, as well as in Arkansas.

Mr. BORLAND replied, that the total amount was about twenty-four millions.

Mr. CALHOUN thought that the general government ought to do something for the purpose of reclaiming this immense mass of unsaleable and useless lands. He had reported a bill for the purpose, and he hoped this matter would not be pressed until he could call up his bill, which he would do next session.

Mr. YULEE thought there might be some doubt as to the power of the government according to the view of the Senator from South Carolina. The best way would be to pass this bill, to only a portion of which he had any objection.

Mr. WESTCOTT stated that there were four millions of acres of land similar in their character, in Florida, and he was glad to find that there was some prospect of their being reclaimed and made of value. He hoped the condition would be stricken out.

Mr. YULEE moved to strike out the conditions by which the State bound herself to a certain specified disposition of the proceeds.

Mr. NILES felt some alarm at the extent of the donation.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, the bill was laid on the table for the present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed the bill from the Senate entitled "An Act [illegible]."

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1849.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to amend the bill by inserting, after the 1071st line, the following: "For compensation to Stanhope Prevost, consul of the United States at Lima, for diplomatic services rendered in the absence of the charge d'affaires from that country, the sum of one thousand eight hundred dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved further to amend the bill by inserting a clause appropriating "for compensation to Charles E. Anderson for services as acting charge d'affaires at Paris during the absence of the United States minister, $1,666 67."

Mr. UPHAM asked where General Cass was at this time?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—On an excursion to the Holy Land.

Mr. MILLER said this was the first case of an application for extra pay, while the minister was only temporarily absent on an excursion.

Mr. HANNEGAN believed it had been always customary to make such an allowance.

Mr. KING said that no such practice had, within his knowledge prevailed. It certainly was not so in his case, and he had been sometimes absent from Paris for a month or two, visiting various parts of the continent for recreation. He thought the precedent a dangerous one.

After a few words from Mr. DAYTON and Mr. MASON—

Mr. HANNEGAN said he had merely presented the amendment for consideration. It was for the Senate to decide as to its adoption or rejection.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved further to amend the bill by inserting the following: "For compensation to William M. Blackford, as charge d'affaires of the New Grenada, the sum of one thousand one hundred and twenty five dollars, being the usual return allowance to charges des affaires to foreign courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN moved further to amend the bill, by adding a section requiring the Secretary of State to pay to J. B. Brown, Dragoman at Constantinople, the difference between his salary as Dragoman and minister or charge des affaires, during the time he acted as minister.

After a brief debate, in which Messrs. ALLEN, KING, ATHERTON, and BADGER took part, the question was taken upon agreeing to the amendment, and it was determined in the negative.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved further to amend the bill by inserting the following: "For paying Joshua Dodge, late special tobacco agent of the United States to the various governments of Europe, four thousand five hundred dollars, in full compensation for his services, and for contingent and other expenses incurred by him during the period of his three missions as said special tobacco agent, and for services rendered to the tobacco interest of the United States."

After a brief debate—

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved further to amend the bill by inserting the following: "For the expenses of running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, and paying the salaries of the officers of the commission, a sum not exceeding fifty thousand dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved further to amend the bill in the 701st line, by adding: "This sum heretofore carried to the surplus fund from an appropriation for the survey of the coast from Apalachicola, Florida, to the mouth of the Mississippi, and now reappropriated, four thousand and seventy dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, by direction of the Committee on Commerce, moved further to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of ten thousand five hundred dollars to reimburse the New York, Boston and Providence Rail Road Company, and New Jersey Steam Navigation Company, for the expenses of maintaining a light boat on Eel grass shoals.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE moved further to amend the bill, on page 19, line 445, by inserting the following: "Provided, That when a captain in the navy shall be the chief of the bureau, he shall receive the the same pay to which he would be entitled if upon other duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE moved further to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of four thousand dollars towards the construction of a large telescope at the Washington Navy Yard.

After a brief debate,

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. DIX moved further to amend the bill, on page 20, after line 474, by inserting the following: "For payment of expenses of frigate Macedonian whilst employed under a resolution of Congress in carrying passengers to and from [illegible] sixteen thousand [illegible] dollars.

[illegible] ry charged with settling the accounts of the navy, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, may find to have been actually paid by the commander [illegible] he declines to receive, and deducting from the whole amount paid by him the earnings of the ship."

After a debate, in which Messrs. BRIGHT, DIX, WESTCOTT, MILLER, YULEE, FOOTE, DAYTON, PEARCE, BADGER, BUTLER, ALLEN, PHELPS, HOUSTON, DICKINSON, NILES, and MANGUM, took part—

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MASON moved further to amend the bill by inserting the following: "For paying to Thomas Jefferson Randolph, executor of Thomas Jefferson, deceased, [illegible] the said Thomas Jefferson, [illegible] the said papers and manuscripts of a public nature in the State Department, and execute a conveyance thereof to the United States.

"For printing and publishing the said papers and manuscripts, the sum of [illegible] dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary. Provided, the said printing and publication shall not [illegible] any part thereof to be printed [illegible] direct."

Mr. MASON briefly advocated the amendment.

Mr. PEARCE concurred with the Senator from Virginia, in what he had said, and, with his permission, would submit a modification of the amendment by adding the following: "And a like sum for the purchase of [illegible] under the same conditions of the papers and manuscripts of the late Alexander Hamilton."

Mr. MASON accepted the modification. He was not acquainted with the character of the papers, but he was well acquainted with the character of Alexander Hamilton, and should vote for the purchase of his papers most cheerfully.

Mr. ATHERTON was opposed to the insertion of the amendment in this bill. It ought to be considered in a separate bill.

After debate, in which Messrs. CALHOUN, HUNTER, JOHNSON, of Maryland, PEARCE, ATHERTON, KING, BREESE, and others took part, the question was then upon agreeing to the amendment, as modified, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Mr. [illegible] Connecticut, Dayton, Delaware, Foote, Georgia, Houston, Jarnagin, Johnson of Maryland, Mangum, Mason, Pearce, Phelps, Simmons, Spruance, and Upham—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Atherton, Badger, Bagby, Benton, Breese, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis of Massachusetts, Dix, Fairfield, Greenleaf, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, Miller, Niles, Sturgeon, Turney, Walker, and Woodbridge—25.

So the amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BENTON moved further to amend the bill by striking out the following clause: "For payment of the first volume of the fifth series of the Documentary History, under contract with the Secretary of State, twenty-four thousand three hundred and twenty-seven dollars.

After debate, the question was taken on agreeing to the motion to strike out, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. [illegible] Connecticut, Dayton, Delaware, Foote, Georgia, Houston, Jarnagin, Johnson of Maryland, Mangum, Mason, Pearce, Phelps, Simmons, Spruance, Upham, Walker, and Woodbridge—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Atherton, Badger, Bagby, Benton, Breese, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis of Massachusetts, Dix, Fairfield, Greenleaf, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, Miller, Niles, Sturgeon, Turney, and Woodbridge—22.

Mr. BORLAND moved further to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of thirty thousand dollars for continuing and completing the surveys and explorations of J. C. Fremont in Oregon and California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DICKINSON moved further to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation to pay for advertising deserters in the National Police Gazette, such sum not exceeding three thousand dollars, the Secretary to [illegible] direct.

After further debate—

The amendment was disagreed to—Ayes 21, Noes 27.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved further to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation to pay Joseph H. Warren, for his services as clerk in the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, while rated as a messenger.

After debate—

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLER moved further to amend the bill, by inserting the following: "For repairing that portion of the City Hall now occupied by the courts of the United States, [illegible] dollars Provided, That the corporation of the city of Washington shall appropriate a like amount for their half."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BENTON moved further to amend the bill, by inserting the following: "For compensation to Dr. Torry, of Princeton, New Jersey, for his services in classifying and superintending the engraving, and defraying the expenses of engraving the botanical specimens brought us from California, Oregon, and the West, by J. C. Fremont, the sum of $4,000."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Borland, Breese, Dayton, Johnson of La., Mellen, and Pearce—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Benton, Bright, Barnes, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Davis of Mass., Dix, Dodge of Wisconsin, Durkee, Fish, Douglas, Felch, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Md., Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mason, Metcalfe, Sebastian, Spruance, Sturgeon, Turney, and Walker—30.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved further to amend the bill, by inserting the following: "For compensation to Robert P. Boyd, in lieu of his present compensation, forty dollars per month, as watchman of the Post Office Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN said he had an amendment to offer which would probably give rise to discussion. He therefore moved that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN then moved an amendment that the sum of fifty thousand dollars, held by the government in trust for the old settled party of the Cherokee nation be paid over to the chiefs or agents of that party for such creditors as have substantiated their claims.

After debate—

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved further to amend the bill by inserting the following: "For compensation to a door-keeper for the President of the United States six hundred dollars."

Mr. HANNEGAN explained that the President paid the expenses of a door-keeper out of his own pocket. Martin who was, well known to the members as the obliging incumbent of that post, received but twenty dollars a month on which to support a large family.

Mr. YULEE moved to amend the amendment by adding a messenger at the same salary.

Mr. DAVIS of Mississippi asked if the President was privy to this application.

Mr. HANNEGAN replied, certainly not. So far from it the President had dismissed his messenger for having had a memorial presented to the Senate asking an increase of compensation. He had urged the President to re-instate him. It was not for the President, it was for the faithful men that he asked for this appropriation.

After further debate, the question was taken on agreeing to the amendment and determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Barnum, Bell, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Greene, Hale, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson of Maryland, Niles, Spruance, Woodbridge, and Yulee—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Bell, Berrien, Bright, Davis of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Douglas, Downs, Foote, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Miller, Sebastian, Turney, Upham, and Walker—24.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FELCH moved further to amend the bill by inserting the following: "For repairs of the court-house at Detroit, by William R. Noyes, three hundred and fifty-five dollars and thirteen cents."

Mr. CLARKE inquired why these repairs had not been paid for.

Mr. FELCH replied that it was not one of that class of expenses which the Treasury thought they were authorized to pay.

Mr. WESTCOTT suggested a modification of the amendment so as to read as follows: "For repairs of the United States court-house at Detroit, heretofore made by William R. Noyes, under the direction of the marshal, such amount as the Treasury decide is due.

Mr. FELCH accepted the modification, and the question being taken on agreeing to the amendment as modified it was determined in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON moved further to amend the bill on page 19 by striking out "five thousand eight hundred," and inserting "nine thousand three hundred," so as to conform to the estimates and provide for the salary of the chief of the bureau of provisions and clothing.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER moved further to amend the bill by striking out the appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars for the purchase of a site for the custom house at Charleston, South Carolina.

After a debate, in which Messrs. WALKER, BUTLER, ALLEN, DIX, ATHERTON, and DAVIS, of Massachusetts, took part—

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WALKER moved further to amend the bill by striking out the appropriation for the improvement of the streets and avenues in the city of Washington.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. YULEE renewed his amendment appropriating four thousand dollars towards the construction of a telescope of the largest size at Washington navy yard, with a proviso, that the total cost should not exceed sixteen thousand dollars.

Mr. YULEE read a letter from Lieutenant Maury on the subject.

The amendment was disagreed to.

No further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

The question being on concurring in the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole—

Mr. BALDWIN asked that the amendment appropriating fifty thousand dollars to pay the claim of the Spanish government for the Amistad negroes, be reserved for a separate vote.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, asked that the amendment for the payment of the Creek Indians, be reserved for a separate vote.

Mr. BERRIEN asked that the amendment striking out the appropriation for the Savannah river, be reserved for a separate vote, and that action be postponed on it until he should have an opportunity of being heard. He had been necessarily absent when the amendment was under consideration. It was a question of deep interest to his constituents, not only in Savannah, but throughout the State of Georgia.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, asked that the amendment appropriating thirty thousand dollars for the continuation of Fremont's explorations in Oregon and California, be reserved for a separate vote.

The question was then taken upon concurring in the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of those reserved for separate votes, and they were concurred in.

Mr. BERRIEN said that he heard the Senator from New Hampshire say that it was not important to get this bill through to night, owing to the length of time it would take for engrossing it, and if not, that they must have another night session. He had travelled all night last night and only asked, being not now in condition, that the question on the Savannah river amendment be postponed until Monday, that he might be heard on a question so important to his constituents. He would occupy but a portion of the morning of Monday, and would then unite with the Senator from New Hampshire, in bringing the bill to a close without a night session.

Mr. ATHERTON reminded the Senator from Georgia, that the amendment had been agreed to by a large majority of the Senate, the vote being thirty-five to fifteen. The Senator from Georgia would do all his duty to his constituents by stating his views now, and allowing the vote to be taken.

Mr. BERRIEN said that he was not in a condition to address the Senate now, and would occupy but a small portion of their time on Monday.

Mr. ATHERTON said there was a special order for Monday.

Mr. BERRIEN said there were many special orders which gave way to unfinished busines; and with the declaration that he would not delay final action on the bill more than one hour on Monday, he moved that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to. Ayes 14, Noes 19.

The question was then stated on concurring in the amendment appropriating fifty thousand dollars for the payment of the claim of the Spanish government.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to add after the word "government" the words "for the Africans of the Amistad, who were declared free by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States;" which was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Butler, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Douglas, Downs, Foote, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Sebastian, Turney, Woodbridge, and Yulee—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Benton, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dix, Felch, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Mellen, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Walker—22.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The question was then stated on concurring in the amendment appropriating $141,055 91 to certain Creek Indians.

Mr. JOHNSON of Georgia desired to make one or two remarks. He had no idea that this money ought to be paid. He believed it belonged to the general government even if the arbitration which was had was conclusive between the parties. He would merely state that his principal object was to relieve the minds of Senators from some doubt which had been thrown over the fidelity with which the State of Georgia had fulfilled its duties in relation to this claim. He would send a letter to the Secretary to read from a gentleman of good standing, who was acquainted with all the facts, and who testified that the money was faithfully paid out by Governor Lumpkin, who received it.

The SECRETARY read the letter, as follows:

[illegible]

Hon. H. L. Johnson

Dear Sir: In reply to your enquiry [illegible] Spring, with the Creek Indians of 1826 [illegible] stipulations before that time by that tribe, I have a distinct recollection of Col. John A. Cuthbert [illegible] in the Creek nation [illegible] paid, except an amount [illegible] carefully examined and examined [illegible] all on file now in the Executive department of Georgia, or were filed at that time.

[illegible]

JOSEPH [illegible]

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Butler, Clarke, Davis, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Foote, Greene, Hale, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Lewis, Miller, Niles, Phelps, Upham, Walker, Wesbrook, and Yulee—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Benton, Breese, Bright, Felch, Hamlin, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Pearce, Sprnance, Turney, and Underwood.—13.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The question was then stated on concurring in the amendment appropriating for continuing and completing the surveys and explorations to be made by J. C. Fremont in Oregon and California, $30,000.

After a debate in which Messrs. BREESE, BELL, BENTON, and JOHNSON, of Maryland, participated, the question was taken [illegible] and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—[illegible]

NAYS—[illegible]

So the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment striking out the appropriation for the removal of obstructions in the Savannah river was then concurred in.

Mr. DIX moved the amendment appropriating [illegible] dollars for compensation and expenses of a commercial agent, to be selected and sent abroad by the President to collect information respecting the commerce, productions, and statistics of Asia and Eastern Africa.

After a brief debate, the question was taken on agreeing to the amendment, and it was determined in the negative. Ayes 15, Noes 19.

[illegible]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved an amendment appropriating ten thousand dollars for a survey of the Red river, and made a few remarks in support of it.

The amendment was rejected. Ayes 9, Noes 21.

Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives making appropriations for the support of the army, for the year ending June 30th, 1849, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

OVERFLOWED LANDS IN ARKANSAS.

On motion by Mr. BORLAND, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to grant to the State of Arkansas certain unsold lands subject to overflow, for the purpose of internal improvement, education, and other purposes, in said State.

The bill having been amended, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. KING thought it would be best to limit the bill to the lands in the State of Arkansas. So far he was willing to go, but no further at present. Whenever his friend from Florida would introduce a bill relative to the lands in that State, he would give it a favorable consideration.

Mr. BORLAND said, as the bill was originally introduced, it was limited in its provisions to the overflowed lands in the State of Arkansas. Several Senators, however, had suggested the propriety of giving the bill a more extensive operation; and it was solely with a view to meet the wishes of his friends around him that he had consented to extend its operation so as to embrace the useless lands in the adjoining States

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, sustained the bill as it had been amended, and expressed a hope that the opposition of the Senator from Alabama would be withdrawn.

Mr. FOOTE explained, that the language of the bill applied only to the lands known as swamp lands, utterly valueless to the general government, and which could be reclaimed and made valuable by the State.

Mr. BORLAND said, that if he thought these lands could ever be made worth any thing to the United States, he would not ask for them on the terms named by the bill. The State would embank and reclaim the lands, and thus remove a fertile cause of disease, and encourage the cultivation of the lands and the increase of population.

Mr. WESTCOTT was of opinion, that the improvements necessary to make these lands useful would never be made by the United States. It would require ten regiments of topographical engineers, and a hundred millions of money. If the States would take the lands on the condition of reclaiming the lands, the offer ought to be accepted.

Mr. MILLER thought we had not sufficient information on the subject of these lands to enable the Senate to act on the bill in this hasty manner, and at this late period of the session. It had been said by the Senator from South Carolina, that a general system would be brought before Congress at the next session, and he thought we should wait for that system.

Mr. KING said he had no objection to a bill to give to the States the lands which could never be reclaimed by the government, which would not go into a system of drainage. If the States would do this, it was the only way in which the lands could be made valuable. He did not believe that the everglades of Florida could ever be reclaimed by the State or the general government. He would withdraw his opposition to the bill.

Mr. METCALFE said he could not, as a representative of a State which was excluded from the benefit of any improvement of her rivers and harbors, vote now to give away to particular States the lands which were the common property of all. He moved to lay the bill on the table.

The question was put and negatived—Ayes 16, Noes 20.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, made a few remarks in favor of the bill, because neither the means of the government nor private capital can ever be applied to the reclamation of these lands. The measure had been long before Congress, and no one could pretend that it was sprung in the Senate.

Mr. NILES opposed the bill. The title of the bill referred to lands subject to overflow. All bottom lands are subject to overflow, and this description would embrace all valley lands. But the bill has been amended so as to extend to all lands which the surveyor may denominate swamp lands. After a wet season, it would be difficult to decide which are precisely swamp lands, and which were only temporarily overflowed. He thought such a sweeping grant, which would give away a hundred millions of acres, ought not to be made in this manner, and he should oppose the bill.

Mr. BREESE stated that the practice of the surveyors, when employed in surveys, in reference to overflowed lands, was to give them a distinct designation in their maps and reports to the General Land Office, and from these reports the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury is made. In his State there were many acres of lands in high situations, near the sources of streams, which were subject to overflow, and which could not be called swamp lands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD thought more particular information ought to be before the Senate in reference to the lands in other States than Arkansas. He moved to strike out the third section, which extends the provisions of the bill to other States.

Mr. FOOTE said that the state of things was the same in Mississippi and Louisiana as in Arkansas. He hoped there would be no delay, as no further information could throw new light on the subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, before he could vote, desired to know what portion of these lands were now inhabited and under cultivation. A great deal of money had been expended by the government in removing obstructions and rafts, and it was now proposed to give all away. He doubted whether overflowed lands were entirely useless, as he knew that many such lands had been reclaimed and made valuable by private enterprise. He would prefer that some one should be sent to survey these lands, that the government should be able to make some estimate of their value.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, complained that every application from the States in which these lands lie had been refused — The overflow from the Mississippi was sometimes ten feet, and it was impossible for any private enterprise to reclaim the lands. The health of the country was injured by these inundations.

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed until to-morrow.

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives, to establish the Territorial Government of Oregon, and the reported amendments thereto.

The first amendment was the introduction of the following proviso to the sixth section: "That no act of the Territorial Legislature shall become a law until approved by the Governor."

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, moved to amend the amendment, by adding the words, "of the Territory, or, if disapproved by said Governor, until specifically submitted to, and approved by, the Congress of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS explained, that the absolute veto power was embraced in all the Territorial Governments.

Mr. HALE suggested an amendment, making it the duty of the Governor to transmit any bill which did not become a law, to Congress, as follows: "And it shall be the duty of the Governor to transmit copies of any acts disapproved by him to Congress."

Mr. TURNEY moved to add, "and his reasons for disapproval."

Mr. HALE accepted the addition as a modification of his amendment, and then withdrew his amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi; which was agreed to.

Mr. HALE renewed his motion to amend, and again withdrew it.

The amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. HALE moved to insert his amendment in the third section, as follows: "And it shall be the duty of said governor, immediately after the session of the legislature, to transmit copies of any acts to us which he may have withheld his approval, together with his reasons for such disapproval."

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment of the committee being under consideration, as follows: At the beginning of the 14th section insert: "Inasmuch as the said territory is north of the parallel of thirty six degrees and thirty minutes of north latitude, usually known as the Missouri compromise"—

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to strike out "thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes," and insert "forty-two;" and to strike out the words "usually known as the Missouri compromise."

Mr. DOUGLAS suggested that the better mode would be, to take the question on the amendment altogether.

Mr. UNDERWOOD thought that the amendment, as reported, [illegible] California bill, and it was his desire to make the language so plain as to preclude the reopening of this debate.

Mr. BUTLER said he was a passive member of the committee, intending to vote against this whole section, the reasons for which he should give hereafter.

Mr. NILES expressed astonishment that the Committee on the Territories should have reported an amendment which had nothing to do with the subject matter of this bill, as it is well known that all of Oregon lies north of 36° 30'. He was at a loss to understand the reason for such a provision. Was it intended to refer to some other subject which might come up for legislation hereafter? If it was intended for any thing, it must be to exercise influence over legislative action in the other territories. He was entirely opposed to this mode of legislation. If it was a re-enactment of the compromise bill, he thought it better, after our failure to legislate in that form, to leave it alone. Perhaps it was to ease off the feelings of certain Senators here, and to enable them to justify their votes. He did not wish to see any thing go abroad which might be construed into a compromise when compromise is not intended.

Mr. DOUGLAS explained that the amendment was reported with the unanimous desire of the committee that no Senator's vote on the bill should be understood as committing him on the great question.

Mr. HALE said he should vote against the amendment, and, whatever the vote on the amendment, he should vote for the bill. But he desired it to be distinctly understood that he did not by such vote commit himself in the slightest degree as to his future course.

Mr. MASON charged the language reported in the amendment as unintelligible. He attributed to the committee the design to evade the slavery question. He referred to the state of public opinion abroad, and to the convention about to be assembled at Buffalo, for the choice of a standard bearer. But one god was to be worshipped there, and that god was power—the power to trample down the constitution of the country. He referred to the recent decision of Virginia not to regard any law of the United States which should prevent her citizens from carrying their slaves into any of the territories. He and his constituents were willing to be bound by the principle of the compromise; but it was not to be expected that they would go one single step beyond it. It would be to expect them to submit to insult.

Mr. DAYTON replied to the threats held out by the Senator from Virginia, that if she was to be forced another step she would proclaim nullification. He repudiated for the whig party this question as the great issue to be tried at the coming election. The questions of free soil and slavery were not the great questions of the whig party. They constituted too narrow a ledge for that party to stand on. Nor would it be generally understood that this was the great issue with the democratic party. As to the amendment, whatever may be the understanding with which it was adopted in the committee, Senators would have to stand on their recorded votes. He did not see how the amendment could be sustained.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, said that it being evident the bill could not be disposed of to-day, he would therefore move that its further consideration be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER said he had no objection to the postponement, provided it did not interfere with his remarks which he was about to make. He desired to be heard on this bill before the vote was taken on it.

The motion to postpone was then agreed to.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion heretofore made by Mr. DICKINSON to reconsider the vote on the third reading of the bill for the relief of John Devlin; and it was determined in the negative.

ALABAMA RAILROAD.

On motion by Mr. KING, the Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill granting to the State of Alabama the right of way and a donation of public lands for making a railroad from Mobile to the mouth of the Ohio river.

The question pending was upon agreeing to the amendment submitted by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, granting the right of way and a donation of public lands for making a railroad from Jackson through Brandon to the Alabama line; and it was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS moved further to amend the bill by adding a section granting the right of way and a donation of public land for making a railroad from Pensacola, Florida, to Montgomery, Alabama.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the amendment by adding a section granting the right of way and a donation of public land for making a railroad from St. Joseph to Hannibal, Missouri.

Mr. KING moved the question from Missouri would not prevent in the amendment, and protested against having his bill loaded down with extraneous matters, which would be sure to defeat it in the House. If the bill was a good one let it pass or fail, as such it was very important to the South that it should pass.

Mr. BENTON was very far from believing that the amendment would have a tendency to load down the bill. On the contrary, he regarded it as a just and needful measure; and he thought the Senator from Alabama should be pleased with any measure which was likely to encourage his daughter's husband, a young man, who would be a pupil to the house.

Mr. BUTLER was sorry he could not give his support to the bill or its amendments in the present form. He would wish to know the amount of the lands which may be given in each case. He referred to the various clauses in the constitution from which the power to give away the public lands was derived by different persons. He thought it doubtful whether the public lands would be enhanced in value, or the sales of them facilitated by these constant surrenders. He would prefer that the constitution should be amended to suit the purposes of all, than that this policy should go on.

Mr. CALHOUN thought the policy of these appropriations of the public lands was beneficial in increasing the value of the public domain. As to internal improvement, he denied in toto the power of the general government to carry it on.

Mr. WESTCOTT took a view of the advantages which would result to the United States, as well as to the States in which the roads were proposed to be located, from these donations of the public lands, by the facilities which would be given to the transportation of materials for the navy yards, and for the transportation of stores and troops.

Mr. BUTLER objected to the precedent. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. BREESE,] had recently offered a resolution to give all the public lands in that State for public improvements.

Mr. BREESE said, his resolution embraced only ten miles on both sides of the Illinois river.

Mr. BUTLER.—Why not ten miles was asked for now, why not ask for twenty, or sixty miles. The principle would be the same.

Mr. CALHOUN made a brief reply.

Mr. NILES said, if this policy was to prevail, and the lands were to be given away because they were of no use while in the hands of the general government, he desired to see a national bill, a bill on a magnificent scale. He would, therefore, move to amend the bill by inserting the bill which he had reported a short time since, providing lands to Ann Wooster, commencing a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific. This would test the sense of the Senate on the principle involved in the proposition.

Mr. BORLAND made a few remarks in favor of the bill.

Mr. TURNEY would not vote for the bill, but he would vote for every amendment which should be offered. He wished to test the opinions of Senators who professed to be hostile to a general system of internal improvement, by seeing all these separate bills embraced in one bill, which would thus make the bill general in its effect, and not a [illegible] According to his reading of the constitution, this aggregation of separate appropriations would constitute a general system of internal improvement. He desired to see what was the true construction put on these questions by every Senator.

Mr. BREESE explained his view of the constitutional power of Congress to make internal improvements, which he totally denied. But he maintained that the government had a right to put the public domain in a condition to be most beneficial to the public, and these were such appropriations, [illegible] and [illegible] the value of the residue. These donations to States were in fact no donation, because only alternate sections are granted, and those reserved are put at $2 50 per acre, which is twice the price fixed as a minimum.

Mr. TURNEY made a reply in explanation and support of what he had before said. As to the last argument of the Senator from Illinois, the fixing of the price of the alternate sections at twice the minimum rate, he attached no great weight to it, regarding this increase of price as more likely to benefit the railroad companies than the government. The companies would prevent any sales by the government by putting their own sections at a somewhat lower rate.

Mr. BREESE rejoined very briefly.

Mr. DOUGLAS said he [illegible] the way of this measure. On the contrary, he expected to vote for it. But as chairman of the committee which had been charged with [illegible] bound, if the discussion was to proceed, to move its postponement.

Mr. KING expressed a hope that the vote would be taken on the bill, which had already been once postponed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the [illegible] amendment was disagreed to.

The bill was further amended by striking out such portions as gave the privilege of selecting the lands within twenty miles of the lines of the roads, thus restricting the selections to within six miles of either side of the roads.

Mr. ALLEN moved further to amend the bill by adding a section providing that the mails shall not be required to be transported on said roads, if in the judgment of the Postmaster General the public interest would be better subserved by using other roads.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NILES withdrew his amendment.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

On the question "shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" the yeas and nays were called for, and were determined in the affirmative, as follows:

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the amendments from the House to the bill giving effect to certain treaty stipulations between this and foreign governments for the apprehension and delivering up of certain offenders, with a recommendation that the Senate do not concur; and Mr. B. stated that it was with a view to the appointment of a committee of conference.

Mr. DOUGLAS moved to proceed to the consideration of the bill to establish a government in the territory of Oregon.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, wished the Senator from Illinois to forego his motion for the present, and consent to call it up at 10 o'clock to-morrow. He professed himself quite desirous the Senator to have it disposed of, but he thought the present hour not suited to the discussion.

Mr. DOUGLAS would acquiesce, and withdraw his motion with the distinct understanding that it should be taken up to-morrow, at 11 o'clock. [Cries of "agreed."

Mr. DOWNS contended that the Post Office bill was the unfinished business, and should come up as a matter of course.

The CHAIR gave it as his opinion that it was his duty to order

Mr. ATHERTON then moved to postpone the further consideration of the Post Office bill, with a view to take up the bill making appropriation for the military service of the United States for the year ending 30th June, 1848; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON submitted various amendments from the Committee on Finance: the first taken up for consideration was, "for arrearages for military surveys west of the Mississippi, $20,000;" which, after a brief explanation, was adopted.

Several important amendments of the committee were adopted.

The amendment granting $200,000 for the military and civil operations in California under command of Commodore Stockton and Lieutenant Colonel Fremont, was next taken up.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, said the sum was a pretty large one, and he wished some information on the subject.

Mr. ATHERTON replied that the amendment was a portion of the bill that had already passed the Senate, and related only to ascertained claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired if a bill had not already been passed giving $700,000 for the settlement of the California claims, and desired to be informed what necessity existed for this additional $200,000.

Mr. BENTON explained at length, going into a history of the case, which, while it amused, seemed to convince the Senate of the necessity for adopting the amendment.

The amendment was adopted by a large majority.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, offered various amendments from the Military Committee, which were adopted: one increasing the companies of some of the regiments to 64, with the privilege of extending the number to 100 men, should the President think proper.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $15,000 for a fort on Proctor's Island, in Lake Borgne, contending with great zeal and animation for the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. ATHERTON insisted that this was not a fortification bill, and that the amendment was not an appropriate one for the military bill.

Mr. JOHNSON insisted that it was the bill to which it ought to be affixed. When he had offered the amendment to the naval appropriation bill, he was told by the same Senator, "that was not the place for it; wait until the civil and diplomatic bill comes before us here." He had waited patiently for this bill, and when he offered it again was told that was not the place for it; and now, when he offered it to the only bill that it could be attached, here was the same story. He insisted that it should go to the bill.

Mr. BENTON came to the rescue of the amendment, declaring that Proctor's Island was an old acquaintance of his, observing that he had voted for the appropriation on all occasions, and should do so on the present, agreeing, at the same time, with Mr. J., that the present bill was the legitimate one to which the amendment should be attached.

After a few remarks from Messrs. DIX, BREESE, and BRIGHT, against the amendment--

Mr. JOHNSON demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the vote stood as follows:

YEAS--Messrs. Atchison, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Butler, Chalmers, Clarke, Cooper, Dodge, Downs, Fitzgerald, Foote, Johnson of Louisiana, Mason, Pearce, Sebastian, Walker, Westcott, and Woodbridge--20.

NAYS--Messrs. Atherton, Bagby, Berrien, Bibb, Calhoun, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Dickinson, Dix, Evans, Hannegan, Johnson of Maryland, Jones of Georgia, Lewis, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Phelps, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, and Upham--21.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to amend the bill by granting a discharge to such of the mounted rifle regiment intended for California who had served in Mexico as might please to avail themselves of it; and he addressing the Senate and paying a well-merited compliment to this regiment, which and been first in every fight, and leading in every forlorn hope.

Mr. ALLEN supported the amendment, declaring his belief that they were entitled to their discharge under the law.

Mr. BORLAND also spoke handsomely of these gallant men, declaring they were his brethren in arms, and with them he had risked the chances of the country.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, opposed the amendment, declaring that they were not entitled under the law to their discharge, and doubting the policy of allowing them to leave the service.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. ALLEN moved to amend the bill by inserting an item giving $6000, with interest from 1847, to Captain John Caldwell, for moneys paid by him in Mexico.

This amendment was resisted on the ground that it was a private claim, and should not be inserted in the bill; and, after some debate, in which Messrs. ALLEN, ATHERTON, and DAVIS, of Mississippi, participated, the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atcheson, Badger, Benton, Bell, Bowlin, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Corwin, Downs, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hannegan, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Miller, Turney, Tweedy, and Yulee—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Breese, Butler, Calhoun, Dix, Evans, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Simmons, Sturgeon, Upham, Walker, Woodbridge, and Woodbury—18.

Amendments were offered by Mr. BELL, and by Mr. BORLAND, which underwent considerable debate, and were rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendments being concurred in, the bill was read a third time and passed.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned

THURSDAY, AUGUST 10, 1848.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the 9th instant, in relation to reclaiming the everglades in the State of Florida. It was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Eliza Buchanan.

Mr. JOHNSON also, from the same committee, asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of House bill for the relief of Catherine Clarke, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RESOLUTION.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate such information that may be within the knowledge of the department in reference to claims made against the Cherokees, who are parties to the treaty of August 6, 1846, or specially against that portion of the nation called Old Settlers, or Western Cherokees, for services in any other and and assistance rendered the said Cherokees, in the prosecution of their claim, which resulted in the treaty aforesaid. If such claims are based on written contracts, he is requested to state whether the contracts were made by the duly authorized representatives of the Cherokees, in their national or aggregate capacity, for the benefit of those who are made recipients by the treaty in all moneys arising out of the settlement of their claims. And also whether, within the knowledge of the department, such contracts have been fully and faithfully complied with, as far as practicable, by the other parties named in them. And that he will communicate the evidence upon which he bases his opinion, with any paper in possession of the department showing the extent of the services rendered, and the character of the claims that made against the moneys which may be awarded under the treaty of August 6, 1846.

LIGHT HOUSE BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House to the bill making appropriations for light-houses, light boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, the amendments of the House were concurred in, with the exception of the last amendment, and the House was duly notified of the fact.

Mr. LEWIS, of Alabama, was appointed on the Committee on Printing, in the place of Mr. BORLAND, during the recess.

The Senate then took up the bill to establish certain post routes, with the amendments reported thereto; and, after several amendments had been adopted—

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.

Mr. NILES moved to amend the bill, by inserting, as an additional section, the bill reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to reduce the rates of postage.

Mr. NILES explained that a bill had been received from the House of Representatives which made a greater reduction in the rates of postage than was proposed by this bill. The reductions in that bill embraced a variety of features, but in some points it was very objectionable. The bill now offered as an amendment, was simple in its provisions. If any objection was made to it, he would withdraw it. But as the session was approaching its close, and there would be no other opportunity to act on the subject, he would be gratified if the Senate would take a vote on the proposition.

Mr. BORLAND said he was opposed to the distinction made between the transportation of newspapers within a distance of thirty miles and those which were transported fifty or sixty miles. The clause, as it stands, would do very well for cities, and where the population was dense, but it would not answer at all in the remote parts of the country, where subscribers live a great distance apart.

Mr. DICKINSON proposed an amendment to allow the transportation of country papers to any distance, free of postage.

Mr. WESTCOTT desired to see all newspapers put on the same footing, whether city or country, and without regard to distances. He was opposed to partial benefits.

Mr. BENTON remarked, that you might travel in the West some hundred miles without coming to a town. He thought there was no equality in the bill as it stood, making as it did an invidious distinction.

Mr. CAMERON referred to the provision of the bill which allowed the newspapers to pass free in the country where they were published. The daily papers published in cities derived great advantages from the introduction of steam power. They made up their weekly papers from the daily, and circulated them with greater facility than was possessed by the country editors. He had an amendment prepared, which he thought would meet the case, so as to remove any objection.

The amendment was not submitted, as it was decided to be out of order at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. ALLEN said there would never be a law which did not operate more hardly on one than on another. He looked to the aggregate good which would be effected. He went on to speak of the condition of printers, who are proverbially poor. He never knew a rich printer. They work harder for nothing than any other class of persons. Their debts were, separately, small, though large in the aggregate, and are so scattered over the country that they can scarcely ever be collected. He thought this little boon granted to them should be willingly given.

Mr. DICKINSON also alluded to the power of the city papers to put down the country press. He thought his amendment would have the effect of sustaining the country papers.

Mr. DOUGLAS, at this stage, called for the special order, being the bill to establish a territorial government in Oregon, but the motion was not sustained.

Mr. NILES stated, that the entire exemption of papers from postage would diminish the compensation of the small postmasters, while it would add greatly to the burden of business thrown upon them. The tax of half a cent would enable the postmasters to defray the expense of putting up the papers and delivering them.

Mr. DOUGLAS renewed his call for the special order, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Baldwin, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dix, Dodge, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Miller, Phelps, Upham, and Webster—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Foote, Hamlin, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Louisiana, King, Mangum, Metcalfe, Niles, Pearce, Sebastian, Spruance, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, and Yulee—24.

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a Territorial Government in Oregon.

The question being on the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, to strike out, in page seventeen, line one, the words, "thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes," and inserting "forty-two;" and also the words, "usually known as the Missouri compromise"—

Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate. He admitted the propriety of the establishment of a territorial government in Oregon, and he was willing to vote for this bill as it came from the House. If amended as now proposed, he would not be able to vote for it. He recited the words of the section, and said, the amendment proposed gave a reason for the application of the principle of the ordinance of 1787 to the territory of Oregon. When a single reason was given for any act, it was intended to be inferred that there were no other reasons. The territory of Oregon was above the line of the Missouri compromise. His objection to slavery was irrespective of lines and points of latitude: it took in the whole country, and the whole question. He was opposed to it in every shape, and in every qualification; and was against any compromise of the question.

As to California and New Mexico, he said it was easy to foresee to what the acquisition of this territory would lead. He wished it were as easy to see that there would be a harmonious conclusion of the matter. He congratulated himself that he had taken no part in the late war, except to oppose its commencement with all his might, and at the close to oppose the treaty with all his might. He believed the war itself to be a calamity. He looked on the treaty by which it had been concluded as a calamity; and he greatly feared that the treaty would turn out to be the most permanent calamity.

Mr. BUTLER contended that the establishment of governments in the territories of California and New Mexico, ought to have been embraced in this Oregon bill. He disapproved of this policy of giving especial protection to the territories north of the Missouri line of compromise, and giving to the North all that valuable portion of the Union. The resolutions of the State of Virginia, which were referred to the other day by a Senator from that State, [Mr. MASON,] had been responded to by all the southern States of the Union. He thought that States should never pass resolutions until they were sure that the citizens would sustain them. He would tell the Senate what his advice to his constituents would be, to go to these new territories with arms in their hands; to go as armed communities, and take possession of the lands which they had helped to acquire, and see who would attempt to dispossess them. Would the military force of the United States shoot down the ploughman at his plough? So help him God, he would so advise his constituents, to take with them their property there, and settle at all hazards. If he was willing, had the compromise bill passed, to bow to it, and if the decision of the Supreme Court should have been adverse to his opinions, he would submit to it. But that bill had been not only rejected by the House of Representatives, but it had been treated with so little respect, that he felt it due to himself and to the South to let their position be well understood. He was opposed to the bill.

He had always opposed a war of conquest and aggrandizement, for he had foreseen that our triumphs would turn out to be apples of discord from which serious evils would result. He should now take his position, and let Congress make what laws they may, he would advise his constituents to assert their rights with arms in their hands, and take possession of the land. The subtleties and sophisms of the laws of nations would be feeble barriers to the spirit which would show itself in the South. He would go home and tell his constituents these views, and he trusted he had not so much infirmity as to shrink from carrying them into effect. Times and circumstances had changed the character of this bill for the establishment of a territory in Oregon from what it was two years ago. Then it was comparatively innocent; now he regarded it as a masked battery, from behind which the institutions of the South were to be assailed with a firm determination to subdue them. The South would not fear a contest. She was ready to meet her opponents in a fair and open manner, but she would rise indignant against these covert attacks. He was ready to embark in the boat with his State, and to trust it to the care of Heaven. So beautifully are the elements of our government arranged, that they scarcely require the agency of man to secure their harmonious and permanent progress. But the act of man could pervert and destroy these tendencies, and produce discord and confusion.

Mr. DOUGLAS, desiring to have the bill placed in a proper shape, would not make any remarks in this stage.

Mr. HALE then made some observations, referring to the history of the Texas annexation and the Oregon question in connection with it. At the time of passage of the Texas resolution, the Oregon question was introduced, and a motion was made to attach it to the Texas bill. The mover did not withdraw his motion, and the Oregon feature was sustained by a large majority. The two South Carolina Senators voted against the consideration of the bill in the Senate, and thus defeated it; and when he coupled this with a declaration of a South Carolina Representative in the House, that if the clause prohibiting the introduction of slavery in Oregon prevailed, it would be defeated in the Senate—when he put these facts together, they appeared to him to be indicative of an understood and concocted agreement. He spoke of the course of the Senator from South Carolina, and was about to remark on his manner, when—

Mr. BUTLER explained that the proceedings of the South Carolinians were marked as much by moderation and calmness as by determination.

Mr. HALE resumed. They were doubtless as much marked by moderation and calmness as was the course of their Senators here; and if this was moderation and calmness, he would like to know what was heat and intemperance. We are told that if we do not yield to their wishes, they will resist to blood.

Mr. BUTLER did not say that it would be so, but that he would give his advice to that effect.

Mr. HALE said, if the voice of the Senator went deep into the hearts of his constituents, he might produce much mischief.

Mr. UNDERWOOD withdrew his proposition to amend, as he perceived the sense of the Senate was against it.

The question then recurring on the amendment as reported to the committee—

Mr. CALHOUN said he should vote against the amendment because he regarded it as one [illegible] bigotry. Again, he opposed it because the North, except one [illegible] more determined to exclude the South than he was to resist such exclusion. He would be a fool [illegible] ern Senators were in maintaining theirs. A majority would always be able to carry their votes [illegible] a few from the majority, attempted to impose on the South restrictions which could not be submitted to.

This question, in his opinion, would never heal itself; it must go through, and the sooner it is met the better. He believed the question would never heal or be terminated here. In the body politic, as well as in the natural body, there are diseases which, if not timely checked, must end fatally. There is an impression here that slavery is [illegible]. That was the impression he had when he had resided some time in New England, and had then become convinced that it would lead to serious evils. How it came up here, he would not now stop to examine. [illegible] had assumed a consolidating tendency, and this has produced a perversion of feeling and of policy, of which the course now pursued in relation to the South is one of the effects. The country is now agitated throughout; and there are political circumstances which will prevent this excitement from dying out. The conviction that the sinfulness of slavery in the North will keep this excitement from subsiding.

He then adverted to the influence of this question on the pending Presidential election, and the effects it must exert on the vote of the South. Each party will try to keep this question separate, to keep the people in [illegible] and to suppress the discussion. The effect might result in injury. He intimated that the South must naturally incline to yield to the North; and touched upon the suggestions made by southern delegations as to the course to be pursued to put down abolition. A difference of opinion arising between the members, the course adopted by the House on the reception of abolition petitions had led to constant discord and uproar, while in the Senate only one petition on the subject had ever been presented there without the question of reception being called.

He referred to the insurrections of the slaves in the West India Islands; and the same spirit, though suppressed, exists here. He dreaded the result which would follow, if the same spirit which now animated the North should continue to grow and spread. He feared that the effect of this growing spirit was felt in the Senate, where the compromise bill was introduced and passed, [illegible] it was rejected in the House, and this bill relating to Oregon came here, not one of those northern Senators who were friendly to that compromise ventured to move an amendment by attaching the compromise bill to this Oregon bill. He referred to the positions taken by the South and the North on the slave question. The latter had been unable to meet the arguments of the southern Senators, and turned out of the direct course to discuss the question of the extension of territory, which was not connected with the subject, and was not advocated by a single representation from his State. He would now tell the people of the South that they can never settle this question until they take it into own their hands. It was unnecessary for him to assert now his regard for the Union. His whole life was sufficiently known. His time, his mind, and all his energies had been given to it; and he made a solemn appeal to the Senate not, by their own hands, to destroy this glorious fabric of our constitution. He believed, if the great struggle should come, the calamity will not fall the heaviest on the South. In the North the divisions were so numerous as to keep the people distracted and disunited, while in the South all are united. He admitted that the South was poor in comparison with the North; but if slavery had impoverished the South, had it impoverished the North? Slavery had benefited all mankind—all countries but the South. Slavery, like the waters of the Nile, had spread its fertilizing influences over all the world. It had benefited all but the southern planter, who had been the tutor, the friend, as well as the master, of the slave, and had raised him up to civilization. And the South had made great concessions to the North for the purpose of cementing the Union.

Mr. MANGUM said he should vote for the amendment, because he regarded it as a modification; but whether it prevailed or not, he should vote against the bill.

Mr. NILES said the whole course of the South had in view the extension of slavery. He denied that the South had been weakened, and compelled to make concessions to the North. The compromise bill was no concession of the South, even in the opinions of southern men themselves, and certainly it was not so in the general estimation of the country. He complained that the Senator from South Carolina had traced the present crisis to a wrong cause, when he attributed it to the abolitionists of the North. The real fact is, that it springs from the opposition made by the free States to the southern policy of extending the institution of slavery over the new territories. This is resisted by the free States, and they are prepared to resist it to the last. They think the slave power strong enough, and they will oppose every effort to extend slavery over the continent. The movement of the North was forced upon them, by the attempt to mix up this slavery question with the politics of the country. It had been given out by the South that no candidate for the Presidency should be supported there who did not pledge himself against the Wilmot proviso.

Now, when this course was taken it was incumbent on the North to make a counteracting movement.

Mr. BUTLER said the South did not take this course until ten of the northern States had pledged themselves in the opposite manner.

Mr. NILES observed that [illegible] was true. But here was the distinction: the northern States merely asserted their opinions as a principle, while the South threw up their pledge by an awful threat of nullification if their wishes are not complied with. The Senator from South Carolina had spoken of his attachment to the Union, and declared he would make a struggle to preserve it; and then he said they must take the matter into their own hands—meaning the slaveholders. They were to take charge of the Union. He preferred doing it in the usual way, through the legitimate medium, and this he presumed would be the general impression. He had no fears for the Union. It has strength enough to resist any collisions. The question, if not settled by Congress, will finally settle itself. He would vote against the proposition.

Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. NILES mutually explained on the subject of the existence of slavery in Texas at the time of annexation.

Mr. METCALFE then expressed his intention to vote for the bill, whether it contained the compromise or not. He stated, that like the Senator from Massachusetts, he was [illegible] opposed to the war, and if he did not oppose the treaty, forsooth, it was because it was the best he could do—bad enough, it is true—but there was no alternative. He thought it would now be the best thing we could do, if we could give back the whole of this new territory, and take again our fifteen or eighteen millions which we have to pay for it. Kentucky, while she stretched out one arm to the North, would not withdraw her other hand from the South. She thought the South was not in the right; but he believed that the North would, in the hour of need, act generously; and that the Union would not be endangered. The honorable Senator, who had uttered once the noble sentiment—"Union now and forever"—would himself stand by the South in the time of need; and he did not believe that the South would take the matter into their hands. He said the sons of the South came into Kentucky and stole away their daughters and cousins, and Kentucky sent her boys, by way of retaliation, to steal the southern girls; and while this game was fairly played, it was idle to talk of disunion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, took some remarks in reply to what had fallen from the Senator from Massachusetts, in the course of which he stated, that if the North had come to a fixed determination to prevent the South by legislation from carrying their slaves into the new territories, the States could remain together no longer. This he stated, not as his individual opinion, but as the sentiment of the South. He believed in the existence of the power in Congress to pass a law to prohibit slavery, and if such a law were presented to the Supreme Court for a decision on its constitutionality, it would be in favor of the law. On the judicial question, the decision would be against the protection of the South.

In reference to the annexation of Texas, he stated that it was advocated by Senators from the northern States as advantageous to the North on account of the market which it would open for their manufactures; and he adverted to the fact that some of the Senators had been induced to vote for it by the promise of the President, that he would act upon the alternative proposition.

He had voted for the compromise bill, because he thought it the only mode of settling the question.

Mr. WEBSTER said he only spoke for himself—he did not speak for the North. He did not know what the North is, or where the North is. He had been among the earliest to oppose acquisition of foreign territory. He referred to the speech of Lord Erskine—that the best way to avoid any domestic disputes and difficulties, was to avoid the occasion for them; and said, that in accordance with this maxim, he (Mr. W.) had always opposed the acquisition of foreign territory. There were wiser heads than Lord Bacon's now. There are persons who will propose plans, and certainly will meet them and adopt circumstances, as they may arise. He then referred to the course of the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, and went on to show that there was no constitutional authority for the acquisition of foreign territory, and that no one had pretended to show any constitutional warrant for the power exercised by Congress, without the consent of the States, to make laws for territories which never came within the constitution of the constitution or its framers. He enumerated the difficulties in which this acquisition of territory had plunged us. He was not apprehensive of any disunion. He never contemplated its possibility. He was not one of those who accustom themselves to speak of such a contingency. An earthquake may come, a volcano may burst forth; but human foresight can do nothing to prevent such calamities. So the dissolution of the Union is among those possible calamities; but what could human wisdom do to further, in advance of it, the happiness of the human race? He believed there was a disposition everywhere to support the Union, and that five out of six of our citizens would be glad to give back the new territories we have acquired.

Mr. BERRIEN made a few remarks, for the purpose of indicating the Senator from Massachusetts to review his legal opinion as to the absence of all power in the constitution for the acquisition of foreign territory. He assigned the reasons which induced him to differ from these opinions.

Mr. FOOTE said he rose for the purpose of putting an end to the debate. He saw no probability of proper deliberation being given to this bill at this late period of the session. Several amendments had been offered, among them, one of his own, and several Senators were very anxious to be heard on this subject. He did not see any possibility of deciding the question at this session. He admitted the pressing occasion for the establishment of a government in Oregon; but he thought, that as it was so short an interval until the next session, no great injury could result from the delay. He moved to lay the bill upon the table, but withdrew it, on the pledge that it would be renewed by Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, who said that the South honestly held the opinion that Congress has no power to prohibit slavery. He believed the contrary opinion was entertained with equal honesty in the North. If the North, having the majority, insist on exercising the power, what can follow but the degradation of the South, or the dissolution of the Union? The only remedy was a just and honorable compromise. If the Missouri compromise was offered to the South in the spirit in which it was offered in 1820, she would accept it. He desired to know from the chairman of the Committee on Territories whether the Missouri compromise in the bill was tendered in the spirit in which it was offered in 1820?

Mr. DOUGLAS replied in the affirmative. He made a few remarks in explanation of his own course. He gave his own opinion in the affirmative, but said that was not the understanding of the committee.

Mr. FOOTE renewed his motion to lay the bill on the table

The Senate then took a recess until half-past five o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The question pending when the Senate took a recess was the motion of Mr. FOOTE to lay the Oregon bill on the table. The question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative: yeas, 15, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Benton, Bodfish, Butler, Foote, Hunter, Johnson of Georgia, King, Lewis, Pearce, Sebastian, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Baldwin, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Downs, Dreer, Fairfield, George, Hale, Hamlin, Hannegan, Huntington, Jarnagin, of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Mangum, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Pierce, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, Walker, and Webster—36.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, read the following amendment, which he proposed to offer, and which he explained in a few words. He subsequently declined to offer it:

For the following section:

"And it is further enacted, That all that portion of territory delineated as California, on Arrowsmith's map of Texas, Oregon, and California, and also that portion of New Mexico, on Disturnell's map of Mexico, a copy of which map was published in the city of Washington in the year 1847, lying south of the line of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, commonly known as Missouri compromise line, and which extends from the western boundary of the State of Missouri to the Pacific ocean, shall be, and is hereby, declared to be forever free; and that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except for the punishment of crimes, shall ever exist in any part of said territory."

Mr. DOWNS proposed the following as an amendment, but subsequently withdrew it, after some remarks:

Add to the bill, and as a part of the bill, S. 324, to establish the Territorial government of California, and New Mexico, etc. the twentieth section, with the following amendments:

Page eleven, second line, after the word "and," strike out the words "called Upper California," and insert the words "lying south of the seventh line, called "lying north of the thirty-sixth degree of north latitude."

Page eleven, fourth line, after the word "and," strike out the words "or respecting slaves," and insert in lieu of them "and in said Territory slavery or involuntary servitude, except for crimes, shall be prohibited."

Page eleven, same section twenty-eighth line, after strike out the words "called New Mexico," and insert the words "lying south of the thirty-sixth degree of north latitude, commonly known as the Missouri compromise line."

Page eleven, same section twenty-eighth line, after strike out the words "or respecting slaves," and insert in lieu of them "and in said Territory slavery or involuntary servitude, except for crimes, shall be prohibited."

Page eleven, same section twenty-eighth line, after strike out the words "and the said Territory of New Mexico shall not be entitled to admission under the provisions of this act until it shall contain the requisite number of inhabitants for one representative in the Congress of the United States."

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Committee on the Territories to insert the words: "That inasmuch as the said territory is north of the parallel of 36° 30′ of north latitude, usually known as the Missouri compromise," &c., with the understanding that in case the above amendment of the committee should be voted down, the question should be taken on the amendment sent to the Chair by Mr. DOUGLAS, embracing the Missouri compromise.

The yeas and nays having been called, the question was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bagby, Breese, Calhoun, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Berrien, Bedland, Bradbury, Breese, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Downs, Dreer, Fairfield, Foote, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Hannegan, Huntington, Jarnagin, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Walker, Webster and Westcott—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Badger, Bagby, Benton, Bodfish, Dickinson, Dix, Fairfield, Foote, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Hannegan, Huntington, Jarnagin, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Walker, Webster and Westcott—22.

The question was then taken on the amendment embracing the Missouri compromise, and it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benton, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Davis of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge of Iowa, Fitzgerald, Foot, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Jarnagin, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Pearce, Sebastian, Semple, Simmons, Sturgeon, Turney, and Yulee—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atherton, Jefferson Davis, Dayton, Dix, Dodge of Wisconsin, Evans, Greene, Huntington, Miller, Niles, Phelps, Upham, Walker, and Woodbridge—17.

The other amendments of the committee, striking out the limitation on the mileage of the delegate, and inserting "Puget's Sound" instead of "Nisqually," were adopted.

The question was about to be taken on the engrossment, when—

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the bill which had passed the Senate and been laid on the table by the House; but, on the urgent appeal of Messrs. Benton, Mangum, and other Senators round him he withdrew it.

And the question was then taken on the engrossment and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benton, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Davis of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge of Iowa, Dodge of Wisconsin, Foot, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Jarnagin, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Pearce, Sebastian, Semple, Simmons, Sturgeon, Turney, and Yulee—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atherton, Jefferson Davis, Dayton, Dix, Evans, Greene, Huntington, Miller, Niles, Phelps, Upham, Walker, Woodbridge, and Woodbury—17.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 11, 1848.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore, laid before the Senate a communication from B. Marshall, and other delegates of the Creek Indians, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, relative to the investment by the United States, of certain moneys appropriated for their benefit; which was laid on the table.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was Resolved, That the petition of George Perkins, together with the report of the committee to whom it was referred and all the documents accompanying it, be referred to the Secretary of War for his action thereon.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

By Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims: Referring the papers of the representatives of Robert Carter to the First, Second, and Third Auditors of the Treasury, to examine and report at the next session.

By Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on Patents: An act to provide for applications for the renewal of patent rights in certain cases, with an amendment.

Mr. WESTCOTT asked to have the bill considered at once, as it would enable the commissioner to decide on all the cases except one.

Mr. DAVIS opposed the taking up of the bill, as it must give rise to discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of a bundle of petitions which he sent to the chair, but did not name.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. FELCH submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, under the direction of the committee to audit and control the same, to each of the officers, clerks, messengers, excepting the acting postmasters and mail carriers, pages, and laborers, in the service of the Senate, the same amounts respectively that were paid them under a resolution of the Senate at the last long session.

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid, in like manner, to the librarian, assistant librarian, and messenger of the Congressional Library, and to the clerks of the committees of the Senate, each, the same amounts as were last allowed them by resolution of the Senate.

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid, as above, to the acting postmaster and each of the mail carriers of the Senate the sum of $500, and to each of the boys assisting the mail carriers $100, to the western gate keeper $100, and to Sylvester Gray and Lloyd Wallace, each, the sum of $50.

Mr. TURNEY moved to amend the resolution by inserting "to each of the capitol police $200, or as much thereof as with any allowance made by the House of Representatives, will amount to $200."

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and agreed to.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS,

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid to James Morton, Noah Hanson, the sum of sixty cents per day, to be paid to the other messengers of the Senate, commencing with the present session.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT,

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid to Messrs. Wright and Ramsay $100 each, for services rendered the Judiciary Committee of the Senate at this session, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON: the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House to the civil and diplomatic bill. The Senate then insisted on its amendments, and disagreed to those of the House; and a committee of conference was appointed.

REPORTING AND PRINTING.

Mr. BADGER moved to proceed to the consideration of the resolution relating to the printing of the debates in Congress. The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That in order to secure a more full, impartial, and prompt publication of the proceedings and debates of the Senate, the Secretary of the Senate be and he is hereby authorized and directed to enter into a contract, to take effect from this day, with the proprietors of each of the daily papers in this city, the National Intelligencer and the Union, and to continue until otherwise ordered by the Senate, for the daily publication, in each paper of all the debates and proceedings of the Senate, and for the early subsequent publication of such speeches as members may choose more carefully to revise and write out at full length, for which the Secretary is authorized to make weekly payment at the rate of seven dollars and fifty cents for a column of brevier type: Provided, That the proceedings and current debates be transferred to the country edition of said papers, and one copy of the daily edition of each paper shall be furnished to each member during the session without additional charge.

Mr. BADGER moved so to amend the resolution, as to make it take effect from the commencement of the next session.

Mr. BENTON was surprised that an amendment should be offered after so much delay. Some days had elapsed, and it had now become too late in the session for discussion of amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, expressed himself favorable to the resolution as reported. He thought the amendment was injudicious. As to the official reports, he was satisfied that they had not answered the purpose proposed; not from any fault of the reporter, but owing to the inadequacy of the compensation. The contract was for the whole Congress—$12,000 for the long session, and $6,000 for the short one. The additional $2,500 was for three hundred and fifty copies of the reports, to be given to the members of the House. He was anxious to do no injustice to the reporter, who calculated on greater profit from the short session than he had obtained through the long one. He presumed it was not intended to do any injustice.

Mr. HALE vindicated the official reporter against the charge of utter failure. The failure was owing to the inadequacy of the compensation. He was in the habit of reading the reports of other speeches than his own.

Mr. BADGER was compelled to acknowledge that the judgment of the Senator from Missouri relative to this plan of reporting had been verified by the result. But the failure was not attributable to the reporter, but to the insufficiency of the means at his disposal. So far as accurateness, politeness of demeanor, and a courteous disposition to accommodate Senators are concerned, the reporter had been all that could be desired; and he hoped no imputation would rest on him. He would now withdraw his amendment.

Mr. FOOTE concurred in what had been so gracefully and forcibly expressed by the Senator from North Carolina in favor of the reporter. He had been in the habit of association with that gentleman by night and day, and he could not consent that he should be discharged from the service of the Senate, impoverished by his labors, which had been so arduous as to have frequently broken down his health. One of the reasons of the delay in the publication of the reports was the clearness felt by Senators as to their reputation, which induced them to revise their speeches before they permitted them to be sent out to the world.

Mr. BENTON admitted the impossibility of any accuracy of report, when Senators could not understand each other.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved to amend the resolution, by inserting a provision, that a compensation of $2,500 be granted to the reporter, as a compensation, on the relinquishment of his contract; which was agreed to.

Mr. KING remarked on the difficulties which stood in the way of correct reporting. He believed that no system could be adopted which would give universal satisfaction. There would be complaints before the expiration of a single year. He thought we had better return to the old system, by which running reports were circulated throughout the country, and if they sometimes did injustice, they were, on the whole, materially wrong. He would move to strike out the part of the resolution which provides for the publication of written, revised speeches. There should be sworn reporters.

Mr. BENTON reminded the Senator from Alabama, that this new plan would be under the daily control of the Senate. As to the revision of speeches, it was a practice of long standing. These speeches were published in the districts to which the gentlemen belonged; and, if they were of public importance, they found their way into other papers. As to the writing out of speeches, he wished he could have the opportunity to write out all his speeches—to revise, chastise, punish them. The true as well as the customary mode of reporting was not literal, but historical—using the third person, not the first. He was against swearing. How could reporters be sworn to report correct speeches, when Senators themselves could not hear each other?

Mr. KING explained, that a suggestion was formerly made to change the usual mode of reporting, and to employ sworn reporters. He stated what was the practice in the British Parliament, where reporters succeeded each other, and sent their reports to the printing office as the speaking was going on. No reporter can take down every word, even when the Senate is in order; when it is not in order—and he regretted that it was now more disorderly than he had ever known it to be—it was impossible to come near it. He hoped the clause to which he had objected would be stricken out, and then he would not make any strenuous objection to the resolution.

Mr. HANNEGAN testified in favor of the talents and politeness of the reporter, while he was in favor of the resolution as it had been amended.

Mr. ALLEN said, that a correct system of reporting was very desirable, and he knew no better plan than had been suggested by the committee. He desired to amend, by introducing a provision that the Journal of the Senate should be published at the end of every week, which would give the debates, the yeas and nays, and proceedings on all great private claims. Two reporters are not sufficient to give reports of all that is said here. If you take enough of fluent, you may have every word reported. In England, no reporter takes more than twenty minutes, when he goes out and corrects his reports while it is fresh in his mind, and hands it to the printer, while another reporter takes his place. No reporter can report more than twenty minutes. He belived that in this Senate there was a more correct delivery than in the British House of Lords.

Mr. BENTON hoped the Senator would add to his proposition a provision striking out all the rest of the resolution.

The amendment offered by Mr. KING was negatived.

Mr. ALLEN's amendment was negatived.

Mr. WESTCOTT was, he said, against the resolution, and would call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken, the resolution was adopted: Yeas 37, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Clarke, Cowan, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Dutton, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Greene, Hamlin, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Sprague, Underwood, Upham, and Yulee—37.

NAYS.—Messrs. Borland, Breese, Davis, of Mississippi, Hunter, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Walker, and Westcott—9.

MAIL POST ROUTES.

On motion by Mr. NILES, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the House bill to establish certain post routes, the amendment pending being that of Mr. NILES, in the following words:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of October next, the postage on newspapers and other printed matter shall be as follows, viz: newspapers, pamphlets, magazines, and books, whether periodical or not, not exceeding one ounce in weight, shall be charged with one cent postage, and a like sum for every additional ounce, or fractional part thereof, amounting to a half ounce: Provided, That newspapers, not exceeding one ounce in weight, and not sent over fifty miles from the office of publication, shall be charged with one half cent postage; and on all newspapers not sent from the office of publication the postage must be prepaid one cent: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall take away the right of publishers to receive newspapers in exchange, free of postage; and the like privilege of exchange shall be extended to other periodicals: And provided further, That newspapers, not exceeding five hundred square inches, and sent in bundles weighing four ounces or more, and directed to one person only, shall be charged with postage at the rate of one cent per ounce. And the same franking privilege enjoyed by members of Congress shall be extended to the heads of departments and the ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Mr. DICKINSON moved to add the following proviso, to come in after the word prepaid:

Provided, That all newspapers which are published weekly may be sent free of distance within fifty miles, or throughout the country where printed, free of postage.

Mr. DICKINSON asked the yeas and nays on the amendment, which provides that newspapers shall be transported free within thirty miles.

Mr. BORLAND restated his objections to the amendment, because it would not benefit the sparsely peopled districts of the West.

Mr. DICKINSON replied that were we to legislate from this time till doomsday, it would be impossible to put the West on the same footing of convenience with the large cities and densely peopled regions.

Mr. CAMERON advocated the amendment as beneficial to the publishers of the small country papers.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, was against the amendment, if it diminished the compensation to postmasters.

Mr. DICKINSON said its effect in reference to the compensation would be very trifling.

Messrs. JOHNSON, DOWNS, FOOTE, NILES, and DICKINSON, make some brief remarks, when Mr. DICKINSON modified his amendment so as to read "fifty miles."

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Borland, Bright, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Dickinson, Dodge, Downs, Felch, Foote, Greene, Hale, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, King, Mason, Miller, Phelps, Spruance, Turney, Upham, and Walker—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Hamlin, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Metcalfe, Niles, Pearce, Sebastian, Underwood, Westcott, and Yulee—14.

Mr. WESTCOTT moved to strike out and insert, that newspapers published weekly shall be transmitted free of postage through the State in which they are published.

The motion being declared out of order—

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from New York had been agreed to, but the motion was withdrawn.

The question was then taken on the amendment as amended, and the result was as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Baldwin, Bright, Cameron, Clarke, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Miller, Niles, Phelps, Sprunce, Sturgeon, Upham, and Walker. —24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bradbury, Butler, Calhoun, Corwin, Davis, of Mass., Davis, of Miss., Hamlin, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Pearce, Sebastian, Turney, Underwood, Westcott, and Yulee—24.

Mr. DICKINSON then moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was lost; and after some remarks—

Mr. HALE moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; and the yeas and nays having been demanded, the vote stood for laying the motion on the table as follows:

YEAS—Mr. [illegible] of Massachusetts, Dodge, Dutton, Dayton, Hamlin, Johnson of Georgia, King, Sebastian, Spruance, Underwood, Walker, [illegible] of New York—[illegible].

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Borland, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Greene, Hale, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Sturgeon, Upham, Westcott, and Yulee—[illegible].

Mr. WESTCOTT then renewed the clause just rejected with the following proviso:

Provided, That [illegible] in the State [illegible].

Mr. HAMLIN opposed the motion as [illegible] on the press.

Mr. WESTCOTT vindicated his motion, on the ground that papers which were taken within the State are taken for the business information.

Mr. CAMERON was opposed to the amendment, [illegible] took in the weekly papers published in the cities, which are made up from the daily.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and after a few words from Mr. WESTCOTT and Mr. NILES, the question was taken and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Benton, Berrien, Borland, Breese, Calhoun, Dodge, Dougtas, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Hale, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson of Georgia, Lewis, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Walker, and Westcott—[illegible].

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Bell, Bright, Butler, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Foote, Greene, Hamlin, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, and Sturgeon—[illegible].

An amendment was offered by Mr. YULEE, the effect of which was to take away the discretionary power from the Postmaster General; and after some considerable debate, in which Messrs. YULEE, BRIGHT, NILES, and others, participated, the question was taken and decided in the negative.

Mr. NILES then moved to amend the bill by inserting the following:

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General is authorized to advance to the [illegible] Steamship Company, [illegible] $25,000 per month, to enable the company to complete the steamship Franklin, now building, [illegible] and to put her on the line [illegible] as soon as she is completed; and that the sum [illegible] be appropriated from the proceeds of the mail service [illegible] the mails to Spain, France, and Belgium, [illegible] That the whole sum advanced and [illegible] That said company shall [illegible] make an arrangement with the [illegible] with the Franklin, to Havre, in France, and the company to run [illegible] Bremen.

This led to some considerable debate, in which Messrs. DICKINSON, DIX, BRADBURY, ALLEN, NILES, and others, participated; when the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bradbury, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dix, Downs, Foote, Hale, Hamlin, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Miller, Niles, Pearce, and Sturgeon—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Berrien, Borland, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dodge, Dutton, Fitzgerald, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, King, Lewis, Mason, Metcalfe, Phelps, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Walker, and Westcott—30.

Mr. BORLAND moved an amendment, authorizing the Postmaster General to make a contract for a mail steamer down the Mississippi; which was negatived.

Mr. PEARCE moved to amend the bill, by inserting a provision to pay J. B. Sullivan a claim for work done for the Post Office Department, which was agreed to.

Mr. PEARCE moved an amendment for the payment of J. L. Graham, late postmaster of New York, for expenses [illegible] him; which was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE moved to amend the bill by inserting a clause rendering it imperative on the Postmaster General to let the different post routes in this bill, and those heretofore ordered by different acts, at the next letting after the passage of this act. Heretofore he has exercised a discretion on this subject, denying the right of Congress to take it from him, as to the propriety of establishing the routes specified in the legislative acts.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then took a recess until six o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. HALE moved to take up the bill to regulate appeals from the trial of issues in the district of Columbia; the passage of which was, he said, absolutely necessary to enable the people of this District to obtain justice.

Mr. BADGER thought it better, he said, to leave the matter as it was.

Mr. BUTLER advocated the motion to take up the bill. When issues were sent down from the chancery and orphans' courts, the decision of the circuit court was final. There was no appeal. He was anxious about the matter.

Mr. MASON asked if the motion was not to take up the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tem. said that was the motion; and that there was a bill now before the Senate, to wit: the bill to establish certain post routes.

The bill to establish certain post routes was then taken up; and it was, on motion, without any action, laid on the table for the present.

MEXICAN CLAIMS.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, the Senate took up, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to carry into effect certain stipulations of the treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico of the 2d day of February, 1848.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the first section, which was in these words:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, upon the presentation of the certificates issued to citizens of the United States for the sums awarded against the Republic of Mexico, under the act of September 1, 1841, entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act to carry into effect a convention between the United States and the Mexican Republic,'" and under the act to which the same was an addition, to ascertain the amount due on said certificates respectively, and to pay the amount so ascertained to be due to the parties legally entitled to receive the same, upon the surrender of said certificates to the Treasury Department.

Mr. B. said this was perfectly unnecessary, provision having been made by another bill.

After some conversation between Mr. BENTON, Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, and others, the motion to strike out was agreed to.

The second section was next read as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all claims of citizens of the United States against the Republic of Mexico, which were considered by the board of commissioners appointed under the convention of 11th April, 1839, and referred to the umpire, and which were not decided by him, but returned to the said board by the said umpire on the 25th February, 1842, shall be considered as adjudicated, and the sums awarded in favor of said claimants respectively, and reported to said umpire, together with interest on the same, as provided by said convention of 11th April, 1839, to be paid upon the final awards of said board, shall be paid to said claimants, or their legal representatives, respectively.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend this section, by adding thereto a proviso, as follows:

Provided, That this section shall be construed to provide for the payment only of such awards or parts of awards, without interest, as were concurred in by both American Commissioners on the part of the United States: And provided further, That the payments provided for by this section shall be made out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, bearing interest at six per cent. per annum, as the President may direct.

He said he desired to make the provision so plain that it could not be misunderstood. He entered into an explanation of the mode of proceeding by the commission, and the reason why the sum of $928,000, which was adjudicated by the commissioners, was not paid. He said this provision would cause the claimants to be paid whose claims had been adjudicated by the commissioners, and he argued that they should not again be required to go before another board to establish their claims.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, concurred with the honorable Senator from Missouri, that it would be exceedingly unjust to compel these claimants to go before another board and reproduce their proofs, particularly since very many of the proofs on which the pending claims were adjudicated had been taken away by the Mexican commissioners. He also wished to inquire whether this amount was to be paid out of the three and a quarter millions, or out of the treasury of the United States? He understood that it was proposed to be paid out of the treasury, and not to be a reduction of the three and a quarter millions.

Mr. BENTON replied that it was so. The proviso, as he had stated, was to prevent misunderstanding. These amounts, by the provision, would be paid out of the treasury, leaving the three and a quarter millions for the payment of claimants to be hereafter decided upon. And if the amount of the claims should exceed the three and a quarter millions, the distribution must be a pro rata one. There would be no difficulty in this case. This was not a case between the United States and a foreign country requiring an umpire, but between the United States and her own citizens, and the proviso was constructed with great care for the purpose of giving a protection against any injustice to the claimant.

Mr. BRADBURY reminded the Senate of the fact that the umpire, when he adjudicated other claims, made a reduction of 30 and 32 per cent.; and if these claims were to be paid with such a reduction, an inequality would exist, and these claimants would be placed in a better position by 30 or 32 per cent. than those on whose claims the umpire had acted. He also commented on the fact that interest was proposed to be paid on these claims, and added that he had hoped the three and a quarter millions would have covered the whole of the claims.

Mr. BENTON entered into further explanations. The question in relation to interest was one of amount merely. Owing to the delay which had taken place, claimants had been compelled to go into the money market, and raise means for their wants at exorbitant rates. He disclaimed any design on the part of the committee to do injustice to any of the claimants. There were cases in which neither the board nor the umpire deducted a single cent. Others were reduced a little; some were reduced one half, and others one-third; the average may have been a third. Some had one hundred per cent. taken off. He knew that in the claims now under discussion there would have been no deduction at all. The bill, he thought, was about perfect as it stands. It had passed the revision of a committee, and had received much consideration. As to the interest, it would be cruel to take it away from persons who could show their accounts, and prove that they had paid three times eight per cent. for money.

Mr. KING contended that the interest ought not to be allowed. He entered into a detail of the circumstances of the case, to show the ground on which he rested this opinion. If he had known nothing of these claims, the argument of the Senator from Missouri would have been sufficient to satisfy him that it would be most unjust to allow this interest. The American commissioners had clearly endeavored to make the amount due to American citizens as large as possible, and this was the cause of the deduction by the umpire. There had been no final decision, or it could not have become necessary to introduce this bill. As far as the awards were made by our commissioners, it would not look very well in us to refuse to pay them; but he saw no good reason for the payment of interest. The effect would be to deprive others of interest perhaps as justly due to them. He would not look behind the proceedings of our commission, although he might do so; but he should certainly oppose the payment of interest.

Mr. BENTON said this was a struggle for interest. He had heard of different beds—the bed of justice was one; and there was another bed made by a person whose name would present itself to every Senator, which was exactly four feet ten inches long; and to this everything stretched on it was to be curtailed. But this he deemed to be a worse scheme of reduction than that he had alluded to. Every claim, without regard to circumstances, was to be reduced to this four feet ten and a half inches, because the arbiter had deducted thirty-three per cent.

Mr. BRADBURY was of opinion that we could not do better than adopt the rule of deduction established by the commissioners. What other rule had we for our guide? If we adopt the decision of the board in other respects, why should we not do so in the case of the amount to be deducted? The arbiter was independent, and he had examined the cases, and had laid down the rule which had been referred to. If we take any other rule, we shall disregard the rule laid down by the arbiter. He thought we could not have a more correct or more reasonable rule than that of the board, corrected by the arbiter. He was not prepared to state correctly to what class these claims belong. If the claims are reduced in the same ratio as the deduction of the arbiter, and give eight per cent. interest, the amount of the claims would be between nine hundred thousand and a million dollars. If the claims were equal in justice to those passed on by the arbiter, there was no reason why the interest should be allowed. He did not desire to do any injustice to the claimants, and rather than send them back to another commission, he would be willing to give a larger amount.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved to amend the proviso by adding:

And said claims in all other respects shall be placed upon the same footing with the claims included in the 13th article of the treaty between the United States and Mexico, of the 2d of February, 1848.

Mr. CALHOUN called for the yeas and nays on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment of Mr. BENTON.

Mr. JOHNSON said he must vote against the amendment. It was based on the idea that these claims were to be placed on the same footing with those submitted by the board. The Senator from Alabama thought the claimants might consider themselves fortunate if they get their claims without interest.

Mr. KING said he wished to be understood. He had said that the umpire had scaled down the claims, and it was to be inferred that they were too high.

Mr. BENTON said the Senator from Alabama had used the word "scale" four times. Did he intend to say that to scale was to reduce?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BENTON replied it was not so. A scale was a long-tried instrument, which levelled off horizontally. The continental bills were scaled.

Mr. JOHNSON resumed his remarks in favor of the claims and interest. He argued that if the officers of the government had decided the amount to be due, there could be no propriety in our deciding that they are not due.

Mr. BADGER stated that the United States had, by treaty, discharged Mexico from all reponsibility, and we had assumed these claims to the amount of three and a quarter millions. He was opposed to the treaty, because he felt that we ought not to discharge another government from responsibility until we were prepared to pay these claims. He therefore desired to strike out the limitation of three and a quarter millions, because the total amount was unascertained. Between the claims which had been adjudicated, and such as had not been adjudicated, he could not see the smallest distinction. Should it turn out that the claims exceed in amount the three and a quarter millions, was that a reason why we should not pay them. If the claims were to reach five millions, we were as much bound to pay them as if they fell within the three and a quarter millions. He did not exactly understand the amendment of his friend from Maryland; but if it placed all on the same footing, he should not oppose it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was not willing to pay all these claims. He read the thirteenth article of the treaty, which specified claims already liquidated and decided against the United States. Now, these were all the claims which were then due. These claims under the award of the arbiter, which were not decided, were not embraced in this article of the treaty. The correctness of this view being admitted, as it was, by his friend from Maryland, he went on to show that there was no reason why these claims should be now allowed. It it was intended to give away this $300,000 out of the treasury, it was then a manifest, open gift. It did not, then, come within the claims chargeable on the three and a quarter millions. It was a sum in addition to the three and a quarter millions, and transcended by nearly a million the sum we are bound to pay by compact; and it is thus so much thrown away. It is proposed to pay $900,000 now, and postpone the other claims for two years. It is said that there are outstanding claims to the amount of six or six and a half millions; so that the three and a quarter millions will only pay fifty cents in the dollar; and no argument can do away with the injustice of paying a portion in full now, and a small portion of the residue at a future period.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, said he took a different view. He thought we were bound to pay all debts justly due. He was ready to vote for the payment in full of all these claims, whenever proof should be produced.

Mr. PHELPS said, we could not pay the whole of these debts in full. If we pay now a portion in full, we cannot pay in full those which will remain to be paid. If we assume that the $900,000 are to be deducted from the three and a quarter millions, and the rest must be a dividend, how can we pay the $900,000 until you ascertain what the pro rata dividend is? We cannot either pay these men out of the treasury, or leave them to take their pro rata. He saw no mode but to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, or to strike out from the bill the provision for payment of these claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD again referred to the treaty to show that we are only bound to pay the claims to an amount exceeding three and a quarter millions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, was of opinion that we were bound to pay the whole of the claims, without regard to the limitation of the treaty, even if they amounted to twenty millions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said, if that was the true view, he could wish to have an examination of the claims, and of the extent to which they go.

Mr. WESTCOTT reminded the Senate that he had moved to strike out this limitation when the treaty was under consideration. He desired to see our country holding the same stand that England had taken in the protection of her commerce and citizens. He should vote for the payment of all unliquidated claims, and would never sanction the idea that we used the claims of our citizens for speculative purposes in our negotiations with a foreign power.

Mr. CALHOUN said, the terms of the treaty were plain. It bound us to pay the claims of our citizens to the amount of three and a quarter millions. The unliquidated claims were to be settled to that amount. Out of what fund is this sum to be taken?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—Out of the Treasury.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Not out of the three and a quarter millions? Then it does not come within the terms of the treaty. We are not bound to pay it until it has come before another board.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Bal[illegible], Benton, Breese, Clarke, Dayton, Greene, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Phelps, Upham, and Westcott.—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Bright, Calhoun, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, of Iowa, Hannegan, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Niles, Sevier, Simmons, Spruance, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, and Woodbridge.—25.

Mr. BADGER moved to strike out the allowance of interest, but withdrew it on the suggestion that it was out of order. He then moved to insert the words "without interest"—ayes 25. So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALHOUN said the amendment of the Senator from Missouri was objectionable, because it made a distinction between one portion of unliquidated claims against another portion of similar claims. He should vote against the amendment to the section, and then against the section itself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD thought the best mode would be to vote for the amendment; and having thus put the section in the best form, to vote against that part of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri he opposed; and that was the part which required these claims to be submitted to two commissioners.

Mr. CALHOUN, that he might not embarrass, withdrew his call for the yeas and nays; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER moved to amend by striking out the words "together with interest on the same," which was decided in the affirmative—ayes 24.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, said, as the section now stood, he should vote for striking out the section. He had been informed, from a source in which he placed great reliance, that these claims had been submitted to the board, and that the papers were taken away by the Mexican commissioners; and if they were compelled to [illegible] The two United States commissioners had pronounced in favor of these claims. He therefore proposed to offer an amendment, that these claims are adjudicated, by striking out in the second section all after the words [illegible] paid as found to be due upon the same footing with the claims included in the thirteenth article of the treaty between the United States and the republic of Mexico, of the 2d February, 1848."

Mr. NILES was opposed to any new mode of settling and adjusting these claims, which might be productive of great injustice to either claimants. By deciding that these claims are adjudicated, we decide that all other claims are unliquidated.

Mr. ALLEN was of opinion, that if we go into the public treasury to pay these claims, there will no longer be any limit to them, and the treaty becomes a mere dead letter. By assuming the payment of these claims, to a limited extent, we interest every claimant to become vigilant in preventing fraud from another; because every one will argue, that the more there is given to another, the less will be his share.

Mr. DAYTON could not see the possibility of settling this matter so as to do justice to all. He did not think that we could now settle the matter. It had been decided that this $900,000 should not be paid out of the Treasury, and we must now wait to see what will be the pro rata. He could not assent to the views of the Senator from Maryland. It was probable that the papers—these vouchers which he said were taken away by the Mexican commissioners—may not these papers have been Mexican vouchers? If not, they may be recovered, as the treaty provides that such papers shall be given up when demanded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, remarked on the character of the tribunal to which these claims had been referred. Before this board, being a joint commission, it was perfectly natural that the Mexican commissioners would put the best face on Mexican claims, and the United States commissioners would do the same with reference to American claims. They were not, by the obligations imposed on them, precluded from doing this. He thought there should be a revision of these claims, and that they should be put on the same footing with other claimants. They could then be easily adjusted. We may then be bound to allow these claims.

The amendment was then negatived.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to strike out the second section, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being taken, was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Benton, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Corwin, Dix, of Massachusetts, Dodge, Dodge, Doty, Houston, Howe, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, King, Lewis, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Simmons, Spruance, Sturgeon, Upham, Underwood, Wales, and Woodbridge.—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bagby, Bell, Berrien, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, of New York, Fairfield, Greene, Hannegan, Mangum, Phelps, Sevier, Turney, Westcott, and Woodbury.—19.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, proposed to amend the bill so as to provide that the secretary of the commission be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and that the clerk be appointed by the board.

Mr. KING suggested that the board could accomplish their business with a secretary alone.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill and amendments were reported to the Senate. The question being on concurrence in the amendments, Mr. BALDWIN proposed to amend the bill.

Mr. B. thought, he said, there was much reason in the objections made to the recognition of the claims, under the second section, as adjudicated, because it would prevent the board from examining all the evidence upon which the claims rested. But there was great hardship in obliging the claimants to incur the expense of obtaining the evidence of their claims from Mexico, to which they have been sent back. The claims should be considered as adjudicated so far as to be prima facie evidence of their validity.

Mr. ALLEN and Mr. BERRIEN opposed the amendment. We had no reason to believe that duplicates had not been retained of all the vouchers, or that the Mexican government would not deliver them up.

Mr. BALDWIN offered an amendment accordingly, which was rejected.

The amendments were concurred in, and the bill was passed.

Mr. HALE offered a resolution (which lies over) for compensating James Moore for performing duties as carrier of the Senate.

POST ROUTES.

Mr. DICKINSON moved to take up the bill to establish certain post routes; which was agreed to.

Mr. ATCHISON moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which was supported by Mr. KING.

Mr. DOWNS, Mr. HOUSTON, and Mr. WESTCOTT opposed the motion.

Mr. DICKINSON made some remarks upon a portion of the bill which appeared to him to be very obscure.

Mr. NILES made some explanation as to the present state of the bill.

After some remarks on a question of order, the Senate, by reconsideration, reached the amendment given in a former part of the report respecting the rate of postage on newspapers.

Mr. DICKINSON moved an amendment to this amendment, striking out the words relative to the circulation, free of postage, of newspapers through the State, and substituting a provision for the free circulation of weekly newspapers within fifty miles from the place of their publication.

After some remarks from Mr. WESTCOTT, Mr. NILES, and Mr. BADGER, as to the expediency of the amendment adopted in relation to newspapers—

Mr. CALHOUN suggested that the Senate should be very careful not to embarrass the whole machinery of the Post Office Department. These provisions exempting newspapers from postage, might seriously affect the revenue.

Mr. DICKINSON's motion to strike out and insert was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment, as it was reported to the Senate, it was rejected.

The bill was then passed.

By consent, the message from the House asking a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the army appropriation bill was taken up, and a committee of conference was ordered.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business at half past ten o'clock, and at eleven o'clock adjourned.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 12, 1848.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating a report of the superintendent of standard weights and measures and balance.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE,

Ordered, That it be printed, and that five hundred copies, in addition to the usual number, be printed for the use of the superintendent.

Mr. PEARCE submitted a communication from Alexander Vattemare, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER moved that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill to revive and extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act to settle the title to certain tracts of land in the State of Arkansas," and asked a committee of conference, which was appointed by the Chair. The committee consists of Messrs. BUTLER, MASON, and HALE.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, the Senate concurred in the amendments of the House to the bill giving effect to certain treaty stipulations between this and foreign governments for the apprehension and delivery of certain offenders; which motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. CAMERON, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill from the House for the relief of William Pittman, and passed the same.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, the Senate receded from all its amendments to the House bill to establish certain post routes, which was agreed to.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the bill to authorize the draining of the Everglades in the State of Florida by said State, and to grant the same to said State for that purpose, without amendment, and accompanied by a written report, with documents; which were ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a resolution for the relief of the attorneys employed by the Choctaw reserves under the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, concluded the 15th of September, 1830; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BELL also asked to be discharged from the sundry memorials and resolutions referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, asked to be discharged from sundry petitions referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of sundry memorials, &c., referred to that committee.

Mr. MASON gave notice that he should move to take up the calendar at 11 o'clock.

The bill for the relief of Charity Harrington, as amended by the House, was taken up and concurred in.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved (the House of Representatives concurring), That the said resolution of the two Houses be suspended, so far as to permit the bill, now in the House of Representatives, to carry into effect certain stipulations of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, of the 2d day of February, 1848.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following joint resolution of thanks to Colonel Doniphan, his officers and men.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress are hereby tendered, presented to Colonel Doniphan, his officers and men, for the unsullied valor of the Sacramento, and the successful conduct of the perilous expedition to Chihuahua and thence to General Taylor's army; and that the President of the United States be requested to cause to be made a sword of the value of $300, with suitable inscriptions, to commemorate the honor of said victory and expedition.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following joint resolution; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be presented to Brigadier General Price, his officers and men, for the brilliant victory achieved by them at St. Cruz, in the State of Chihuahua, on the 16th day of March last; and that the President of the United States be requested to cause a sword of the value of $500, with suitable inscriptions, to be made and presented to General Price, in honor and commemoration of said victory.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the committee of conference on the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service, made a report; which was read.

Mr. YULEE asked that the consideration of the report be postponed until the seats of the absent Senators should be filled.

Mr. ATHERTON said he could not consent to a moment's delay. The committee on conference did not terminate its labors until 10 o'clock last night. It must be recollected that this bill had to be engrossed, and that there was but a small number of members.

The report was then concurred in.

THE OREGON BILL.

The bill to establish a territorial government in Oregon, as amended by the House of Representatives, was then taken up.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. DOUGLAS moved the appointment of a committee of conference.

Mr. KING said the proper motion was to insist, and then to ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. BENTON rose to make a motion which would supersede the other motion. He moved that the Senate recede from its amendment.

Mr. YULEE referred to the Manual, to show the first motion was to insist.

Mr. DAYTON suggested that the motion to recede was first in order, because, if it succeeded, it would prevent any committee of conference.

Mr. MASON asked if the motion to recede would appear on the Journal?

The CHAIR having replied in the affirmative—

Mr. MASON moved to lay the bill and amendments on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bagby, Benton, Cameron, Dix, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson of Maryland, Mangum, Miller, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Sevier, Spruance, Turney, Upham, Westcott, Whitcomb, Woodbridge—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Baldwin, Berrien, Bright, Butler, Clarke, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Douglas, Greene, Hale, Hunter, Johnson of Georgia, King, Mason, Phelps, Rusk, Simmons, Underwood, Upham, Webster—22.

Mr. BENTON renewed his motion to recede. This question had been a long time before the Senate. He had just ardently wished with an anxious desire to adopt some measure of conciliation. From the first he had been opposed to clogging Oregon with California. He wished to see Oregon go through by herself. When the subject was referred to a select committee of eight, a bill had been brought in, constructed for the purpose of conciliating different feelings. He had not approved of that bill; but he had always determined to vote for it. He had not impeded its progress by interposing a single word. He gave his vote for it, while he disapproved of it at the same time. Then there came up the adjustment on the parallel line of 36° 30'. He was extremely reluctant to go for that measure. Oregon was four hundred miles distant from the nearest, and nearly a thousand miles from the remotest point of California; and there was no rule which applied equally to both. Still he had voted for that bill, in order to put an end to the question; and on similar grounds he had given his vote for the Oregon bill. That bill had been sent to the House, and had been returned from the House with the Missouri compromise stricken out. The thought he had now done enough to secure conciliation and compromise. He had done enough when he consented to attach California to Oregon. Oregon was now in a deplorable condition. A few years ago we were ready to fight all the world to get possession of her, and now we are just as willing to throw her away as we were then to risk everything for her possession. She is left without a government, without laws, while at this moment she is engaged in a war with the Indians. There were twelve or fifteen thousand persons settled there who had claims on our protection. She was three thousand miles from the metropolitan seat of government. And yet, although she had set up a provisional government for herself, and this provisional government had taken on itself the enactment of laws, it is left to the will of every individual to determine for himself whether he will obey those laws or not. She has now reached a point beyond which she can exist no longer. She can work along no further, no longer. The war hereafter will not be between whites and Indians; it will be a conflict between whites and whites. It will become necessary that every dispute shall be settled by a resort to arms. And can this Senate satisfy itself that it will have performed its duty, while it sits with folded arms, and declines to do anything? It is a duty, a solemn obligation, enforced by the awful solemnity of our oaths, which we cannot avoid without a violation of that duty. If we refrain from extending the protection of this government to the people of Oregon, we violate these obligations. He held it to be our bounden duty to provide a government for Oregon; and he would not, so far as he was able, permit the bill to establish that government, by putting a weight of extraneous matter on it, to sink it down. Florida had been permitted to come into the Union, notwithstanding the slavery question.

Mr. YULEE said there was a warm and long opposition to it.

Mr. BENTON.—Florida was permitted to come in at once.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Florida was an applicant, year after year, from 1839 to 1845, before she was admitted.

Mr. BENTON.—Florida went through as a State. Not a single vote was given against the formation of her State government.

Mr. YULEE.—There was long discussion, and a strong vote against it.

Mr. BENTON.—She passed through as a State. The members from the non-slaveholding States could have stopped her if they had chosen, but they let her pass. Texas had also been admitted. And why was Oregon to be arrested in her application? If Congress should adjourn without establishing a government there, it might become a question with the President whether his duty would not require of him to convene Congress before the usual period. Mr. B. concluded with re-urging Congress to act on the bill now.

The CHAIR announced its decision, that the motion to recede takes precedence of the motion to insist and to ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. BERRIEN would not call in question the decision of the Chair. He made an appeal to the Senate not to let this last opportunity for conciliation pass away. He hoped the motion to recede would not prevail. The question involved the interests of the people of Oregon; and more than that, the harmony of the people of the United States. If this measure should not prevail, it will be taken as evidence that the government will hereafter rule the South with a rod of iron. He hoped a committee of conference would be granted, in order that gentlemen might compare opinions, in the hope of coming to some satisfactory conclusion. He trusted that this course would be pursued, in order that southern representatives might carry home the gratifying information that Congress was disposed to consult the feelings of their constituents. It was suggested by the Senator from Missouri, that the appointment of a committee of conference would be to transfer the power of Congress to a committee. He contended that if the establishment of a government in Oregon was impeded, it was by fastening on it this proviso in relation to a Territory where it is not needed. Does any man believe that slavery will ever exist in Oregon? And if not, how did the attaching of California to the bill clog and bear it down? He designated more in detail the position in which southern Senators were placed. He complimented the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] on the statesmanlike ground on which he had placed his opposition. In his course there was no demagoguism, no free-soil fallacy. But he regarded the view of that Senator, as to the three-fifths provision, as incorrect; and he went at some length into an explanation of his own opinions as to the intent of that provision, and concluded with a renewed appeal to the Senate not to recede.

Mr. MASON moved to postpone the further consideration of this bill, until half-past five, for the purpose of taking up the private calendar; and on this question he asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Berrien, Bochanl, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Downs, Foote, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Jones, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Baldwin, Bell, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Douglas, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Phelps, Spruance, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham, Walker, and Webster—34

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his apprehension that there was a fixed majority in this Senate and in the House opposed to any further trial at conciliation. Still he hoped the Senate would preserve a correct position, and vote for the appointment of a committee of conference. He might say, without any self-flattery, that he had all along foreseen this result. Let those who opposed the views of the South lay their cause before the country, and defend it as they could. The great strife between the North and the South is ended. The North is determined to exclude the property of the slaveholder, and of course the slaveholder himself, from its territory. On this point there seems to be no division in the North. In the South he regretted to say, there was some division of sentiment. The effect of this determination of the North was to convert all the southern population into slaves; and he would never consent to entail that disgrace on his posterity. He denounced any southern man who would not take the same course. Gentlemen were greatly mistaken if they supposed the Presidential question in the South would override this more important one. The separation of the North and the South is completed. The South has now a most solemn obligation to perform—to herself—to the constitution—to the Union. She is bound to come to a decision not to permit this to go on any further, but to show that, dearly as she prizes the Union, there are questions which she regards as of greater importance than the Union. She is bound to fulfil her obligations as she may best understand them. This is not a question of territorial government, but a question involving the continuance of the Union. Perhaps it was better that this question should come to an end, in order that some new point should be taken.

He had given what he deemed a clear constitutional vote on the compromise bill. He had also voted for the introduction of the Missouri compromise into this bill; although he could not constitutionally vote for the bill, which he regarded as artificial. Gentlemen may do with this bill as they please. If they will not give now what the South asks as a compromise, she will, at the next session, demand all, and will not be satisfied with anything less.

Mr. BELL said, he was a southern Senator, and deeply involved in southern interests; but he must have greatly mistaken his true course if the arguments to which he had listened were correct. There were wiser heads than his; but still, in the vote which he should give, he must conform to his own judgment. He believed that the Senator from South Carolina, and those who concurred with him, had placed the South in a wrong position, when they assumed that, by the decision of this question, the die would be cast, and the issue must now be made which involves the dissolution of the Union. He contended that this issue was prematurely made when it was made on the Oregon bill. If we are to quarrel with the North, let us be sure that in all respects our ground of dispute is tenable for us. The vote of the House has been cited here as evidence that this issue could no longer be avoided. He came to no such conclusion. He knew and felt the influence of too many sympathies with the North. Until a vote of Congress should, on the subject of the southern territories, actually separate the Union, he never would believe that such a vote could be given. As to this question, he had voted against laying this bill on the table, and against its postponement, because he desired to give his southern friends no opportunity of having a committee of conference, from which he expected nothing favorable.

Mr. WESTCOTT and Mr. DOWNS explained their votes on the question to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. BELL resumed. He would vote against receding, and would then vote to insist, although he did not expect any good from a conference. He desired to see the Oregon bill passed, even without this restriction; and he could not use it as a means of attack on gentlemen. Whether he could vote for it himself was doubtful, regarding as he did the feelings of the friends with whom he was associated. He controverted the doctrine, that even if the whole country, North and South, was opposed to slavery, Congress had no power to legislate on the subject. He thought the Missouri compromise had settled that point. He repeated, in conclusion, his conviction that the making up of the issue at this time was premature. When the whole question as to the territories of California and New Mexico should come up, it would be time enough to tender the issue.

Mr. TURNEY thought the whole question was involved in the question now under consideration. He hoped the committee would be allowed. When had such a committee failed to agree? When had any bill been lost, which had been referred to a committee of conference? To test the sense of the Senate, he would move to lay the motion of the Senator from Missouri on the table.

The CHAIR deciding that that motion would carry the bill with it—

Mr. TURNEY withdrew his motion.

Mr. BUTLER said that he voted for laying the bill on the table, because, after the declaration of the Senator from Missouri, that the reference to a committee of conference would be a transfer of the power of the Senate, he thought it would be better to leave Oregon without a government for the present than pass the bill in such a shape as would provoke the consequences which must follow. He thought the views of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr BELL] were not correct, and it appeared very unlikely that any issue could probably ensue which would suit the taste of that Senator. He thought little of any dangers which would threaten the Union from any consequences which could arise from the extension of our country, in comparison with those which must follow the rejection of this last effort of compromise. He could not coincide in opinion with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] that there was nothing in the constitution touching the government of new territories obtained by a power resulting from war. There were many things prohibited by the constitution which could not be done in a new territory any more than in any other territory. He concluded by stating, that we had given by this bill to Oregon a legislature, a governor, and everything usually included in bills of this kind; and was it to be supposed, that if this feature were stricken out, Oregon could not exist under its government? The idea of the Senator from Tennessee, that the issue could not be made until the decision of Congress on the California question, he repudiated, because there was no probability that such issue would be made at present. The next issue would be the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and in the forts and arsenals. He believed that in a few years an amendment of the constitution would be made, which would still further prostrate the power and interests of the South. The opposition to the Amistad appropriation had been sustained by arguments such as he had never before this session heard from any lips. The situation of the South Atlantic States ought to induce us to pause. We had gone through a war, and the fruits of victory are held up, but these fruits the South is not permitted to touch.

Mr. HOUSTON wished to make his position known, not only on this continent, but that it should be blazoned forth to the world. He believed that the crisis so much spoken of had come. Texas was peculiarly situated. The line of 36° 30' divides her territory. North of that, slavery is prohibited; south of it, slavery may or may not exist, as she may select. Texas had entered the Union on this condition, and she was willing to adhere to that condition. He did not see that this bill affected the interests of Texas in any way. The extension in Oregon of the line to 42° could not affect the southern States. He stood on the frontier, and he saw nothing in whatever legislation might take place in reference to territory north of 42° which could concern his State. He reminded the Senate that thirteen Senators from the northern States had voted for the admission of Texas as she came in. And he was ready to vote for the admission of Oregon, even with the prohibition of slavery attached to it, as it could never affect the southern territories. He might vote against receding, because he hoped something better might be obtained. As to the southern territories, the government of California is not now before us. He remembered the cry of disunion and nullification when the high tariff was imposed. That cry reached him in the wilderness, an exile from kindred and friends and sections; but it rung in his ears, and wounded his heart. But now he was in the midst of such a cry, and he was bound to act as a man conscious of the solemn responsibilities imposed on him. He had heard the menaces and cries of disunion until he had become familiar with them, and they had now ceased to produce alarm in his bosom. He had no fear of the dissolution of the Union, when he recollected how it had been established, and how it had been defended. It could not be the interest of the North to destroy the South, notwithstanding the papers signed by old men, and old women, and pretty little girls, praying for abolition, got up in the very fanatical coteries—these could not ruffle the Union. The intelligent and manly spirits of the North would rise up to defend the Union. He wished no separation of the States. He had too much confidence in the North to fear any injury from that section. And he thought the South—and he was a southern man—should make some sacrifice for the purpose of reconciliation with the North. As to the Presidential elections, he hoped they would always continue, and that this republic would long exist; but he did not dread the influence which these questions would exercise on legislation. Oregon cannot obtain protection and good government, except frm Congress; and he hoped these would be extended to her.

As to the South, he was anxious to throw off from her any injurious imputations. It had been said that the South, which supported one of the candidates in 1840, had deserted him in 1844. He was a favorite with the South, because he declared himself a northern man with southern principles, and of course was a favorite with the South. What is that gentleman's position now? It reminded him of the two farmers who had two orchards, one on the north and the other on the south side of a hill. On one occasion, when the fruit failed on the northern side, the farmer on the south offered his neighbor the privilege of coming into his orchard and making there what cider he wished. "That is very well," said the northern man, "but I have no hands to make it." The southern man replied that he would make him some, and would let him have a barrel of cider. "But I have no one to bring it home," said the northern man. "Well, I will send you a barrel," was the reply. "This is all well," said his neighbor, "and when I have drunk out the cider, what will you give me for the barrel?" So the gentleman of the North with southern principles now wanted to sell the barrel to the South. He went on at some length to discuss the political character and course of Mr. Van Buren, expressing his belief that as soon as Elisha's mantle fell on his shoulders, he was the favorite of the South on that account; but that when he styled himself a northern man with southern principles, that alone should have put the South on her guard, and led her to suspect him of treachery. But if the vision of the stern old warrior could break upon him as the old man would have looked, if living, on his traitorous course, the glance of the warrior's eye would exterminate him where he stands, and leave not a spot to mark the place. He went on to show the intimate connection of interests between the North and the South, which ought to cement the union between them. They are mutually dependent on each other; and if the slaves were free, where would be found purchasers for the coarser fabrics of northern manufactures? The South had no reason to complain because the North was the beneficiary of the favors of the government. He thought that these considerations ought to influence us when any one talks to us of a dissolution of the Union. He protested against the cries of disunion, and against every attempt to traduce the Union. He was of the South, and he was ready to defend the South; but he was for the Union. The Union was his guiding star, and he would fix his eyes on that star to direct his course. He would advise his friends of the South and of the North to pursue measures of conciliation. He would discourage every attempt to sow discord, and to stir up the passions of the country, and kindle them up to war. He regretted that the Senator from South Carolina had used any menacing language against the Union.

Mr. CALHOUN explained that he used no menace. He spoke of his own position.

Mr. HOUSTON said, he was glad to find that the Senator meant no menace. What would be done by the South? Would she have a convention?

Mr. DOWNS.—Have not the North had a convention?

Mr. BUTLER.—Does the Senator think it treason in the South to have a convention?

Mr. HOUSTON said, certainly not. It would have the right to hold a convention and raise a piece war against the women and children who get up abolition papers, or against that convention at Buffalo: and he had seen a much more respectable convention of buffaloes. He would never go into any southern convention; he would never aid in any scheme to bring about a dissolution of the Union. What would a southern convention do? Would it oppose the laws enacted by a majority of the two Houses? Would it raise troops to cut off emigrants to Oregon, because they were going there without negroes? He wished to know if this would not be a beautiful idea. The Senator from South Carolina, after voting for the Missouri compromise, could not head a convention. Heaven would not let him. Such a motinous, nondescript company as he would have under him, would never have been seen before. As for himself, he would not go in for carrying on a war to Puget's Sound for a visionary object.

Mr. BENTON called the attention of the Senate to the fact, that the Senate had agreed to every word and every letter of the bill from the House; but the Senate had added to it extraneous matter. We now saw the opening of that second chapter, which the Senator from South Carolina had spoken of, as a part of the history of the dissolution of the Union. Chapter "number two" was to open when both Houses had agreed to this Oregon bill, word for word, and letter for letter; and when the Senate interjected in the bill a foreign question—a question relating altogether to another subject—this number two was to go before the country as a part of the history of dissolution.

All this talk about the dissolution of the Union gave him no concern. He was peculiarly constituted as to the subject. His observation of public affairs went back to that period of our history when Aaron Burr engaged in his enterprise of disunion. He [Mr. B.] was a boy of sixteen, but was an observer of events, and a reader of the public journals. He acknowledged that he then read with mortification—and few things from the same source had ever failed to meet with his cordial approbation—he read, he said, with mortification, the proclamation of Mr. Jefferson, in which he denounced the project of Burr as "dangerous to the Union." For, at that time, there was not a neighborhood in the west in which Burr would disclose his project. If he had done so, the women and children would have tied him down and sent him to the nearest place of justice, dragged by a dog-chain. As long as he presented mere designs of a dazzling nature, and not concerning our own government, he was listened to. But when, on the lower Mississippi, he did disclose his treasonable objects, he was immediately obliged to fly into the wilderness and become an outcast from society. There, in his hiding place—in his disguise—in a creek, where the alligator has his place—he was accidentally encountered, at night, by one who, before affording him relief, demanded his name. Who are you? As soon as he gave his name, he was taken into custody, and by a string led into the Georgia settlements. Burr having already heard of the sympathy excited in the behalf of great men struggling with adversity, appealed to some persons in Georgia for his rescue. He addressed some boys as to his case, and, at first, very naturally excited their sympathy. But when these boys heard his name, they refused to afford him any succor. Such will be the end of all attempts to dissolve this Union—to divide it by any line. He would, he said, think that a man who might bring brick, mortar, and trowel to dam up the mighty Mississippi, had commenced a feasible and wise enterprise, in comparison with the project of that man who might undertake to run a dividing line between the States of this Union. All this talk of disunion was idle. It was like > "A tale told by an idiot,

> Full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

No influence had these menaces on him. A key dropped into the broad Atlantic would, as it had been said, produce a disturbance that would be felt in the seas of China. Just as little did this talk of disunion ruffle him. Thus, he said, would end the chapter number two.

Mr. YULEE addressed the Senate at length on the subject, remarking that he would gladly go with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. HOUSTON] in postponing this issue, if it could be done with a just regard to the interests of the South. But such a postponement would only serve as an inducement to the North to persist in its course of injustice to the South.

Mr. WEBSTER doubted whether the bill, in its present condition, could be referred.

Mr. CALHOUN said the reference would be in conformity with parliamentary rule. The committee might propose to retain some, and recede from other amendments.

Mr. DAYTON said the amendments alone were before the Senate.

Mr. YULEE withdrew the motion at present.

A message was here received from the House, communicating their action on the Senate amendments to the bill establishing certain post roads.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was taken up.

The message was read, and the House amendments concurred in.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, rose and addressed the Senate in reply to the Senator from Texas, declaring that the South could not with any propriety rely on the magnanimity of the North.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, rose, and took the floor in continuance of the debate; and, as the hour for the recess had nearly arrived, he moved that the Senate go into Executive session; which was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION.

The CHAIR having announced that a resolution offered by Mr. MANGUM could not be received—

When the doors were re-opened—

Mr. WESTCOTT was speaking to a question of order, as it appeared, in consequence of the objection to the reading of the resolution which was submitted by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM.] It was represented to him, that there was a conventional understanding on the subject; but there was a time coming when the laws of courtesy would give way to other laws.

Mr. W. appealed against the decision of the Chair, and asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. KING hoped the chair would reverse its decision, and permit the resolution to be read, as he should be compelled to vote for the appeal.

Mr. DICKINSON said he should vote for the appeal.

Mr. NILES (in the Chair) stated that when the Senate took a recess, the Senator from Georgia had the floor, and was entitled to the floor when the Senate resumed its session. It was not in order, therefore, for any Senator to introduce other business.

The question was then put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the Senate?" and was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dix, Dodge, Douglas, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Huntington, Metcalfe, Miller, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Walker—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Badger, Berrien, Borland, Bright, Calhoun, Cameron, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Downs, Foote, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Phelps, Rusk, Sebastian, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—21.

Mr. ATHERTON asked the consent of the Senate to permit a report to be made from the committee of conference on the bill making appropriations for the army, and amendments.

Objections were made, and then withdrawn, and the report was received and read; and

Mr. ATHERTON moved that the Senate concur.

Mr. YULEE objected to a concurrence in that part of the report which relates to the organization of the marine corps. He considered it a matter of importance, and that it was his duty to explain the facts to the Senate.

The Senator from Florida was here called to order; consent having been given merely for the purpose of receiving the report.

The CHAIR decided that the report could not be made the subject of discussion; the objections being withdrawn only to permit the report to be received.

Mr. YULEE appealed from the decision of the Chair. He insisted that the objection to the reception of the report having been removed, the subject of the report was properly before the Senate.

The Chair repeated the reasons for its decision; but in so low a tone that the purport could not be understood.

Mr. ATHERTON insisted that the subject was before the Senate; that the House was waiting for the action of the Senate on the report; and that if it was laid on the table, the appropriation bill may be lost.

Mr. KING expressed a hope that the Senator from Illinois would withdraw his objection, and permit the report to be considered.

Mr. DOUGLAS explained that the objection did not originate with him.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, said he should object to taking up this subject while another question was under consideration. The report might as well be laid on the table as the Oregon bill. He knew not to what extent the discussion on the Oregon bill was intended to be continued.

Mr. TURNEY hoped the question would be taken on the appeal. He was opposed to the taking up of the subject of the Oregon bill until this report (taken up by the unanimous consent of the Senate) was disposed of.

The CHAIR stated the ground of its decision.

Mr. BADGER thought the decision of the Chair was not correct.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being taken on the appeal, viz: "Whether the decision of the Chair shall stand?" and it was decided as follows—yeas 19, nays 29.

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dix, Dodge, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Huntington, Metcalfe, Miller, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Walker—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bradbury, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Downs, Foote, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Sebastian, Turney, Webster, Westcott, and Yulee—29.

So the decision of the Chair was not sustained.

Mr. YULEE resumed, and asked for the reading of the section of the bill which constituted the amendment. He stated that the committee on conference was not in possession of the facts when the subject was before it, and this portion of the bill escaped consideration. An increase of the marine corps had been authorized last session, and a portion of the increase had been employed on shore in Mexico, and had behaved with great gallantry. The increase authorized last session was one thousand; and it is was now found that the number required, according to the present naval establishment, would be about two thousand and three hundred; while the number now authorized by the committee made the exigency only fifteen hundred. The Secretary proposed to reduce the landsmen in the proportion of the increase of the marines; and as the landsmen received nine dollars a month, and the marines only six dollars, it was a measure of economy. He lauded the efficiency with which the marines had performed their duty. He referred to a letter from Commodore Stewart, who recommended a much larger increase; and all the officers concurred in the expediency of this increase. An addition is also required to keep a sufficient number—say fifty or a hundred should always be kept here at head-quarters—for drill, as they could only be effectually drilled while on shore. He requested the reading of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy recommending the increase on the grounds he had just stated; and the letter was read.

The report of the committee of conference was then agreed to.

OREGON.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a territorial government in Oregon.

[Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate in a speech which is given in the Appendix.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, then resumed his remarks, and continued until a late hour.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, followed, and spoke for near an hour; when

Mr. HOUSTON rose and addressed the Senate at very considerable length, chiefly in reply to Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, and others. In the course of his remarks he paid a beautiful compliment to Mr. Clay, declaring that he deserved to have a statue erected in the rotundo for his stand in relation to the Missouri compromise.

Mr. TURNEY moved that the Senate adjourn, and desired to have the hour entered on the Journal. [It was then past midnight.]

On this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Berrien, Borland, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Downs, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Rusk, Sebastian, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Douglas, Felch, Fitzgerald, Greene, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, Johnson, of Louisiana, Metcalfe, Miller, Niles, Phelps, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Walker—32.

Mr. BADGER then addressed the Senate in favor of a committee of conference being appointed.

Mr. METCALFE spoke at great length, insisting that a committe of conference between the two Houses might be able to accommodate the matter satisfactorily.

Mr. FOOTE spoke for near half an hour, endeavoring to get Mr. BENTON to withdraw his motion to recede.

Mr. BENTON playfully observed that he always had an objection to retreating. One of his earliest recollections was the old Roman maxim, non trahit pedem; and, if the object of the gentleman's speech was to induce him to draw back his foot, he might have saved himself the trouble.

Mr. FOOTE again rose to speak.

Mr. WALKER made a point of order. The rule said that no Senator could speak more than twice on any one subject; whereas the gentleman from Mississippi had spoken some half dozen times at least.

[Several voices: "Oh, let the gentleman proceed; we will listen to him with the greatest pleasure."]

Mr. FOOTE then went on very coolly, declaring his ability to speak two entire days and nights without any very great inconvenience to himself.

The debate was continued until after nine o'clock, a. m., Sunday, and was closed in a speech by Mr. FOOTE.

The question being put upon the motion of Mr. BENTON, to recede from all the amendments, a division of the question was called for, and it was ordered that the question be taken separately on each amendment.

Upon the question to recede from the first amendment, giving the veto power to the Governor, the yeas and nays were ordered, and it was determined as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Bedford, Bell, Benton, Bibb, Bright, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Evans, Fairfield, Fulton, Graham, Huntington, Johnson, of Maryland, Miller, Niles, Pierce, Semmes, Simmons, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Wall, and Webster—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Berrien, Bayard, Bates, Choate, Davis, of Mississippi, Dawson, Foster, Henderson, Johnson, of Louisiana, Lumpkin, Graham, Lewis, Mangum, Merrick, Morehead, Porter, Rives, Sebastian, Turney, and Lumpkin, Westcott, and Yulee—27.

Upon the question to recede from the second amendment, relating to the same subject, it was determined in the affirmative without a division.

Upon the question to recede from the third amendment, being the section extending the line of the Missouri compromise to the Pacific ocean, the yeas and nays were ordered, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Bedford, Benton, Bibb, Bright, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Huntington, Johnson, of Maryland, Lumpkin, Lewis, Miller, Niles, Pierce, Semmes, Simmons, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, and Woodbridge—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Davis, of Mississippi, Dawson, Evans, Fairfield, Foster, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Merrick, Morehead, Porter, Rives, Sebastian, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—27.

The remaining amendments were separately receded from without a division, and the bill as thus passed to the engrossment in all its parts, as the House of Representatives.

Mr. MILLER submitted a resolution (that the joint rule occurring) the 17th joint rule be suspended, in order that the bill may be presented to the President of the United States on the last day of the session.

Mr. YULEE objected to the consideration of the resolution, and it lies over.

On motion of Mr. DICKERSON, the bill from the House for the relief of Richard Rowland was taken up, read a third time, and passed; and at a late hour, after a protracted and somewhat exciting session of twenty-four hours, the Senate adjourned until Monday morning, at nine o'clock.

MONDAY, AUGUST 14, 1848.

Prayer being over, and a portion of the Journal having been read—

Mr. MANGUM hoped the reading of the Journal would be dispensed with; they had much business before them, and little time to transact it in, and as the Journal was unusually long, it would consume much of that time.

Mr. TURNEY insisted that the Journal should be read; it was his right to insist on it, and he claimed that right.

Several Senators: "Well, let it be read."

After some portion of the Journal had been read—

Mr. BENTON again rose and expressed the hope that the further reading would be dispensed with; it was long, and would consume much time.

The CHAIR said that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. TURNEY) had insisted on the reading of the Journal, in which the Senate seemed to acquiesce, and directed the Secretary to proceed with the reading.

The reading of the Journal having been concluded, several Senators were on their feet at the same time, addressing "Mr. President," to wit: Messrs. BENTON, YULEE, and TURNEY.

Mr. YULEE.—I desire to correct a statement in the Journal.

Mr. BENTON.—Mr. President, I move to take up the resolution submitted on Sunday morning by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER,] to suspend the 17th joint rule, so as to enable the Oregon bill to go to the President. If that resolution be not passed, it will involve the fate of several bills.

Mr. ATHERTON.—Yes, the military appropriation bill, involving millions.

Mr. YULEE.—Mr. President, is not mine a privileged question?

Mr. RUSK.—I move to amend the resolution by adding the words, "and all other bills up to 12 o'clock of this day."

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I move an amendment to the amendment, "to rescind the resolution to adjourn."

Mr. BRIGHT.—The motion of the Senator from Florida is clearly out of order. All amendments must be germane to the subject; his was evidently not so.

The CHAIR ruled it out of order.

Mr. MILLER.—I have not the slightest objection to the amendment of the Senator from Texas. I will accept the modification with pleasure.

The CHAIR.—The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. TURNEY objected to the resolution. As it was proposed to be amended, it would be made to embrace all other bills passed, or to be passed this morning, and to this he could not agree. If separate resolutions were brought in to suspend the rules, he should exercise his judgment on each separately, and he would not object to that course being pursued, and to the passage of any bill that was in itself unobjectionable. Congress had thought proper to adopt a rule, for reasons that were doubtless satisfactory to it, that bills should not be sent to the President after a certain period. This rule was an important one. Its object was to give the President time to consider and examine bills that were sent to him for his approval and signature. But here was an important bill that was new in many of its provisions, which it was proposed to send to the President at this late period of the session. The vote on suspending the rules for such a purpose virtually involved the question of the passage of the bill, and hence it opened the whole subject matter of the bill. He was opposed to this. He was opposed to the passage of the bill, and he was opposed to the manner in which its passage had been secured. He thought all the courtesies of the Senate had been violated that this bill might be rushed through. He would ask if it had ever happened before that a Senator was refused by a vote of the Senate permission to proceed with his argument in order. [The honorable Senator alluded to a vote taken late on Saturday night in relation to Mr. FOOTE.] Yet the Journal showed that a Senator had been called to order for irrelevancy in debate, and a motion to permit him to proceed in order was voted down by the Senate. That was an extraordinary vote. It was unprecedented. It was unheard of.

Mr. BENTON called the Senator from Tennessee to order, and asked for the reading of the rule which required Senators to speak to the subject before the Senate; and further, he called for the enforcement of that rule.

Mr. FOOTE said that rule should have been enforced at an earlier period of the session.

Mr. TURNEY did not understand that there was any point of order made by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BENTON said that he had asked for a thing to be done.

Mr. FOOTE insisted that the Senator from Missouri had no right to make such a motion while a Senator was speaking.

Mr. TURNEY said he insisted that his words, which were objected to as irrelevant, should be put down in writing.

Mr. FOOTE also contended that the words should be taken down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER made some observations which did not reach the reporter.

Mr. TURNEY said he was going on to give, very briefly, the history of the proceedings on this bill, and he wished to know if anybody had ever before been called to order for pursuing such a course?

Mr. KING begged to remind the Senator from Tennessee that there was no bill under consideration.

Mr. TURNEY asserted that there was. The Oregon bill was embraced in the pending resolution, the adoption of which was necessary to give that bill the force of law; and, consequently, the whole question was opened for discussion.

He then proceeded. Some most extraordinary steps had been taken to force this bill through this body. The gag had been applied, and it had been applied, for the first time, to secure the passage of this bill. But that was not the only matter of which he complained. So far as his knowledge extended, the practice of the Senate had been, in all cases of disagreeing votes between the two Houses, to appoint a committee of conference. But even that had been refused. A departure from the usual practice of the Senate, in that respect, had been resorted to for the first time, in this case; and it was done for the purpose of forcing through a measure that was more obnoxious to one section of this Union than any other subject of legislation which had come before them during the present session. Why should they now be called upon to suspend the rules to give this bill the force and effect of law? He was not willing to assent to such a proceeding.

He should now give his objections to this bill; and he should be very brief, and yet he should not hurry himself. If there were other important bills embraced in this resolution, which it was necessary to pass, gentlemen might detach them, act upon them separately, and they could be disposed of in two minutes. To that he would consent. But if they should refuse, gentlemen need not expect him to shrink from the responsibility of opposing this resolution. Whatever responsibility there was, would rest on others.

He then recapitulated the proceedings of the two Houses on the subject of the Oregon bill, which resulted in a disagreement between the two Houses; and what, he asked the Senate, was to be gained by surrendering to the House of Representatives? The Senate sent to the House a compromise bill, after mature consideration by the Senate, and its passage by a large majority, and the House unceremoniously laid it upon the table. After that, the House of Representatives passed this Oregon bill, which was about one-third of the bill which the House had rejected.

Mr. MILLER interposed, and reminded the Senator from Tennessee that the pending resolution had reference not alone to the Oregon bill, but to some twenty or thirty others, amongst them was the army bill.

Mr. TURNEY should vote against the resolution, although it did embrace other bills. But if the Senator from New Jersey would offer a separate resolution in relation to the army bill, he (Mr. T.) would interpose no objection. But did the Senator suppose that he could be cut off from giving his decided opposition to this Oregon bill? If so, he was very much mistaken. If gentlemen would put a number of bills together, they must take the consequences, for he could not thus allow himself to be brought to favor the passage of a bill which his judgment disapproved.—The House of Representatives had decided that it would pass no bill which was silent on the subject of slavery. They were not content to stand on the Constitution. They were not content that the citizens of this Republic should enjoy the rights which were secured to them by the Constitution, and hence, they had rejected the Oregon bill sent to them by the Senate. They had rejected it because it was in bad company. The House afterwards sent to the Senate a bill to establish a Territorial Government in Oregon by itself, and the Senate returned it with a second proposition of a compromise, on the basis of the Missouri compromise, giving them a large portion of the territory, and they had refused to accede to that, and had sent the bill back amended. In this state of things, the Senate was now asked to yield to the House, without even a committee of conference being allowed them, although it was a common law of the body, and allowed in every other case. And, not only was a committee of conference denied them, but gentlemen had been gagged, and refused permission to deliver their sentiments in this body, on so important a question; but, notwithstanding their rights had been thus outraged, they were asked to stand here in silence, and permit this bill to pass through; and, that it might be forced through, the army bill, and several others, had been coupled with it. Senators must not, however, expect to force it on him by thus coupling it with others. Let each tub stand on its own bottom, and let each bill stand on its own merits; but let them not expect to accomplish their purpose by this unholy and unnatural alliance. If, by such an alliance, a necessary measure was defeated let the responsibility rest on those who coupled them. If Senators would blend measures together, they must bear the responsibility. He should not vote for this resolution on that account, and he was willing to take all the responsibility that would attach to him for any vote that he might give. He was willing to answer to the State of Tennessee, and to nowhere else was he responsible.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to a question of order. He appealed to the Chair and to the Senate on a point of order. He made it certainly without any heat or passion. He rose to a point of order which he meant to propound decisively, and not for the purpose of discussing it at any length, but to ask for a decision by the Chair and the Senate. The position in which they stood could not but be well known to every Senator. Less than two hours hence and this Senate would stand adjourned.

Mr. WESTCOTT rose to a question of order. The Senator from Massachusetts had no right—and he said it respectfully—to make a speech on his point of order.

Mr. WEBSTER would state the point of order which he had risen to make. These protracted debates at this stage of the session were certainly out of order, and against the rule of the Senate which requires Senators to speak to the question pending before the Senate. He made this point of order as a last effort on his part to complete the business of the Senate in relation to the Oregon bill, the army bill, and others which were highly important; and he asked the Senate, with respect for the gentleman from Tennessee, if a prolonged debate, such as that which the gentleman from Tennessee was inclined to go into, was in order? If the Senate should say it was, he should not have another word to say.

Mr. TURNEY required the Senator from Massachusetts to put his point of order in writing, for he wished it to go on the Journal.

Mr. WEBSTER was willing to do so if it were required. He then submitted his point of order to this effect: "I call the Senator from Tennessee to order on the ground that the course of discussion in which he is indulging is not relevant to the subject before the Senate."

Mr. TURNEY wished the Senator from Massachusetts to indicate the irrelevant words.

Mr. WEBSTER replied that that was his point of order, and the Senate would judge for itself as to the words.

Mr. CALHOUN denied that the gentleman from Tennessee was out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, inquired if he understood that the opinion of the Senate was asked on this point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER was understood to answer in the affirmative.

Mr. JOHNSON.—And that, I believe, is debatable?

The PRESIDINF OFFICER answered that it was.

Mr. CALHOUN then proceeded to affirm that the course pursued by the Senator from Tennessee was no violation of propriety, and he called upon the Senator from Massachusetts to point out the words uttered by the Senator from Tennessee which were out of order.

Mr. WEBSTER replied, that if he were to enter into a debate on that point, the object of the gentleman opposite would be accomplished, in which he did not propose to aid them. He had no desire to go into any metaphysical views, aware, as he was, that if he were to engage with the Senator from South Carolina in a contest of that character, he should be involved in a maze from which there would be little probability of extrication before the hour of adjournment would terminate the session.

Mr. TURNEY said, the object was to gag him; and he desired to know if there was any rule to limit debate at the close of the session which did not exist at its beginning! If there was, he begged to be referred to it.

Mr. FOOTE said, he was very much surprised to hear such language fall from the lips of the Senator from Massachusetts. That Senator had brought a very serious charge against Senators who were as respectable as himself. He had charged them with some improper purpose in discussing the resolution he had undertaken to say that, if he arose in his place to answer the question of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] the purpose of Senators would be as fully accomplished as if this discussion were permitted to go on. Now, what was meant by the Senator from Massachusetts darkly hinted? Did the Senator suppose, or had any one declared, that it was the intention of any Senator on this floor thus to defeat this bill? Did not the Senator from Massachusetts know that such an accusation was made against another Senator from Massachusetts by the public press at the close of the last session, and did it become the manliness of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr WEBSTER,] either directly or indirectly to make such a charge against [illegible]? He had no Senator in his eye, [Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts,] against whom a similar accusation was made in the newspaper quoted; but he [Mr. F.] did not believe that that accusation had any foundation in truth; but he would tell the Senator that the course of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] to-day would lend countenance to the suspicions which were made a few days ago, for it would seem to many that it was [illegible] familiar with such trickery, or that such an imputation would not have suggested itself to the imagination of a New England man. He did not believe that the accusation was true.

The PRESIDENT interposed, and called the Senator from Mississippi to order.

Mr FOOTE had only to say, that if he had been guilty of the example of the Senator from Massachusetts, he should not persist in being out of order, though he should claim at all times the same privileges that were enjoyed by other Senators.

The CLERK of the House of Representatives here appeared below the bar, and delivered to the Senate a joint resolution for the suspension of the 17th joint rule of the two Houses, to permit all bills heretofore passed, or to be passed, to be presented to the President, in which he was requested to ask the concurrence of the Senate. [This resolution was the same in its terms as that under consideration.]

Messrs. BERRIEN, JOHNSON, of Georgia, and JOHNSON, of Maryland, having each made suggestions—

Mr. TURNEY said he would relieve the Senate. He had not five words more to say. It was not his purpose to [illegible] engage in a long discussion. He closed with [illegible] and then to vote against the resolution, first assigning briefly the reasons by which he was actuated. He should vote against suspending the rules.

Mr. WEBSTER said he understood the Senator from Tennessee to say that he was through. He begged to say, and with all respect for the Senator from Tennessee, that he had had no desire to embarrass that Senator.

Mr. TURNEY wished, nevertheless, to have a vote on the point of order.

Mr. RUSK said he believed he had opposed this Oregon bill with as much firmness as any Senator, and with as little noise. He had discharged his duty to the best of his ability to his country and his State; and now if this bill goes to the Executive, he must discharge his duty. He (Mr. R.) had done all he could. He had been anxious to dispose of it without sitting on Saturday night, and protracted it without unnecessarily [illegible] but it appears that that could not be avoided. The bill was passed, and according to the course which had heretofore been pursued in the Senate, when a majority, a clearly ascertained majority, had agreed upon a measure, it was proper that he should yield, that they might have the opportunity of passing it, and assuming to God and their country the responsibility of the act.

Mr. WEBSTER intimated that he understood the Chair had decided the point which he raised, and he should therefore make no further effort.

Mr. TURNEY asked if he was to understand that he was in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER was understood to answer in the affirmative.

Mr. RUSK then continued. He said, the majority had assumed the responsibility, and therefore all that the minority could do, except what they could do indirectly, was now done. And there was another important matter to which he would advert. There were about thirty bills in the situation of the Oregon bill, many of them bills for the relief of those who were suffering in poverty and want, to whom just debts were owing by the Government of the United States. One of those bills, (and it was one of great importance,) was the army appropriation bill. He had seen the Secretary [illegible] and was informed by [illegible] that gentleman that it was impossible for him to proceed, for any length of time, unless the army appropriation bill should be passed. If this bill should not be passed, what would be the consequence? Their officers and soldiers would be left without a dollar. He was aware the country was in circumstances of great agitation, and in a state of highly exciting feelings. He regretted to see it. It was a matter of very sincere regret to him. But he appealed to those Senators who had been opposed to the passage of the Oregon bill to cease all further opposition, and to permit it to pass.

Amongst those Senators to whom he appealed, were two brave men who had long served their country, and who, when they died, would leave a name behind which would ever be cherished by the rising generation. For the passage of this treaty they were responsible, for they had resisted manfully and perseveringly. He asked them, therefore, now to yield, and not attempt indirectly to defeat a measure which they had not the power to defeat directly: but let the majority take the responsibility of the act, of which posterity would form its judgment.

Mr. KING wished to say, that perhaps there was no one in the Senate more opposed to certain provisions of the bill which had been passed than he was. He thought it contained provisions that were not only unnecessary, but objectionable, in the progress of his section of the Union. When the bill was under consideration, he had been very desirous to [illegible], and when it came back with the amendment of the House, he proposed that the Senate should insist on its amendment, that they might avail themselves of the proposition of the Senator from Illinois, and appoint a committee of conference. The proposition to recede having the preference, he had not been able to accomplish that object. The majority had decided the question, and on them let the responsibility rest. The bill was now only waiting the action of the President to become the law of the land. They had done their duty to themselves and to the country, as far as was practicable. But the majority of the Senate and of the other House had spoken; they had determined that the bill should pass in its present form. He was now for leaving the co-ordinate branch of the Government (the Executive) to do its duty, and act on this bill when it should be presented to him. He, Mr. K. was not now prepared to take ground on mere technical objections to defeat it. He had never seen any good result from such a course. He was decidedly of opinion that no good could result from it. He therefore appealed to his friends—to those with whom he had acted, and who could not be more opposed to the bill in its present shape than he was—to let the rules be suspended, that this and the other bills might go to the President; and let the President act upon them as his judgment might direct. He trusted if that course would be pursued. It would comport better with the dignity of the Senate, with their standing in the country, and with the public sentiment, than by persisting in opposing this resolution. He knew there was a great diversity of sentiment respecting this matter. He knew some gentlemen thought the President could not, at this late period, give it a proper examination. If not, let the President hold it over, if he thought proper to do so; but if he was ready to act, let him act. If he was not ready, let him take the time which the Constitution allowed. He (Mr. K.) again appealed to those with whom he acted to withdraw their opposition, and let this resolution pass.

Mr. CALHOUN said, if there was any responsibility, it was on the majority, and not on the minority. By the rules of the Senate, the Oregon bill was lost; and the majority well knew that. They felt conscious of the fact, and therefore they had added all the other bills to it in this resolution; and thereby they had assumed the responsibility of all the consequences. The existing rule on their Journal was a convincing proof that the Senate was of opinion that it was improper to send bills to the President on the last day of a session, as he could not sign them off hand. There might be great constitutional questions involved, requiring great consideration, and the constitution allows him ten days to decide upon bills. But they proposed to send this bill to him on the last day of the session; and if there ever was a bill that ought not to be pressed on the President at such a time, it was this one. How long had it been before them? Some five or six weeks; and they had even refused to receive some amendments not regarded as a legal sign, and yet they proposed to send the President one hour and a half before the adjournment of Congress. This was all the time they proposed to allow him. He understood what was the great point of contest between parties in that House. The opposite party wanted to have the absolute, despotic control over the territories. They knew there was not such an example to be found in all the legislation of this country. They all knew that the Missouri compromise would not have passed, but that the North were anxious to protect themselves by the adoption of the line of 36° 30'. And how was it on the admission of Texas?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, suggested to the Senator from South Carolina to make a motion.

Mr. CALHOUN said he would. After some other observations, he said this was the first time the Wilmot proviso had ever been attempted to be carried into effect. He concluded by moving to strike out from the resolution all that part of it which relates to the Oregon bill, and on that motion he called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLER said there was nothing about the Oregon bill in it.

Mr JOHNSON, of Maryland, then suggested to the Senator from South Carolina to except the Oregon bill by name.

Mr. CALHOUN said he would do so.

The SECRETARY read the resolution, and it appeared that the Senator from New Jersey was mistaken, the Oregon bill being named in it.

Mr. BENTON moved to lay the resolution on the table, and that the Senate take up the resolution from the House on the same subject, which was received a few minutes ago. Agreed to.

The resolution from the House was then taken up. It proposed, in general terms, to suspend the 17th joint rule to permit all bills passed and to be passed this day to be sent to the President.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to amend the resolution by adding the words "except the Oregon bill."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, suggested an amendment to the same effect, but in more precise terms.

Mr. CALHOUN was understood to accept that amendment as a modification of his own, and to call for the yeas and nays thereon.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted thus:

[illegible]

The question then recurred on the House resolution.

Mr. FOOTE rose and said that it had been intimated by Senators in their places that there were gentlemen there who were determined to speak out all the time remaining with the view of defeating this bill. Now, he wished to be allowed to say that they had been for some time prepared to act a very different part. They had been prepared to defeat what was considered improper legislation, and nothing more. But he now felt authorized to declare that they were now willing to yield and let the majority take the responsibility. They had discharged their duty as patriots should do. [Loud cries of "Question."]

Mr. HOUSTON was deeply impressed with the importance of this subject. Having acted upon this measure with the best intentions, he had this only to say, that a majority, and a very small majority, had decided this question—and as a southern man he had placed himself not on sectional and abstract principles, but on principles which were calculated to maintain the rights of this Union and of every portion of it—he trusted all opposition would cease.

The majority, he repeated, was small, but it was a small majority by which Texas was admitted into this Union, and if there was a majority, it was not for him to say how few or how many, but to submit. He contended that he was actuated by as high, as independent, and as patriotic motives as any gentleman in that body, be he from the South or from the North. On such occasions, he knew neither North or South; he knew only this Union, and he, though a southern man, would protect the rights of the North, and not suffer them to be encroached upon, as ardently as he would protect and support the rights of the South. He believed on that floor he was a representative of the whole American people. He was the representative of the whole and of every portion of it. On all occasions he would maintain that position, and he believed his people would sustain him in it, for they are true to the Union.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. YULEE moved that the Senate proceed to the considera[illegible] resolution, reported some days since by the [illegible] and the Committee on Public Buildings.

[illegible]

Cries of "What is it?"

Mr. YULEE.—It relates to the ventilation of the Senate chamber.

Cries of "No, no," from all quarters of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON.—I object to the taking up the resolution, which, I understand, relates to ventilation. No, sir; no more ventilation! We have quite wind enough, sir! Yes, sir; quite wind enough!

Mr. DICKINSON.—We shall not want any more ventilation this session. I move, sir, to lay the motion on the table, and to take up the bill for the relief of William Hogan, administrator of Michael Hogan, deceased. [This bill appropriates about $16,000 to the claimant.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I rise, sir, to a question of order. The Senator from New York is out of order. It is out of order to make two motions together. The Senator from New York moves to lay a motion on the table, and to take up a private bill.

Mr. DICKINSON.—Well! I will move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. YULEE.—Mr. President, as I perceive the sense of the Senate is so strong against my motion, I will withdraw it. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DICKINSON.—Now, sir, I move to take up the bill for the relief of William Hogan, administrator of Michael Hogan, deceased.

The motion was agreed to, and the Chair announced that the bill was before the Senate on its passage.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. WEBSTER moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the following joint resolution from the House of Representatives to add to the joint rules of the two Houses :

"After six days from the second session of the [illegible] Congress, all bills, resolutions, or reports [illegible] close of the next preceding session and not finally acted upon, shall be resumed and acted upon in the same manner as if no adjournment had taken place."

The motion having been agreed to, the joint resolution was taken up, and was considered and passed.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the House bill to liquidate certain claims therein mentioned; which was considered and passed.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, the bill from the House for the relief of William Triplett was then taken up, considered, and passed.

On motion by Mr. ALLEN, the bill from the House in relation to military land warrants was taken up, considered, and passed.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Frederick Dawson; which was read a third time and passed.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments made by the House of Representatives to the bill for the relief of William B. Stokes; and they were considered and concurred in.

The resolution which had been previously submitted by Mr. MANGUM, relative to the payment of officers, &c., was then taken up for consideration.

Mr. CAMERON moved to amend the resolution by inserting a provision to pay the laborers in the Capitol grounds the same as last session.

Mr. C. said, that while such a disposition was manifested on all sides of the Senate to make extravagant donations to all the persons who were employed within the walls of the Capitol, he thought it nothing but fair that the same generosity should be extended to the workmen outside the building. The laboring men, who were exposed all day to the broiling sun, were surely as well deserving of extra compensation as those whose duties were less arduous, and accompanied by less risk. He asked for the yeas and nays on his motion. He was desirous to see who were the men that would vote against the allowance of a little gratuity to the workmen on the public grounds.

Mr. KING stated that when this motion was formerly made he opposed it, because he thought it was going too far. He had, however, subsequently made some inquiry on the subject. He had ascertained that the pay of these laborers was smaller than he had supposed; that they were paid by the day; that what they received was barely sufficient to supply them with the necessaries of life; and if they were at any time detained from their work by sickness or accident, even that little pittance was stopped. He had also found that a similar allowance had been made to those persons at the last session. He desired to see all on the same footing. He should; therefore, not only withdraw his opposition, but he would willingly vote for the amendment. At the same time, he declared it to be his purpose to introduce, at the next session, a system which would prevent any injustice or inequality in dispensing the liberality of the Senate.

At the suggestion of several Senators, Mr. CAMERON withdrew his call for the yeas and nays.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the resolution by inserting an appropriation of $60 for the page, James Moore; which was agreed to.

Mr. HALE moved to amend the resolution by inserting extra pay to James Smallwood and Martin Latruite; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANGUM moved to amend the resolution by inserting an allowance to Mr. Isaac Holland, as compensation for conveying the remains of the late Chester Ashley to Arkansas; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to amend the resolution by inserting a provision to place the Senate pages on the same footing, in relation to pay, with the pages of the House; and the amendment was agreed to.

The question then being on the amendment as amended—

Mr. TURNEY inquired whether this resolution was introduced with the sanction of any committee? He desired to know what was the amount included in the resolution which was to be thus distributed? Could the Chair give him the information?

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Mr. TURNEY resumed. There was an extra allowance to the Secretary of the Senate of $500. Now, he wished to know why this was to be given to the Secretary? Was it [illegible] extra allowance [illegible]

The CHAIR. Three thousand dollars.

Mr. [illegible] Thousand dollars. This was above [illegible] Would it not [illegible] equal to the compensation of a cabinet officer. This he considered [illegible] sons: in the first place, he thought $4,000 too high a compensation; and, in the second place, as other officers, who had not one [illegible] only a small extra allowance, the rule operated unequally and unjustly. He desired that some principle should be adopted which would secure justice to all, and that we should no longer follow a course by which special favorites of Senators were lavishly rewarded, while others were treated with less liberality.

He asked for the yeas and nays on the question, and they were [illegible]

Mr. [illegible] general scramble, and he regarded it as all wrong, from beginning to [illegible] the door to abuse and extravagance. It had however been intimated by the Senator from Alabama, that he would at the next session introduce some measure which would put an end to the present practice; and, relying on that promise, he had determined now to give his vote in favor of the resolution, but it would be for the last time.

The question was then taken on the amendment as amended, and decided as follows:

[illegible]

So the resolution was adopted in the following form :

[illegible] Hon. Alexander Barrow.

[illegible] the pages of the House of Representatives for the present session.

That there be paid to James Smallwood and Martin Latruite, the mail boys in the [illegible] the pages of the Senate for the present session.

[illegible]

That the Sergeant at arms continue in service the present force of mail carriers and [illegible] to him by the public printers for the use of the Senators.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill from the House for the relief of John P. B. Gratiot, and the legal representatives of Henry Gratiot; and the bill was read a third time and passed.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution authorizing the Committee on Printing to sit during the recess; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Commerce, reported House bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain rivers and harbors, without amendment.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of a number of petitions, memorials, and bills.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the various petitions, memorials, &c., which had been committed to its charge.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the memorials and petitions referred to its charge.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, at a quarter before twelve o'clock, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and the doors were not re-opened until after twelve; when

A message was received from the House of Representatives announcing that the House of Representatives had adopted a resolution appointing a committee to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses were now ready to adjourn, and had appointed a committee on their part.

The resolution was then adopted, and the Chair appointed a committee on the part of the Senate.

Before any report was received from this committee,

[illegible]
